PREFACE.

An apologetic preface is not intended by what is here written, for it is believed that in this History of Washington County there are perhaps as few errors and imperfections as any reasonable critic ought to expect in so comprehensive a work. Whatever defects may appear (and what work of man is free from defects?), they are certainly not chargeable to a want of effort and care to avoid them; and those who have been engaged in the preparation of this work only ask the favor that before it be subjected to unfavorable comment it be carefully examined, not in isolated portions, but in its whole scope and character. Far from being unwilling to submit to honest and intelligent criticism, they will be glad to have any substantial inaccuracies pointed out. By such criticism alone can this work be affected; captious fault-finding, often arising out of unworthy jealousies, cannot prevail with intelligent men.

But it is rather desired here to make a remark or two as to the history of the book now delivered to those for whom it was written. And in this connection it may be premised that if any one individual, on his own account, could have devoted the necessary time and industry to the preparation of a full and accurate history of the county, covering the ground the writers of this history have endeavored to cover, it is confidently believed that, there being but a local demand for such a work, it would have been vain to hope that it could have been published and sold so as to repay the author for the time, labor, and expenditure involved. To those who wished to see something like an approach to a complete history of Washington County, the proposals of the enterprising publishers to publish the work after a plan and method of their own seemed to offer the only opportunity within reach, and hence it was that the writer of these lines, after the approval of good friends, on whose judgment he could rely, was led to aid the enterprise, not only by a contribution to its pages, but by way of general oversight and direction of the whole. It was soon found, however, that, beyond the chapters contributed, there was but little need of his assistance, for Major Franklin Ellis, of New York City, the gentleman by whom much the larger part of the work was prepared, brought with him long experience and great skill in historical investigation, an enviable facility of composition, together with laborious industry and carefulness. And he was aided by gentlemen—one of whom, Austin N. Hungerford, Esq., of Ithaca, N. Y., deserves special mention—who also were possessed of special fitness for the gathering from all sorts of sources of the innumerable and disjointed details which have gone to make up the history of localities; and, not only that, they have all along received constant encouragement and valuable suggestions from leading men in the county, too many in number to acknowledge by name here. It may be unusual, but, as his associates came here as strangers, the writer desires in this place to bear witness to all who may be interested in this work that in the labor performed by the gentlemen named they have evinced at all times while it progressed the most absolute good faith and painstaking desire for accuracy and completeness.

In explanation of the method adopted, more especially in the preparation of the chapters upon the civil and legal history, the writer would state that the idea of presenting original documents, in full or by quotation, as they lay before him, rather than to paraphrase their contents in his own language, was followed from deliberate choice as the best method of presenting local history. Thus the actors speak for themselves, and the reader is not asked to take upon faith the statements of another as to what is really contained in their communications. True, a sentence often might have represented the substantial contents of a letter or paper of some length, but the reader is supposed to desire rather to see and read the letter or paper for himself. This will, no doubt, be appreciated by the thoughtful.

One word as to the matter of the portraits, other illustrations, and biographical sketches not immediately connected with the historical character of the work, a feature, however, with which those engaged as investigators and writers have had nothing whatever to do, as being outside of their employment. This feature sometimes is made the subject of thoughtless criticism. Let it here be said the work is intended, to some extent, to indicate the present development of the county, side by side with the history of its past. For obvious reasons, then, wait for twenty, thirty, forty years of our future to elapse, when the present and its people shall have become more interesting. Then, it is submitted, this very feature of the work in which there are presented the portraits and biographical sketches of a few of the representative men of each condition of life, as well as illustrations of their homes and their surroundings, showing the county of to-day, will of itself have become of very great interest and importance. Time, indeed, will place this feature of the work in its proper light.

This history, thus the work of many hands, is now with the reader, a record of our past, for present and future instruction and entertainment. The longer it is possessed perhaps the more it may be prized. Not a page has been stereotyped, and only copies enough have been printed to supply the subscribers and those who labored upon it; hence it cannot hereafter be found in the market, and year by year it will become a possession more and more valuable to the owner.

HISTORY

OF

WASHINGTON COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

CHAPTER I.

WASHINGTON COUNTY IN HISTORY—LOCATION, BOUNDARIES, AND TOPOGRAPHY—THE INDIAN OCCUPATION.

WASHINGTON COUNTY embraces in its annals much that is of great historic interest, and in this respect it is surpassed by but few counties in Pennsylvania, though no great national events have ever occurred within its boundaries, and it contains no spot of world-wide fame like Valley Forge, Wyoming, or Gettysburg. In the fierce conflict waged a century and a quarter ago by the two great European rivals, England and France, for dominion over the vast region watered by the head-streams of the Ohio, the contending armies never fought or marched within the present limits of this county, but the routes and the battle-grounds of Washington and Braddock were so near these borders that the crunch and rumble of their artillery-wheels among the crags of the Laurel Hill and the rattle of the fusilades at Fort Necessity and on the storied field of the Monongahela might almost have been heard from the valleys and hills that are now whitened and dotted by the harvests and herds of Washington County farmers. Twenty years afterwards, when a controversy scarcely less fierce sprang up between the States of Pennsylvania and Virginia, in which the Old Dominion insisted on extending her limits eastward to the mountains, while Pennsylvania peremptorily refused to yield to the claim, and demanded the boundaries granted to Penn by the royal charter, the country west of the Monongahela, that was soon after embraced in the county of Washington, became the principal arena of a conflict of jurisdiction that almost reached the extremity of open war.

In the Revolutionary struggle this region saw nothing of the movements of the Continental and royal armies; but when the news of actual hostilities flew south and west from Lexington Common, kindling in all the colonies the flame of patriotism, it blazed forth as promptly and burned as brightly on these highlands and along these streams as it did on the plain of Bennington or the banks of the Brandywine. And while the smoke of battle still enveloped the steep sides of Bunker Hill, armed men from the valley of the Monongahela were already on their way across the mountains to join the provincial forces encircling Boston. Later in the struggle, when Britain had secured the alliance of the Indian tribes of the Northwest, and incited them to frequent and bloody incursions into the settlements along the Ohio border, the brave frontiersmen of this region were mustered in arms again and again to repel invasion and to march against the savages in the wilderness, as a means of protection to their own families and homes. And through all the years of the great struggle, devout ministers of the gospel in Washington County, some of them as eminent in their calling as any in the land, prayed for the success of the patriot cause; and when the fighting men went forth, exhorted them to take as much care to fear and serve God, as to pick their flints and keep their powder dry.

The border hostilities, the Revolution, and the later wars in which the people of Washington County took prominent part will be mentioned in detail in succeeding pages, with accounts of the boundary controversy, the Whiskey Insurrection, internal improvements, including the construction of the old National road, the railroads, the navigation of the Monongahela River, and numberless other historical matters relating to this county, among which none are of greater interest than those pertaining to that religious and educational development and progress which has placed Washington among the very foremost of the counties of Pennsylvania.

Location, Boundaries, and Topography.—With regard to its location and boundaries, Washington may properly be described as one of the westernmost range of counties of Pennsylvania, and the second one, reckoning northward, from the southwest corner of the State. It is joined on the north by Beaver County; on the northeast by Allegheny County; on the east by Allegheny, Westmoreland, and Fayette; on the south by Greene County, and on the west by the State of West Virginia.

The principal stream of the county is the Monongahela River, which takes its rise in West Virginia, crosses the State line into Pennsylvania at the extreme southeast corner of Greene County, and flowing thence in a meandering but generally northward course, marks the entire eastern boundary of Greene and Washington Counties against the counties of Fayette, Westmoreland, and Allegheny. From the northeastern limit of Washington County the river flows first in a northeasterly, and afterwards in a northwesterly course through Allegheny County to its confluence with the Allegheny River at Pittsburgh.

Besides the Monongahela, Washington County has a great number of smaller streams, but among these there are few that are of sufficient size and importance to deserve special mention. The North Fork of Ten-Mile Creek takes its rise in the southern part of this county, and flows in a general course a little south of east to its junction with the South Fork, which rises in Greene County. The North Fork marks the boundary line between Washington and Greene for a short distance above the confluence; and the main stream of Ten-Mile also marks the line between the two counties from the confluence to its mouth, where its waters join those of the Monongahela. North of Ten-Mile Creek, Pike Run, Pigeon Creek, Mingo Creek, and Peters Creek flow into the Monongahela from the eastern part of the county.

The head-streams or forks of Chartiers Creek take their rise in the central and southern parts of the county, and joining their waters form the main stream, which flows in a northeasterly course through the north part of Washington into and through Allegheny County to its junction with the Ohio a short distance below Pittsburgh. Raccoon Creek, King's Creek, and Harmon's Creek rise in the northwest part of the county and flow into the Ohio, the first named in a northerly, and the others in a general westerly course. Several forks of Wheeling Creek (which flows into the Ohio) rise in the southwest corner of Washington County, Hunter's Fork (of Wheeling) marking the boundary for several miles between Washington and Greene. Buffalo Creek and Cross Creek, which have their sources in the western part of Washington County, flow westward across the State line into West Virginia, and through the "Pan Handle" of that State into the Ohio River.

Bordering the Monongahela River are narrow bottom lands, seldom, if ever, over one-fourth of a mile in width, and generally much less, through this county. From these bottoms the "river hills" rise abruptly to a height of from two hundred to three hundred feet, and from their summits the country stretches away westward in fine rolling uplands, which in many parts may be called a succession of hills. The creeks—Chartiers, Ten-Mile, Pike, Pigeon, Mingo, Peters, Raccoon, King's, Harmon's, Cross, and Buffalo—all have nearly the same kind of country bordering their margins, viz., bottom lands (generally very narrow, those of Chartiers' being wider than any other), from which the country rises to the rolling uplands or hills. In the southwest part of the county there is very little bottom land along the creeks; the hills rise more abruptly, and the high lands are much more steep and rugged than elsewhere. In general through the county the hills are tillable to their tops. On them, as in the valleys, and river and creek bottoms, the soil is excellent for the production of grain and fruits. The county in general is excellent for grazing, and well adapted for all the requirements of agriculture.

A fine description of the natural features of Washington County is given below, being quoted from the "Memoirs of Alexander Campbell," by Robert Richardson. His observations commence at the county-seat, the site of which he describes as "near the sources of several streams, which run in different directions, as the Chartiers Creek, which flows towards the north; Ten-Mile Creek, which pursues an eastward course and falls into the Monongahela ten miles above Brownsville, whence its name; Buffalo, which directs a swift and clear current to the west-northwest and empties into the Ohio at Wellsburg, about twenty-eight miles distant. The town being thus near the summit-level of the streams, the hills around it are comparatively low, and the country gently undulating. As we follow the descending waters the hills and upland region, which in reality preserve pretty much the same level, seem gradually to become higher, so that by the time we approach the Ohio and Monongahela Rivers their sides, growing more and more precipitous, rise to a height of four or five hundred feet. These steep declivities inclose the fertile valleys, through which the larger streams wind in graceful curves. Into these wide valleys small rivulets pour their limpid waters, issuing at short intervals upon each side from deep ravines formed by steep hillsides, which closely approach each other, and down which the waters of the springs, with which the upland is abundantly supplied, fall from rock to rock in miniature cascades. Upon the upland not immediately bordering upon the streams, the country is rolling, having the same general elevation, above which, however, the summit of a hill occasionally lifts itself, as though to afford to lovers of beautiful landscapes most delightful views of a country covered for many miles with rich pasturages, with grazing herds or flocks, fruitful grain-fields or orchards, gardens, and farm-houses, while upon the steeper sides of the valleys still remain some of the ancient forest growths of oak and ash, walnut, hickory, and maple. Frequently as the traveler passes along the roads upon the upland he sees suddenly from some dividing ridge charming valleys stretching away for miles with their green meadows, rich fields of corn, and sparkling streamlets. At other times, as he advances, he admires with delight in the distance the ever-varying line of the horizon, which on all sides is formed by the summits of remote ridges and elevations, sometimes conical in form, but mostly defined by various arcs of circles, as regularly drawn as if a pair of compasses had traced the lines upon the sky. Everywhere around him he sees lands abounding in limestone and all the necessary elements of fertility, and producing upon even the highest summits abundant crops of all the cereal grains. To enhance the natural resources of this picturesque country its hills conceal immense deposits of bituminous coal, which the descending streams here and there expose, and which, along the sides of the valleys within five miles of Washington and thence to the Ohio River, are conveniently reached by level adits. Such, for nearly two hundred miles west of the Alleghenies, is the general character of this region, especially of that portion of it lying along the Monongahela and Ohio, a region whose healthfulness is not surpassed by that of any country in the world."

The Indian Occupation.—When the wilderness region west of the Alleghenies in Pennsylvania was first penetrated by English-speaking white men, they found it partially occupied by roving bands of Indians, whose principal permanent settlements were in the vicinity of the confluence of the Monongahela and Allegheny Rivers, and above and below that point on the latter stream and the Ohio, but who had, besides these, a few transient villages, or more properly camps, located at different points in the interior of the great hunting-ground. These Indian occupants were principally of the Delaware and Shawanese tribes or nations, but there were among them several colonized bands of Iroquois, or "Mingoes," as they were called. These represented the powerful Six Nations of New York, who were the de facto owners of this trans-Allegheny country, and who sent these bands with their chiefs to live among their vassals, the Delawares, in the same manner and for the same reason that the Romans of old planted colonies and posts at remote points in their tributary provinces.

The Delawares claimed that theirs was the most ancient of all the aboriginal nations, the "Lenni Lenape," or Original People. One of their traditions ran, that, ages before, their ancestors had lived in a far-off country to the west, beyond the mighty rivers and mountains, at a place where the salt waters constantly moved to and fro, and that in the belief that there existed away towards the rising sun a red man's paradise—a land of deer and salmon and beaver—they had left their far-away home and traveled on towards the east and south to find it, but that on their way they were harassed and attacked by enemies and scourged and divided by famine, so that it was not until after long and weary journeyings during hundreds of moons that they came at length to a broad and beautiful river (the Delaware), which forever ebbed and flowed, like the waters from whose shores they had come; and there, amidst a profusion of game and fish, they rested, and found that Indian elysium of which they had dreamed before they left their old homes in the land of the setting sun. At the present day there are enthusiastic searchers through the realms of aboriginal lore who, accepting the vague narrative as authentic, imagine that the red man came from Asia across the Behring Strait, through which they saw the tide constantly ebb and flow as mentioned in the tradition.

Certain it is that at the coming of the first Europeans to America, the Indians of the Lenni Lenape were found living in Eastern Pennsylvania and New Jersey, in the country drained by the river which the white men called Delaware, a name which they also gave to the nation of red men who inhabited its valley. Many years before that time the Delawares had been powerful and the terror of other Indian tribes, but they were afterwards subdued and humbled by the all-conquering Iroquois or Five Nations,[1] who reduced them to a state of semi-vassalage, and compelled them to acknowledge themselves women and not warriors. The Delawares, while not daring to deny this fact, endeavored to relieve themselves of the disgrace in the eyes of white men by an ingenious yet flimsy account to the effect that as the Indian nations were almost continually at war with each other it had become necessary to have some one of the tribes stand constantly in the attitude of peace-makers between them; that as it was proper that the bravest and most powerful nation should perform this office, it naturally fell to the Delawares, who were exceedingly unwilling to take it, but finally consented to do so for the general good. It was disgraceful for warriors to ask for peace; this had always been done by the women of the tribes, hence peace-makers were women, and the Delawares in accepting the position as such became, metaphorically, women and wearers of the petticoat.[2] The Delawares said that the Iroquois brought about this result by cunning speeches and artifice, because they dreaded their power and were anxious to render them powerless for harm, the Delawares only discovering the trick when it was too late for them to recede. Heckewelder and other Moravian writers gravely repeated this silly story for truth; but it is unquestionable that the Iroquois treated the Delawares with great contempt, as a subjugated people and vassals. At a treaty council held in Philadelphia[3] in July, 1742, a Six Nation chief named Cannassatego gave a most withering reproof to some Delawares who were present, in reference to the conduct of their nation in some of their transactions with the whites. He told them they were not warriors but women, and that they deserved to have their ears cut off for their behavior, and after a long and extremely abusive and contemptuous speech to them in the same strain, in which he told them their people must remove forthwith from the Delaware, that they could have no time to consider about it, but must go at once to the Susquehanna, but that considering their behavior he doubted whether they would be allowed to remain there, he handed them a string of wampum and continued, "You are to preserve this string in memory of what your uncles have this day given you in charge. We have now some other business to transact with our brethren [the English], therefore depart this council, and consider what has been said to you."

[1] The Iroquois confederation, at first embracing the Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas, Cayugas, and Senecas, was then called the Five Nations, but afterwards became the Six Nations by the addition of the Tuscaroras, who emigrated to the North upon being expelled from their earlier hunting-grounds in the Carolinas.

[2] At a time when a strong French force was reported to be on the upper Allegheny on its way to the Ohio, the Delawares living at the head of the latter river sent runners to the Six Nation council at Onondaga, with belts and a message, in which they said, "Uncles, the United Nations,—We expect to be killed by the French your father. We desire therefore that you will take off our Petticoat that we may fight for ourselves, our wives and children. In the condition we are in, you know we can do nothing."—Colonial Records, vi. 37.

[3] Col. Rec., iv. 580.

The humiliated Delaware chiefs dared not disobey this peremptory command. They left the council at once, and the last of their people removed immediately afterwards to Wyoming, where they remained only a short time, and then went to the West Branch of the Susquehanna, and from there a large part of them emigrated to the Ohio, whither a considerable number of their tribe had removed many years before, as early as 1725.[1]

The Shawanese, who were originally inhabitants of the country now embraced in Southern Georgia and Florida, were driven from that country by a hostile tribe,[2] and came to Pennsylvania about the year 1697, and removed from the Susquehanna to the head of the Ohio about 1728. An account of their coming and subsequent movements is found in the minutes of a treaty council held at Philadelphia with the chiefs of the Six Nations, Aug. 26, 1732. The Shawanese were then settled on the Ohio, and it was desired to induce them to remove back to the Susquehanna, to remove them from the influence of the French, who, as it was reported, had made their appearance on the Allegheny. The Governor of Pennsylvania proposed to the Six Nations to use their influence with the Shawanese to that effect, and on the occasion of the council referred to recited to the assembled chiefs as follows:

"They were told that the Shawanese, who were settled to the Southward, being made uneasy by their Neighbours, about Sixty Families of them came up to Conestogoe, about thirty-five years since, and desired leave of the Sasquehannah Indians who were planted there to settle on that River; that those Sasquehannah Indians applied to this Government that they might accordingly Settle, and they would become answerable for their good Behaviour. That our late Proprietor arriving soon after, the Chiefs of the Shawanese & of the Sasquehannahs came to Philadelphia & renewed their Application; that the Proprietor agreed to their Settlement, and the Shawanese thereupon came under the Protection of this Government; that from that time greater Numbers of the same Indians followed them and Settled on the Sasquehannah and Delaware; that as they had joyned themselves to the Sasquehannah Indians, who were dependent on the five Nations, they thereby also fell under their Protection. That we had held several treaties with those Shawanese, and from their first coming were accounted and treated as our own Indians; but that some of their young men having, between four and five years since, committed some Disorders, tho' we had fully made it up with them, yet, being afraid of the Six Nations, they had removed backwards to Ohio, and there had lately putt themselves under the Protection of the French, who had received them as their children. That we had sent a message to them to return, & to encourage them had laid out a large Tract of Land on the West of the Sasquehannah round the principal Town where they had last been settled, and we desired by all means that they would return thither."

But the Shawanese could not be induced to return to the lands which had been laid out for them "near Pextan, which should always be kept for them and their children for all time to come." In response to a message to that effect, four of their chiefs,—Opekethwa, Opakeita, Quassenungh, and Kataweykeita—went from the Ohio to Philadelphia, where they arrived on the 28th of September, 1732,[3] and after a council of three days' duration with the Governor, during which he used all his powers of persuasion to induce them to consent to the removal, "They answered

[2] Zeisberger, the Moravian, says, "The Shawanos, a warlike people, lived in Florida, but having been subdued in war by the Mosbkos, they left their land and moved to Susquehanna, and from one place to another. Meeting a strong party of Delawares, and relating to them their forlorn condition, they took them into their protection as grandchildren; the Shawanos called the Delaware nation their grandfather. They lived thereupon in the Forks of the Delaware, and settled for a time in Wyoming. When they had increased again they removed by degrees to the Allegheny." When they came from the East to the Ohio, they located at and near Montour's Island, below the confluence of the Allegheny and Monongahela. The Delawares came with them to the West, both tribes having been ordered away from the valleys of the Delaware and Susquehanna by the Iroquois, whom they were compelled by conquest to recognize as their masters.

Some writers have said that the Shawanese came from the country west of the Ohio to Pennsylvania, but this is shown to be a mistake by the language of Hetaquantagetchy, a Six Nation chief, at a council held at Philadelphia Sept. 10, 1735. He gave an account of the murder of one of the Iroquois Indians by a small band or tribe of the Shawanese who were then located on the Allegheny, and added, "That the tribe of Shawanese complained of is called Shaweygira, and consists of about thirty young men, ten old men, and several women and children; that it is supposed they are now returned to the place from whence they first came, which is below Carolina."

that the place where they are now settled Suits them much better than to live nearer; that they thought they did a Service to this Province in getting Skins for it in a place so far remote; that they can live much better there than they possibly can anywhere on Sasquehannah; that they are pleased, however, with the Land laid out for them, and desire that it may be secured to them." On the following day at a council held with the chiefs, "They were told there were Coats making for them, and other Cloaths,[1] with a Present, was providing; the Proprietor presented their Chief with a very fine gilt Gun, as a mark of respect for their Nation, and told them he would send a Surveyor to run Lines about the Land intended for them, and that none but themselves and Peter Chartiere should be allowed to live on it." The attempt to remove them eastward from the Ohio was relinquished, and they, with the Delawares, were found there when the first white men (other than a few traders) came to this region.

In 1748 the strength of the Delawares at the head of the Ohio was one hundred and sixty-five warriors; that of the Shawanese one hundred and sixty-two;[2] these figures being given by Conrad Weiser. Their chief settlement or village was Logstown[3] (called by the French Chinigue, or Chinique), which was then[4] located on the right bank of the Ohio, several miles below the mouth of the Allegheny, and where also was the residence of the Iroquois sachem, Tanacharison, called the Half-King, whose authority overshadowed that of the Delaware and Shawanese chiefs, because he represented the power of the dreaded Six Nations. The seat of the Delaware "king," however, was not at Logstown, but higher up, near the head of the Ohio, on its left bank. In the journal of Maj. George Washington's trip to the French forts on the Allegheny in the fall of 1753 he says, "About two miles from this [the confluence of the Allegheny and Monongahela], on the southeast side of the river, at the place where the Ohio Company intended to erect a fort [at or very near the mouth of Chartiers Creek], lives Shingiss, king of the Delawares. We called upon him to invite him to a council at Logstown." This same Shingiss, who was generally styled "king," was in some of the official communications of that day mentioned as the chief sachem of the Delawares; his brother, Pisquitomen, being also a high chief in the nation. The "king" of the Shawanese in 1753 was Nochecona.[5] In 1756, King Shingiss had removed his residence from the mouth of Chartiers Creek to "Old Kittaning" on the Allegheny, which was also a town of the Delawares. Maj. Edward Ward (who when an ensign, in command of a small force engaged in the spring of 1754 in building a fort at the confluence of the Allegheny and Monongahela, was compelled to surrender the work to the French, who then named it Fort Du Quesne) said,[6] "That in the year 1752, and before his surrender to the French, there was a small Village Inhabited by the Delawares on the South East side of the Allegheny River, in the neighborhood of that place [the mouth of the Allegheny], and that Old Kittaning, on the same side of the said River, was then Inhabited by the Delawares; that about one-third of the Shawanese Inhabited Loggs Town on the West Side of the Ohio, and tended corn on the East Side of the River, and the other part of the nation lived on the Scioto River."

From his stronghold at Kittaning, Shingiss led his Delaware warriors against the settlements east of the mountains in the fall of 1755, after the defeat of Braddock, and at that time and through all the year 1756 he carried desolation and massacre through all that country from the Potomac to the Delaware. He was one of the most implacable and ferocious of all the savage leaders. "Were his war exploits all on record," says Heckewelder, "they would form an interesting document, though a shocking one. Conococheago, Big Cove, Shearman's Valley, and other settlements along the frontier felt his strong arm sufficiently to know that he was a bloody warrior, cruel in his treatment, relentless in his fury. His person was small, but in point of courage, activity, and savage prowess he was said to have never been exceeded by any one." It appears that he was succeeded by Tomaqui, or "King Beaver," as the latter name is found mentioned as that of the head of the Delaware nation in and after 1758. And in a list of Indians

[1] The four chiefs received "each of them a blue Cloth Coat lined with Salloon, a Shirt, a Hatt, a pair of Stockings, Shoes and buckles. . . . And for a present to their Nation was ordered and delivered a piece of blue Strouds for blankets, one hundred weight of Powder, four hundred weight Bullets, ten gallons Rum, and two dozen Knives. And to John Wray, the interpreter who came down with them, five pounds." Two of the chiefs, however, were taken sick with smallpox and died in Philadelphia, where they were "buried in a handsome manner" by the orders of the Governor.

[2] Eleven years later (in 1759) George Croghan, deputy Indian agent under Sir William Johnson, in a report made to Gen. Stanwix of the numbers of the several Indian tribes in the West, gave the numbers of the Delawares and Shawanese (who prior to that time had removed westward from their first location on the Ohio) as follows:

"The Delawares residing on the Ohio, Beaver Creek, and other branches of the Ohio, and on the Susquehanna, their fighting men are 600." [A considerable number of the Delawares being still residing on the Susquehanna, and these not being included in Weiser's return of their strength in 1748.]

"The Shawanese on Scioto, a branch of Ohio, 400 miles below Pittsburgh, 300 warriors."

[3] When the Indians notified the French to quit the country in 1753 they said, "We have a fire at Logstown, where are the Delawares and Shawanese."—Colonial Records, v. 667.

[4] A later village also called Logstown was on the opposite side of the Ohio.

Logstown was "the first of the Indian towns on the road from Lancaster to Allegheny."—Col. Rec., viii. 289.

[6] In a "Deposition taken March 10, 1777, at the house of Mr. John Ormsby in Pittsburgh, etc., Agreeable to Notice given to Col. George Morgan, Agent for the Indiana Company, before James Wood and Charles Simms, pursuant to a resolution of the Honble, the Convention of Virginia, appointing them Commissioners for collecting Evidence on behalf of the Commonwealth of Virginia against the several Persons pretending to claim Lands within the Territory and Limits thereof under Deeds of Purchases from Indians."

present at a treaty council held at Fort Pitt on the 5th of July, 1759, Shingiss, George, and Kickeusking were named as "chiefs and captains," the first named having been deposed from his higher dignity, doubtless on account of his bloody record as an inveterate enemy of the English, who were then masters of the country.

In or about 1753 the Delawares and Shawanese who had previously lived at Logstown removed to Sacunk, or Salt Lick Town, which was located at the mouth of Beaver Creek; but in 1759 the Delawares had migrated from that place to Kuskusky, or Kuskuskees, which was some miles above Sacunk, on the Beaver. At a council held on the 25th of February in that year at Fort Pitt (which, as Fort Du Quesne, had been taken from the French by Gen. Forbes three months before), King Beaver, of the Delawares, said, "The Six nations and you [Col. Hugh Mercer, afterwards Gen. Mercer, who was killed at Princeton, Jan. 3, 1777] desired that I would sit down and smoke my pipe at Kuskusky. I tell you this that you may think no ill of my removing from Sacunk to Kuskusky, for it is at the great desire of my brothers, the English, and my uncles, the Six Nations; and there I shall always hear your words." From Kuskusky, Sacunk, and Kittaning the Delawares and Shawanese not long afterwards migrated to the Muskingum and Scioto.

The white traders were persons of no little consequence among the Indians. The French traders were here somewhat in advance of those of the English-speaking race, though the latter made their appearance among the Delawares and Shawanese soon after their settlement on the Allegheny and Ohio, certainly as early as 1730. The first French trader known to have been among the Indians on the Allegheny was James Le Tort, who probably came as early as 1720. One of the speakers of the Shawanese at a treaty council held in 1732 said that when they (the Shawanese) came over the mountains from "Patowmack" (about 1728), they met a French trader, who told them that the French Governor was exceedingly anxious to see them at Montreal, and that upon his advice they went there. This was doubtless the "French gentleman" whom the Indians called Cahictodo, and who was frequently mentioned in the proceedings of the Pennsylvania Council in 1731–32.

Peter Chartier, whose name was afterwards given to one of the principal streams flowing through the present county of Washington, went out from Philadelphia to the Allegheny at or very soon after the time when the Shawanese migrated there.[1] He was the son of a French glover who had been established in that business in Philadelphia,[2] and was himself French in all his sympathies and inclinations, though he went to the wilderness ostensibly as an English trader. It is told that he at one time had a trading-post on the Ohio at the mouth of the creek which still bears his name (where King Shingiss was also located, as before mentioned); but he also established himself at a Shawanese village situated on the Allegheny, about twenty miles above the site of Pittsburgh. This place became known as "Chartier's Old Town." In 1744 he had decided to boldly take the side of the French, who were using great efforts to secure the Indian trade; and on the 18th of April in that year he, with a large body of Shawanese whom he had induced to join him for the purpose, surprised and took prisoners two other traders on the Allegheny, robbing them of their entire stock of goods, amounting to sixteen hundred pounds. The names of these two traders were James Dinnew and Peter Tostee. For this and numerous other villanies Chartier was severely reprimanded and warned by Governor Thomas, of Pennsylvania, and this was his pretended excuse for joining the French interest, which he did at once, and on the 25th of April, 1745, the Governor announced the fact to the Provincial Council of Pennsylvania. During the same year Chartier persuaded the Shawanese at the Old Town to abandon their settlement at that place and remove to the Scioto. He was rewarded by a commission in the French service, but his subsequent career is not known.

In 1735, Abraham Wendall, a German trader, was living among the Indians on the Allegheny, this fact being mentioned by one of the Six Nation chiefs at a council held in Philadelphia on the 10th of September in that year. The chief also presented a letter from this Wendall, "written in low Dutch, giving information of some violence which had been committed by one of the tribes of the Shawanese." A very early English trader who lived with the Indians on the Allegheny was John Fraser, who was referred to in a letter dated Sept. 9, 1753,[3] written by Edward Shippen, as follows: "Weningo [Venango] is the name of an Indian town on Ohio [as the Allegheny was then often called], where Mr. Fraser has had a gunsmith-shop for many years; it is situate eighty miles up said river beyond Logs Town." In the summer of 1753, when the French came down the Allegheny in force to build the forts at Le Boeuf and Venango, Fraser was driven away from the latter place and came down the river. Soon afterwards he located on the Monongahela, where he had a trading-post.

George Croghan (afterwards deputy Indian agent)

[1] Chartier had before that time become possessed of a tract of six hundred acres of land, near the place from which the Shawanese removed, and mentioned as "near Pextan."

[2] On the 24th of February, 1707, a message "from the Queen of the Conestogoe Indians" was received by the Provincial Council of Pennsylvania, informing "that divers Europeans, namely, Mitchel (a Swiss), Peter Bazalion, James Le Tort, Martin Chartiere, the ffrench Glover of Philadelphia, ffrank, a young man of Canada who was lately taken up here, being all ffrenchmen, and one from Virginia, who also spoke ffrench, had seated themselves, and built Houses upon the branches of the Patowmack within this Gov'mt, and pretended that they were in search of some Mineral or ore."

came among the Ohio River Indians as a trader as early as 1748. Andrew Montour and Conrad Weiser (both afterwards trusted agents of the provincial government) came at about the same time. Hugh Crawford, John Gray, John Findley, David Hendricks, Aaron Price, Alexander McGinty, Jabez Evans, Jacob Evans, David Hendricks, William Powell, and Thomas Hyde were trading on the Allegheny, Monongahela, and Ohio in 1752, and the six last named were in 1753 taken prisoners on the Allegheny by the French and Indians and sent to Montreal. Besides the traders above named, there were several others (whose names are not known) in the region contiguous to the head of the Ohio between 1748 and 1754, when they were all driven out by the French. Their trading-places were principally on the Ohio and Allegheny Rivers, with Fraser's and a few others on the Monongahela below the mouth of the Youghiogheny, but none, as far as ascertained, on the smaller streams or in the interior.

There is nothing found either in written history or in tradition, to show that the section of country which now forms the county of Washington was ever the permanent home of any considerable number of Indians. These lands, like all those on the upper Ohio, the Allegheny, and the Monongahela, and eastward to the mountains, though claimed and partially occupied by the Delawares and Shawanese, were owned by their masters, the redoubtable Six Nations,[1] and by them regarded as merely a hunting-ground. At a meeting of the Council of Pennsylvania in August, 1753, "The Governor informed the Council . . . that he had seen Andrew Montour after his Return from Onondago, who told him that the Six Nations (as well as he, Mr. Montour, could learn from the Indians, though there were but few at home whilst he was at Onondago) were against both English and French building Forts and settling lands at Ohio, and desired they might both quit that country, and only send a few Traders with Goods sufficient to supply the wants of their Hunters; that they did not like the Virginians and Pennsylvanians making Treaties with these Indians, whom they called Hunters, and young and giddy Men and Children; that they were their Fathers, and if the English wanted anything from these childish People they must first speak to their Fathers."[2]

On another occasion (July 31, 1753) the Governor of Pennsylvania received by hand of Andrew Montour a message from the Six Nation chiefs, in which they said, "We thank you for the notice you are pleased to take of those Young Men [the Indians on the waters of the Ohio] and for your kind intentions towards them. They stand in need of your Advice, for they are a great way from us. We, on behalf of all the Indians, our Men, Women, Children, entreat you to give them good Advice. It is a hunting country they live in, and we would have it reserved for this use only, and desire that no Settlements may be made there, though you may trade there and so may the French. . . . We therefore heartily thank you for your Regards to us and our Hunters at Ohio, which we testify by A String of Wampum."

The Iroquois owners of the territory extending from the head of the Ohio to the Alleghenies merely permitted the Delawares and Shawanese to use it as a hunting-ground, yet they always boldly claimed these lands as their own, except when they were confronted

[1] The fact that the Six Nations were the acknowledged owners of this region of country, and that the Shawanese and Delawares were here only on sufferance, seems clear. At the treaty council held at Philadelphia, July 12, 1742 (Col. Rec., iv. p. 580), and which has been already mentioned, the Six Nation chief, Canassatego, after a severe reprimand to the Delawares for having presumed to claim and sell lands to the whites, in which he said, "Why did you take it upon you to sell lands at all? You are women! you know you are women, and can no more sell lands than women," continued, "After our just reproof and absolute order to depart from the land, you are to take notice of what we have further to say to you. This string of Wampum serves to forbid you, your children and grandchildren to the latest posterity, from ever meddling in land affairs; neither you nor any who shall descend from you are ever hereafter to presume to sell any land."

At the treaty held with the Indians at Fort Pitt, in May, 1768, a Shawanese chief complained bitterly to the English of their encroachments, and said, "We desired you to destroy your forts. . . . We also desired you not to go down the river." In the next day's council, Guyasutha, a chief of the Six Nations, rose with a copy of the treaty of 1764, and said, "By this treaty you had a right to build forts and trading-houses where you pleased, and to travel the road of peace from the sun rising to the sun setting. At that treaty the Delawares and Shawanese were with me and they know all this well, and they should never have spoken to you as they did yesterday." Soon after the Shawanese chief, Kissinaughta, rose and said, apologetically, to the English, "You desired us to speak from our hearts and tell you what gave us uneasiness of mind, and we did so. We are very sorry we should have said anything to give offense, and we acknowledge we were in the wrong."

In the same year (1768) when the Pennsylvania commissioners, Allen and Shippen, proposed to the Indians to send a deputation of chiefs with the white messengers, Frazer and Thompson, to warn off the white settlers who had located without authority on the Monongahela River and Redstone Creek, the "White Mingo" (whose "Castle" was on the west side of the Allegheny, a few miles above its mouth) and three other chiefs of the Six Nations were selected to go on that mission, but no notice was taken of the Delaware or Shawanese chiefs in the matter, which shows clearly enough that these two tribes were not regarded as having any ownership in the lands.

And it is related by George Croghan, in his account of a treaty council held with the Six Nations at Logstown in 1751, that "A Dunkard from Virginia came to town and requested leave to settle on the Yo-yo-gaine [Youghiogheny] River, a branch of the Ohio. He was told that he must apply to the Onondaga Council, and be recommended by the Governor of Pennsylvania." The Onondaga Council was held on a hill near the present site of Syracuse, N. Y., and the central headquarters of the Six Nations.

Another fact that shows the Six Nations to have been the recognized owners of this region of country is that when the surveyors were about to extend the Mason and Dixon line westward, in 1767, the proprietaries asked not of the Delawares and Shawanese but of the Iroquois (Six Nations) permission to do so. This permission was given by their chiefs, who also sent several of their warriors to accompany the surveying party. Their presence afforded to the white men the desired protection, and the Shawanese and Delawares dared not offer any molestation. But after the Iroquois escort left (as they did at a point on the Maryland line), the other Indians became, in the absence of their masters, so defiant and threatening that the surveyors were compelled to abandon the running of the line west of Dunkard Creek.

Finally, it was not from the Delawares and Shawanese but from the Six Nations that the Penns purchased this territory by the treaty of Fort Stanwix in 1768.

and rebuked by the chiefs of the Six Nations. At a conference held with the Indians at Fort Pitt in 1768, "the Beaver," a chief, speaking in behalf of the Delawares and Mohicans, said, "Brethren, the country lying between the river and the Allegheny Mountain has always been our hunting-ground, and the white people who have scattered themselves over it have by their hunting deprived us of the game which we look upon ourselves to have the only right to. . . ." Washington, in his journal of a trip which he made down the Ohio from the mouth of the Allegheny in 1770, says, "The Indians who reside upon the Ohio, the upper part of it at least, are composed of Shawanese, Delawares, and some of the Mingoes. . . ." And it is certain that, though the Iroquois were the owners of these hunting-grounds, they were occupied almost exclusively by the Delawares and Shawanese. From their towns and settlements in the vicinity of the head of the Ohio, went forth from time to time the hunting parties of these tribes, which formed the principal part of the Indian population of the territory of the present county of Washington, as their temporary camps were almost the only Indian settlements in all the region lying between the Monongahela and the Ohio.

On the Monongahela, at the mouth of Dunlap's Creek, where the town of Brownsville now stands, was the residence of old Nemacolin, who, as it appears, was a chief, but with very few, if any, warriors under him, though it is not unlikely that he had had a respectable following in the earlier years, before the whites found him here. It was this Indian who guided Col. Thomas Cresap across the Alleghenies in the first journey which he made to the West from Old Town, Md., for the Ohio Company in 1749. The route which they then pursued was known for many years as "Nemacolin's path." Later in his life this Indian removed from the Monongahela and located on the Ohio River. It is believed that the place to which he removed was the island now known as Blennerhassett's Island, in the Ohio, below Parkersburg, W. Va.; the reason for this belief being that there is found, in Gen. Richard Butler's journal of a trip down that river in 1785, with Col. James Monroe (afterwards President of the United States), to treat with the Miami Indians, mention of their passing, in the river between the mouths of the Little Kanawha and Hocking, an island called "Nemacolin's Island." This was, without much doubt, the later residence of the old chief of that name.

An old Indian named Bald Eagle, who had been a somewhat noted warrior (but not a chief) of the Delaware tribe, had his home somewhere on the Upper Monongahela, but at what point is not precisely known. He was a very harmless and peaceable man and friendly to the settlers, yet he was killed without cause about 1770, and the cold-blooded murder was charged by the Indians upon white men. Of the Bald Eagle and the circumstances of his death Veech says, "He was on intimate terms with the early settlers, with whom he hunted, fished, and visited. He was well known along our Monongahela border, up and down which he frequently passed in his canoe. Somewhere up the river, probably about the mouth of Cheat, he was killed, by whom or on what pretense is unknown.[1] His dead body, placed upright in his canoe, with a peace of corn-bread in his clinched teeth, was set adrift in the river." The canoe drifted ashore on the east side of the Monongahela, a short distance above the mouth of Ten-Mile Creek, where the wife of a settler recognized the old Indian and wondered that he did not leave his canoe. She examined more closely and found he was dead. This murder was regarded as a cold-blooded and unprovoked outrage by both Indians and whites.

It is said that the early settlers who came into what is now Washington County found here several Indian villages or camps; one of these being on Ten-Mile Creek, a short distance from the Monongahela, one on the Dutch Fork of Buffalo Creek, one on Raccoon Creek, in what is now Hanover township, and another on Mingo Creek. But this is only vague tradition, and it is by no means certain that any such ever existed at the places mentioned; and if they were there, it is not probable that they were anything more than temporary camps. The only Indian settlement of which there is any authentic account as having existed in Washington County was the one known all over Western Pennsylvania as Catfish Camp, located on ground that is within the limits of the present borough of Washington, on the small stream called by the Indians Wissameking, one of the branches of Chartiers Creek. This settlement, however, was not an Indian village, but merely for a time the residence or camp of the old Delaware, Tingooqua, or Catfish, who had been in his younger days a warrior (but not a chief) of that nation.[2] Mention of

[1] Withers, in his "Chronicles of Border Warfare," states the case differently, and gives the names of the murderers. He says, "The Bald Eagle was an Indian of notoriety, not only among his own nation, but also with the inhabitants of the Northwestern frontier, with whom he was in the habit of associating and hunting. In one of his visits among them he was discovered alone by Jacob Scott, William Hacker, and Elijah Runner, who, reckless of the consequences, murdered him, solely to gratify a most wanton thirst for Indian blood. After the commission of this most outrageous enormity, they seated him in the stern of a canoe, with a piece of journey-cake thrust into his mouth, and set him afloat in the Monongahela."

[2] In some accounts of this Indian he is mentioned as "a celebrated Indian Chief, whose Indian name was Tingoocqua, or Catfish, who belonged to the Kuskuskee tribe of Indians, and occupied the hunting-grounds between the Allegheny Mountains and the Ohio River." But from his own words at the treaty council, as quoted in the text, it appears clear that he was not a chief, for he says, "I am only a messenger," that is, the bearer of a message from the chiefs of his people. As to his having been a member of "the Kuskuskee tribe of Indians," it is proper to mention that Kuskuskes was a place or settlement, to which the Delawares had then recently removed from their older town of Sacunk at the mouth of Beaver. Of this new settlement of the Delawares Ch. Frederick Post said in July, 1758, "Kuskuskee is divided into four towns, each at a distance from the others, and the whole consists of about ninety houses and two hundred able warriors." That Kuskuskes was the name of the place where Catfish then came from, instead of being the name this Indian is found in the proceedings of a treaty council held in the State-House at Philadelphia, Dec. 4, 1759, on which there were present among others Tingooqua and Joshua, "messengers from the Ohio."

"Tingooqua, alias Catfish,[1] arose, and taking four strings of Wampum, held two of them in his Fingers separate, and spoke: 'Brother,—I have not much to say; I am only a messenger; I came from Kuskuskes; The Nation I belong to, as well as many others to the West of us, as far as the setting of the sun, have heard that you and Teedyuscung sat often together in council, and at length agreed upon a Peace; and We are glad to hear that the Friendship and Harmony which of old always subsisted between our and your ancestors was raised up again and established once more. This was very agreeable to us, and We came here to see if what was related was true; and we find it is true, which gives us great Satisfaction.'

"Then taking hold of the other two Strings he proceeded: 'Brother,—Now that Teedyuscung and you have, thro' the goodness of Providence, brought about a peace, we entreat you to be strong; don't let it slip; don't omit anything to render it quite secure and lasting; hold it fast; consider our aged Men and our young Children, and for their sakes be strong, and never rest till it be thoroughly confirmed. All the Indians at Allegheny desire you to do so, and they will do all they can likewise.' Gave a String of Wampum.

"'Brother,—We make eleven Nations on the West of Allegheny who have heard what you and Teedyuscung have concluded at the Treaty of Easton, and as we all heartily agree to it, and are determined to join in it, we have opened a Road to where Teedyuscung Lives, and we, the Messengers, have traveled much to our satisfaction on the Road which he has made from his habitation to this Town. We have found it a very good Road, and all our Nations will use this Road for the time to come. We say nothing of the Six Nations; We do not reckon them among the Eleven Nations. We leave you to treat with them yourselves. We make no Road for them; This is your own affair. We only tell you we do not include them in anything We say. I have done.' Gave four Strings of Wampum."

Neither the time when old Catfish withdrew from the main body of his tribe and took up his residence on the banks of Wissameking nor the duration of his stay at that place is known. He was found living there as early as 1770, and remained several years (making in that time two or three slight changes in the location of his camp or cabin), and afterwards migrated to the Scioto country, where he died. For many years after his removal the place where he had lived in this county continued to be occasionally mentioned as "Catfish's Camp," and the name is still well known at the present day.

Beyond the story of old Catfish, and the doubtful traditions already mentioned of the existence of a few Indian settlements within the present limits of Washington County, there is, with reference to that territory, no Indian history to be given for the years prior to the opening of "Dunmore's war," in 1774. From that time on through the border warfare that raged until after the close of the Revolution the annals of this region are full of stirring events,—Indian incursions, massacres, and alarms,—which are to be narrated in succeeding chapters covering the period from 1774 to 1783.

of his tribe or nation, is proved by his own words, given in the minutes of the treaty council referred to, viz.: "The messenger observing one Sarah Gladdin amongst the people that were present, addressed the Governor, and told him 'That he had in his house a son of this woman's, a prisoner, at Kuskuskes, and that he would take care he should be delivered in the spring.'" Kuskuskes, then the principal settlement of the Delawares, was at that time the home of Catfish, who was himself a Delaware.

CHAPTER II.

THE FRENCH AND ENGLISH CLAIMS TO THE TRANS-ALLEGHENY REGION—GEORGE WASHINGTON'S VISIT TO THE FRENCH FORTS IN 1753.

THE earliest written annals having reference to the region of country bordering the head-streams of the Ohio River date back to the year 1669, in which year the great French explorer, Robert Cavelier La Salle (having first obtained permission from the Governor-General of Canada), fitted out at his own expense an expedition having for its ultimate object the discovery and exploration of a great river (the Mississippi), which Indians reported to exist five hundred leagues westward from Montreal, and which was then supposed to flow into the Vermillion Sea, or Gulf of California. Setting out from La Chine, on the St. Lawrence, in July of the year named, he soon reached the western end of Lake Ontario, where he was taken ill with a fever, and during his sickness a part of his men deserted, which made it impracticable for him to continue by the route which he had originally decided on, which was through Lakes Erie, St. Clair, Huron, and Michigan to a point near the site of the present city of Chicago, and thence overland.

This plan of La Salle being thus frustrated by the loss of his men, he nevertheless determined not to give up the enterprise, and as soon as he had fully recovered he again started on his way with the remainder of his followers, crossed the Niagara River between the falls and Lake Erie, passed through the country of the Five Nations, found the Allegheny River, built canoes, embarked, and paddled down that stream to its confluence with the Monongahela, and thence down the Ohio to where they found its current broken by rapids, these being the same now known as the Falls of the Ohio, at Louisville, Ky. There his men positively refused to proceed farther down the river, and he was compelled to return, little thinking, probably, how near he had approached to the great river which it was the object of his journey to discover. Thirteen years later he reached it by a more northern route, passed down its swift current to the mouth, where, on the 9th of April, 1682, in full sight of the blue expanse of the Gulf of Mexico, he reared a cross, and a column inscribed with the name and arms of the French sovereign, and took possession for him of the valley of the Mississippi and a contiguous country of indefinite extent, which he named Louisiana, embracing, according to the French theory of possession, all the valley of the mighty stream and all the regions watered by its tributaries discovered and to be discovered in the future.

There is no doubt that La Salle and the party who came with him down the Allegheny in 1669 were the first Europeans who ever saw that stream, the Monongahela, or the Ohio. Very little is known of any white visitors who came after them to this region during the eighty years next succeeding, for there is no definite account of the presence in this section of country of any other people than the native Indians and occasionally a white trader until near the middle of the eighteenth century, at which time both France and England were asserting their respective claims to the dominion of this wilderness region west of the mountains. It was in the conflict which resulted from the attempts of each of these rivals to expel the other, and to enforce their own alleged rights by the fact of actual possession, that the events occurred that are here to be narrated, and which mark the beginning of the history of the southwestern counties of Pennsylvania.

The English claimed the country by virtue of a treaty made with the Six Nations at Lancaster in June, 1744, when the Indians ceded to the British king an immense scope of territory west of the royal grant to Penn,[1] co-extensive with the limits of Virginia, which at that time were of indefinite extent. At a subsequent treaty held (in 1752) at Logstown, on the Ohio, below Pittsburgh, one of the Iroquois chiefs, who had also taken part in the Lancaster treaty, declared that it had not been the intention of his people to convey to the English any lands west of the Alleghenies, but that, nevertheless, they would not oppose the white man's definition of the boundaries.

The Six Nations in council had also decided that, notwithstanding their friendship for the English, they would remain neutral in the contest which they saw was imminent between that nation and the French, both of which were now using every effort to strengthen themselves in the occupation of the territory bordering the head-waters of the Ohio.

The claim which France made to the ownership of the territory at the head of the Ohio was based on La Salle's discovery of the mouth of the Mississippi nearly seventy years before, and on the possession then taken for the French king of all the regions watered by that river and all its affluents. To fortify and confirm this claim they took measures to occupy the country bordering on the head-streams of the Ohio, and in this they were somewhat earlier, as well as more active and energetic, than the English.

The first mention found in any public document of the actual or probable presence of French people on any part of the territory of the province of Pennsylvania with intent to occupy the same under authority of their government is that which occurs in the records of a session of the Provincial Council[2] held at Philadelphia, Aug. 4, 1731. The message of the Governor which was on that occasion laid before the Council, and "being approved was ordered to be sent down to the House," concluded with these words:

"I have also another Affair of very great Importance to the Security of this Colony & all its Inhabitants to lay before you, which shall speedily be communicated to you," and

"The Governor then proceeded to inform the Board that the Matter mentioned in the close of the preceding Message related to Indian Affairs, & would be found to be likewise of very great Consequence to the whole Province, the Detail whereof His Honor said he would leave to Mr. Logan, to whom the Information had been first given, and who, from his long experience and knowledge in those affairs, could give the best Account of it.

"That Gentleman then producing the Map of Louisiana, as inserted in a book called a New General Atlas, published at London in the year 1721, first observed from thence how exorbitant the French Claims were on the Continent of America; that by the Description in the said Map they claimed a great part of Carolina and Virginia, & had laid down Sasquehannah as a Boundary of Pensilvania. Then he proceeded to observe that by Virtue of some Treaty, as they alledge, the French pretend a Right to all Lands lying on Rivers, of the Mouths of which they are possessed. That the River Ohio (a branch of Mississippi) comes close to those mountains which lye about 120 or 130 Miles back of Sasquehannah, within the boundaries of this Province, as granted by the King's Letters Patent; that adjoining thereto is a fine Tract of Land called Allegheny, on which several Shawanese Indians had seated themselves; And that by the Advices lately brought to him by several Traders in those parts it appears that the French have been using Endeavours to gain over those Indians to their interest, & for this End a French Gentleman had come amongst them some years since, sent, as it was believed, from the Governor of Montreal, and at his Departure last year carried with him some of the Shawanese Chiefs to that Governour, with whom they, at their Return, appeared to be highly pleased; That the same French Gentleman, with five or six others in Company with him, had this last Spring again come amongst the said Indians, and brought with him a Shawanese Interpreter, was well received by them, had again carried some of their Chiefs to the said Gov'r, & the better to gain the Affections of the said Indians brought with him a Gunsmith to work for them gratis. Mr. Logan then went on to represent how destructive this Attempt of the French, if attended with Success, may prove to the English Interest on this Continent, and how deeply in its consequences it may affect this Province, & after having spoken fully on these two heads, Moved that to prevent or putt a stop to these designs, if possible, a treaty should be sett on foot with the five Nations, who have an absolute authority as well over the Shawanese as all our Indians, that by their means the Shawanese may not only be kept firm to the English Interest, but likewise be induced to remove from Allegheny nearer to the English Settlements, and that such a treaty becomes now the more necessary because 'tis several years since any of those Nations have visited us, and no opportunity ought to be lost of cultivating & improving the Friendship which has always subsisted between this Government & them. . . ."

[1] It was supposed at that time that Penn's western boundary would not fall to the westward of the Laurel Hill.

In the following year, on the 25th of August, at a council held at Philadelphia with several chiefs of the Six Nations,[1] further information was gained concerning the movements of a certain Frenchman among the Shawanese on the Allegheny River. At this convention with the Six Nation chiefs, Hetaquantagetchty, the principal speaker, said, "That last Fall the French Interpreter, Cahictodo, came to Ohio River (or Alleganey) to build houses there, and to supply the Indians with goods, which they no sooner understood than they went out to forbid him, telling him that the lands on the Ohio belonged to the Six Nations, that the French had nothing to do with them, and advised him to go home; but he not regarding their advice proceeded, upon which they sent to the French Governour to complain, but their Messengers were not returned when they came from home. That they know nothing certainly of what passed between Cahictodo and the Shawanese at Ohio."

The speaker was then asked, "Were not the French angry with those People for passing them and bringing their Peltry to trade with the English, and did they not endeavour to hinder them?" To which he replied, "The French are angry, and not only endeavour to stop them, but threaten them, and some of those nations expect the French will fall on them; but they regard it not; they find better usage from the English, and will have no more dealings with the French."

[1] Colonial Records, vol. iii. pp. 439–40.

The Frenchman whom the Iroquois speaker called Cahichtodo was doubtless the same one who was mentioned in the proceedings of the Provincial Council in August of the previous year as above quoted; but it does not appear from the account that he came to the Allegheny in any other capacity than that of a trader desirous of furnishing the Shawanese with goods in exchange for their peltry.

The first attempt on the part of either government to enforce their claims by taking actual possession of the region west of the Alleghenies in what is now the State of Pennsylvania was made by the French in 1749, in which year the commandant-general of Canada sent out an expedition under command of Louis Bienville de Celeron, with orders to proceed to the head of the Ohio,[2] and thence down that stream, taking formal possession of its valley and the contiguous country; not, however, according to the English method, by establishing military posts and buildings and garrisoning forts, but by planting crosses and posts bearing devices representing the royal arms and insignia of France, and burying metallic plates duly inscribed with a record of the event, as evidences of actual occupation. The commander of the expedition performed the duty assigned to him, and in the manner indicated, erecting monuments and burying plates of lead at various points along the Allegheny and Ohio. Some of the Indians in the Seneca country (which embraced all the valley of the Upper Allegheny) obtained possession of one of these plates by some artifice (probably by digging it up after it had been buried by Celeron), and it was taken by a Cayuga sachem and delivered to Col. (afterwards Sir William) Johnson, as will be more fully mentioned hereafter. The plate was of lead, three-eighths of an inch in thickness, and about eleven by seven and one-half inches on the face, upon which was stamped and cut[3] in rude capitals the following inscription in old French, viz.:

L'AN 1740, DV REGNE DE LOVIS XV. ROY DE FRANCE NOVS CELERON COMMANDANT D VN DETACHMENT ENVOI PAR MONSIEVR LE MARQUIS DE LA GALISSONIERE COMMANDANT GENERAL DE LA NOUVELLE FRANCE POVR RETABLIR LA TRANQUIL-

[2] Meaning the head of the river since known as the Allegheny, which having been discovered by the French explorers many years before anything was known of the Monongahela, was in those early times regarded as the main stream. The Iroquois name of the Allegheny was O-hee-go, and the French adventurers who passed down its current to the present city of Pittsburgh rendered the name Ohio (or sometimes Oyo), in conformity with the orthography of their language. In the English the pronunciation only is changed. It was not the French alone who regarded the Allegheny as the main Ohio, for we find that Washington in his journal and dispatches mentioned Venango as being situated "on the Ohio." Another name which the French gave to the Ohio, and applied to the stream even to the head of the Allegheny, was "La Belle Rivière,"—The Beautiful River.

[3] The whole inscription was stamped except the date and place of interment. These were cut with a knife or other sharp instrument in spaces which had been left blank for the purpose. The name "Paul de Brosse" was stamped on the back of the plate.

The expedition, sent out by command of the Marquis de la Galissoniere, as indicated by the inscriptions on the plates, was composed of the commandant, De Celeron (who was a captain in the French service and a chevalier of the Order of St. Louis), the Rev. Father Bonnecamps, a Jesuit, who was chaplain, "mathematicien," navigator, and astronomer for the party, Messieurs Contrecœur, de Saussaye, Le Borgne, Philip and Chabert Joncaire,[2] and Coulon de Villiers (the last mentioned of whom, as also Contrecœur, afterwards took prominent parts in the campaigns against Washington and Braddock), two other officers and six cadets of the French service, twenty-four French soldiers, including petty officers and a gunsmith, fifty Indians of the Canadian tribes friendly to the French, and nearly two hundred voyageurs, who were to perform the severe labor of the expedition,—the paddling of the canoes, the transportation at the portages, and other kinds of heavy work. The detachment was abundantly supplied with arms, military equipments, and ammunition. The embarras of the campaign consisted of the necessary camp equipage, tools, and implements, leaden slabs to be buried at prominent points, provisions, and a large amount of merchandise intended for presents to the Indians of the Ohio Valley. A journal of the expedition was kept by Celeron. Father Bonnecamps also kept a journal, and made a map of the route, or what purported to be one, but which was very incorrect with regard to the rivers and smaller streams.

The officers and men of the expedition, having embarked in canoes, with their equipment and material, at La Chine, on the St. Lawrence, a few miles above Montreal, left the former place on the 15th of June, 1749, and proceeded up the great river to Lake Ontario, thence along the southern shore of that lake to Fort Niagara, where they arrived on the 6th of July. They made no halt here, but moved at once to the portage, and commenced the work of transporting their material and stores by land around the cataract. This labor occupied a week, and on the 13th they were again afloat on the waters of Niagara River above the rapids. From the river they entered Lake Erie, and pulled along its southeastern shore towards the landing-place of the portage over which they were to pass to reach the lake now called Chautauqua. Twice they were compelled by strong head winds to disembark and encamp on the shore, waiting for a favorable change of weather, but finally in the afternoon of the 16th they reached the landing-place, where the company disembarked, and the commander sent out two of his officers with a party of men to mark and clear the first part of the portage route.

They had heavy work before them,—to carry the canoes, laden with all their impedimenta, tons in weight, to be relaunched on the waters of an inland lake more than seven hundred feet higher than those of Erie,[3] and with an intervening ridge of fully two hundred feet additional altitude to be crossed in the portage of nearly ten miles in length. But it appears that Celeron took little account of the obstacles confronting him, and here, as at other stages of his long and difficult journey, he pushed on without hesitation and with remarkable energy. At dawn in the morning of the 17th he put his men in motion, and although the way was rugged, steep, and in many places apparently impassable, and a serious delay was caused by a heavy rain-storm, they traversed the portage, heavily laden as they were, in less than six full days, arriving on the shore of the highland lake on the 22d. It is not improbable that the small stream since known as Chautauqua Creek afforded them some little facility for water carriage, but if so it could only have been for a very small proportion of the distance between the two lakes.

At the end of the portage they halted a while to repair the canoes and give the wearied voyageurs an opportunity for a little rest after their fatiguing march from the shore of Lake Erie, but early in the day on the 23d the flotilla moved briskly on through the bright waters of Chautauqua, and in the same evening the men bivouacked on its shore within a league of the outlet through which the surplus waters of the lake flow to Conewango Creek, and with the current of the latter stream to the Allegheny. At this campground some of the Iroquois warriors of Celeron's party came on and reported that while fishing during the afternoon they had seen Indians, apparently scouts, watching the movements of the canoe fleet, and that these had immediately disappeared when they found they were discovered. This circumstance gave Celeron no little concern, and at the end of the next day's journey he convened a council, by which it was decided to send out an officer with a party of the Canadian Iroquois who accompanied the expedition, taking belts of wampum and some presents, to find the scouts who had caused the alarm, accompany them to their villages, and there use all means to conciliate the people and allay their fears with regard to the objects of the advancing French column. In accordance with this decision, a party of the Canadian Indians was sent out under command of one of the Joncaires, who, failing to find the scouts on the path, proceeded to the Indian village of Broken Straw (called by the French Paille Coupée), where, as it appears, he was known, as had also been his father (Chabert Joncaire) before him. There he made some friendly and conciliatory speeches, to which the Indians in turn replied in equally friendly terms, yet still remained distrustful of the French and of the objects of the expedition.

The progress made by Celeron's force on the 24th of July was small. Embarking in the morning of that day, they soon reached and entered the outlet-stream, but the water was so low that it was found necessary to lighten the canoes, and carry a part of their loads overland to the deeper water below, so that at night the canoes had not advanced more than two miles down the stream. During the five days next succeeding their progress was but little more rapid, on account of low water, shoals, and tortuous channel, so that it was not until midday of the 29th that they debouched into the broad current of the Allegheny, which they called La Belle Rivière.

At the place where Celeron entered the Allegheny from the Conewango, "at the foot of a red-oak on the south bank of the Ohio River, and opposite a little island at the confluence of the two rivers, Ohio and Kanaugon"[1] (Conewango), he buried one of his leaden plates in token of French occupation and dominion. The arms of the king of France were affixed to a tree near by the place, and the other ceremonies usual among the French when taking pretended possession of new countries in the name of their sovereign were observed on this occasion.

Every movement of the French was seen and noted by the Indian scouts who were constantly lurking along their flanks, and who, of course, knew the spot where Celeron buried the metallic tablet. It is therefore probable that the plate which was buried opposite the mouth of the Conewango on the 29th of July was afterwards disinterred by the Indians, and that it was the same which was carried by the Cayuga sachem to Col. Johnson. The principal reasons for supposing this to have been the case are, first, that the date on the tablet was the same as that on which Celeron buried the plate opposite the mouth of the Conewango, and, second, that the inscription is to the effect that it was buried on the bank of the Ohio (Allegheny) at its confluence with another stream, the only discrepancy being that the name of that other stream as cut upon the plate differs from that which Celeron in his journal gives to the Conewango. But this fact is by no means fatal to the supposition that the plate brought to Col. Johnson was the same which Celeron buried at that place, for at that time among the Indians a stream was frequently known by as many as four or five different names. The name of the stream in question (the Conewango) was spelled by Celeron in his journal in one place Kanaaiagon, and in another place Chanougon, while his "mathematicien," Bonnecamps, spelled it Kananouangon. It seems very reasonable to suppose that the stream down which the French came from the lake, Tchadakoin (Chautauqua), should have been called by them by the same name, and that they should have that name on the slab, with the date, at the time they buried it. There was an Indian village on the Conewango near its mouth called Kanaouagon, which the French visited after the ceremony of burying the plate. The Indian residents of this place called the stream and their village by the same name, which, as it appears, was then adopted by Celeron in place of the other name, Tchadakoin. But these are mere speculations, the facts can never be certainly known.

On the last day of July the expedition left the Indian settlement at the mouth of the Conewango and proceeded down the Allegheny, passing several Indian villages. At night the canoes were made fast to the shore, and the company encamped on the bank of the river, with sentinels regularly posted in accordance with military usage. This precaution was observed by Celeron during all the journey, partly, however, for the purpose of enforcing and preserving discipline among the reckless Canadian voyageurs. In the forenoon of the 3d of August they came to the mouth of the Rivière aux Bœufs, now known as French Creek, which enters the Allegheny from the northwest. Here they found a small Indian village, at which they made but a brief stop, and passed on down the river to a point about nine miles below, where the expeditionary forces landed, and a second plate was buried "on the south bank of the Ohio [Allegheny] River, four leagues below the river Aux Bœufs, opposite a bald mountain, and near a large stone on which are many figures rudely cut." The stone referred to was an immense bowlder, upon which, on the side facing the river, were some Indian hieroglyphics, which caused the savages to regard the rock with superstitious awe.[2]

[1] Description given in Celeron's Journal of the Expedition.

[2] This rock is described, and a view of it, including the hieroglyphics on its face, given in Schoolcraft's "Indian Tribes in the United States," vol. vi.

On the 4th of August the fleet of Celeron left the rock and moved on down the river. Two days later they passed a deserted Shawanese village called "Chartier's Old Town," where Peter Chartier had resided with the Indians some five years previously. Paddling on down the stream, they passed the site of the present city of Pittsburgh, but nothing is found to show that any plate was buried, or even a halt made there. On the 6th the expedition reached the old Indian village of Chiningue, or Logstown, some twelve miles below the mouth of the Monongahela. Here they found a great number of Indians of several different nations, and among them several English-speaking traders. This last-named fact roused the ire of Celeron, who promptly expelled the traders, warning them that if they dared to return they would do so at their peril; and by one of them he sent the following letter to Governor Hamilton of Pennsylvania, viz.:

"From our camp on La Belle Rivière, at an ancient village of Chaouanons, Aug. 6, 1749.

"SIR,—Having been sent with a detachment into these quarters by Monsieur the Marquis de la Galissoniere, commandant-general of New France, to reconcile among themselves certain savage nations who are ever at variance on account of the war just terminated, I have been much surprised to find some traders of your government in a country to which England never had any pretensions. It even appears that the same opinion is entertained in New England, since in many of the villages I have passed through the English who were trading there have mostly taken flight. Those whom I first fell in with, and by whom I write you, I have treated with all mildness possible, although I would have been justified in treating them as interlopers and men without design, their enterprise being contrary to the preliminaries of peace signed five months ago. I hope, sir, for the future you will carefully prohibit this trade, which is contrary to treaties, and give notice to your traders that they will expose themselves to great risks in returning to these countries, and that they must impute only to themselves the misfortunes they may meet with. I know that our commandant-general would be very sorry to have recourse to violence, but he has orders not to permit foreign traders in his government.

"I have the honor to be with great respect,

"Sir, your humble and obedient servant,

"CELERON."

Celeron found the Indians at Logstown wholly disinclined to form an alliance with the French or to yield the possession of the country to them, and they were too well disposed towards the English traders to relish their summary expulsion. The French commandant made a speech to them which they thought insulting, telling them that all the valley of the Beautiful River was owned by his master, the king of France; that Frenchmen would supply them with goods, and that none others would be permitted to do so; that he was then on his way down the river to reprimand the Wyandots and other Western Indians, and to whip them to their homes for having traded with the English. All this had the effect to incense the savages against the French. There were at Logstown a considerable number of Iroquois and Abenakis, and the dissatisfaction felt by these being communicated to their Canadian kinsmen who were with Celeron, caused them to refuse to go farther with the expedition. They returned to their homes in the north, passing up the Allegheny River, over the route by which the expedition came, and tearing off the copper plates blazoned with the royal arms of France from the trees to which they had been affixed by Celeron's orders. Whether they also dug up the leaden slabs which had been buried on the shores of the Allegheny is not known, but it is not unlikely that they did so.

On the voyage down the Ohio from Logstown (or Chiningue) Celeron caused plates to be buried at four different points, viz.: at Kanououara or Wheeling Creek, on the 13th of August; at the mouth of the river Muskingum,[1] on the 15th of the same month; at the mouth of Chinondaista (now known as the Great Kanawha), on the 18th; and at the mouth of the Big Miami, on the 31st of August. This was the end of Celeron's voyage down the Ohio. From this point the expedition passed up the Miami to the head of canoe navigation, then marched through the wilderness to the Miami of the Lake (now the Maumee), and floated down that stream to Lake Erie. Thence, by way of that lake, the Niagara River (portaging round the falls as before), Lake Ontario, and the St. Lawrence River, Celeron and his party returned to Montreal, where they arrived Nov. 10, 1749. In theory they had taken actual and permanent possession of the Upper Ohio Valley, and those of its tributaries (the lower river to the Gulf of Mexico being already in French occupation), but in fact they had accomplished nothing, for instead of securing the friendship and alliance of the Indians living on the Allegheny and Ohio Rivers, they had intensified the distrust and enmity of those savages. The Pennsylvania and Virginia traders, too, who had been driven away by Celeron returned to Logstown immediately after his departure,[2] and were made welcome by the Indians, who made haste to renew their assurances of undiminished friendship for their brethren, the English.

In reference to the expedition of Celeron and his planting of the leaden plates, intended as a memorial and proof of the French occupation of the valley of the Ohio River, some extracts are here given from the minutes of the Provincial Council of Pennsylvania,[3] viz.:

[1] The plates buried at the Muskingum and Kanawha were afterwards discovered, the former in the year 1798 by some boys who were bathing in the stream. Seeing a part of it protruding from the bank they dug it out, and knowing nothing of its historical value, cut off a part of it and melted the lead for bullets. The other part, however, was obtained from the boys by a gentleman, who sent it to Governor DeWitt Clinton, of New York, and it is still in existence in Boston, Mass. The plate which was buried at the mouth of the Kanawha was found in March, 1846, by a boy (a son of J. W. Beale, of Point Pleasant, Va.), who in playing along the river-bank saw the edge of the plate a few feet below the surface. It was dug out and preserved, with the inscription, entire.

[2] George Croghan, who was sent out by the Governor of Pennsylvania in August, 1749, with presents and belts to the Ohio Indians, reached Logstown soon after the French left, and in his report to the Governor he mentioned that "Monsieur Calderon with two hundred French soldiers" had left the village and gone down the river a short time previous to his arrival there.

"2d February, 1750.

"The Governor having received by the last Post a Letter from Governor Clinton [of New York] with some Papers relating to Indian Affairs, the same were read and sent to the Assembly, and are as follows:

"A Letter from Governor Clinton to Governor Hamilton.

"Sir,—Your Favour of the 22d instant I have received, and am glad that you are of the same opinion with me in relation to Indian Affairs. I send you a copy of an Inscription on a leaden Plate stolen from Jean Cœur [Joncaire] some months since in the Senecas' Country as he was going to the River Ohio, which plainly demonstrates the French Scheme by the exorbitant claims therein mentioned; also a copy of a Cajuga Sachim's Speech to Colo. Johnson, with his Reply, on the subject matter of the plate, which I hope will come time enough to communicate to your Assembly."

This letter of Governor Clinton was dated "Fort George, 29th January, 1750." The speech of the Cayuga sachem, who, with a number of other Indians of the Five Nations, was at the house of Col. Johnson, is given in the minutes, as follows:

"Brother Corlear and Warraghiyagee [Gray Eyes]. I am sent here by the Five Nations (with a Piece of writing which the Senecas, our Brethren, got by some Artifice from Jean Cœur) to you Earnestly beseeching you will let us know what it means, and, as we put all our confidence in you our Brother, hope you will explain it ingeniously to us. [The speaker here delivered the square leaden plate and a wampum belt, and proceeded.] I am ordered further to acquaint you that Jean Cœur, the French Interpreter, when on his Journey (this last summer) to Ohio River, Spoke thus to the Five Nations & Others in our Alliance:

"'Children,—Your Father [meaning the French Governor] having, out of a tender regard for you, considered the great difficulties you labour under by carrying your Goods, Canoes, &c., over the great Carrying Place of Niagara, has desired me to acquaint you that, in order to ease you all of so much trouble for the future, he is resolved to build a House at the other end of said carrying Place, which he will furnish with all necessaries requisite for your use. . . .' Jean Cœur also told us that he was now on his way to Ohio River, where he intended to stay three years, and desired some of Us to accompany him thither, which we refused; whereupon he answered he was much surprised at our not consenting to go with him, inasmuch as it was for our interest and ease he was sent thither to build a House there; also at the carrying place between said River Ohio and Lake Erie,[1] where all the Western Indians should be supplied with whatever Goods they may have occasion for, and not be at the trouble and loss of time of going so far to Market as usual [meaning Oswego]. After this he desired to know our opinion of the Affair and begged our consent to build in said Places. He gave us a large Belt of Wampum thereon desiring our answer, which we told him we would take some time to consider of."

To this speech Col. William Johnson replied, assuring the Cayuga sachem and his associates that he was always glad to see the Indians at his house, but particularly so on that occasion, as it gave him an opportunity of convincing them that their friends, the English, were worthy of their fullest confidence, while the French were and had always been their worst enemies. "But their scheme," added he, "now laid against you and yours (at a time when they are feeding you up with fine Promises of serving you in several Shapes) is worse than all the rest, as will appear by their own writing on this Plate.[2] This is an affair of the greatest Importance to you, as nothing less than all your Lands and best Hunting places are aimed at, with a view of secluding you entirely from us and the rest of your brethren, viz., the Philadelphians, Virginians, etc., who can always supply you with the necessaries of life at a much lower rate than the French ever did or could, and under whose protection you are and ever will be safer and better served in every respect than under the French. These and a hundred other substantial reasons I could give you to convince you that the French are your implacable enemies, but, as I told you before, the very Instrument you now brought me of their own writing is sufficient of itself to convince the world of their villanous designs; therefore I need not be at the trouble, so shall only desire that you and all other Nations in Alliance with you seriously consider your own Interest, and by no means submit to the impending danger which now threatens you, the only way to prevent which is to turn Jean Cœur away immediately from Ohio, and tell him that the French shall neither build there or at the carrying Place of Niagara, nor have a foot of land more from you. Brethren, what I now say I expect and insist upon it being taken notice of and sent to the Indians of the Ohio, that they may immediately know the vile designs of the French."

A belt of wampum was then presented, and the Indian speaker replied,—

"Brother Corlaer and Warraghiyagee, I have with great attention and Surprise heard you repeat the substance of that Devilish writing which I brought you, and also with pleasure noticed your just Remarks thereon, which really agree with my own sen-

[2] At this point in his speech to the Indians Col. Johnson translated to them the words upon the leaden plate. "I repeat here," he says, in his report of the conference, "the Substance of said writing, with some necessary additions, Giving a large Belt of Wampum to confirm what I said, which Belt, with the rest, are to be sent to all the nations as far as the Ohio River."

timents on it. I return you my most hearty thanks in the name of all the nations for your brotherly Love and cordial advice, which I promise you sincerely (by this belt of wampum) shall be communicated immediately and verbatim to the Five Nations by myself, and, moreover, shall see it forwarded from the Senecas' Castle with belts from each of our own Nations to the Indians at Ohio, to strengthen your desire, as I am thoroughly satisfied you have our interest at heart."

Information of the French expedition down the Allegheny and Ohio Rivers under Celeron having been promptly forwarded to England, considerable anxiety was felt there as to the effect it might have upon the Indian tribes; and the proprietaries of Pennsylvania wrote at once from London to Governor Hamilton a letter, which was received in January, 1750 (during a session of the Assembly), and from which an extract, having reference to the subject in question, is here given, viz.:

"The Account you give of a Party of French having come to Allegheny and laid claim to that Country, and the Tribes of Indians with whom we have lately entered into Treaty, a good deal alarms me; and I hear that Party is returned to Canada, threatening to return with a greater Force next year. I have communicated the French Commandant's Letter and Paper, with an account of the Affair, to the Duke of Bedford and Lord Halifax, and I think something should be done immediately, if it can by consent of the Indians, to take possession. This, I think, you should advise with the Council and Assembly about, as it is of great Import to the Trade of the Province to have a Settlement there, and an House a little more secure than an Indian Cabbin. I make no doubt the Indians would readily consent to such a Settlement; and if there is Stone and Lime in the neighborhood, I think an House with thick walls of Stone, with small Bastions, might be built at no very great Expence, as it is little matter how rough it is within-side; or a wall of that sort perhaps fifty feet square, with a small Log House in the middle of it, might perhaps do better. The command of this might be given to the principal Indian Trader, and he be obliged to keep Four or Six Men at it, who might serve him in it, and the House be a magazine for Goods. If something of this sort can be done, we shall be willing to be at the expence of four hundred Pounds Currency for the building of it, and of one hundred Pounds a Year for keeping some men with a few Arms and some Powder; this, with what the Assembly might be induced to give, will in some measure protect the Trade, and be a mark of Possession. However few the Men are, they should wear an uniform Dress, that though very small it may look Fort like."

But the Assembly did not favor the project. "During the course of this Session,[1] the Governor had several private Conferences with the Speaker and some of the principal Members of the House on the state of Indian Affairs, and was in hopes that the Proposal of the Proprietaries would have induced them to encourage him to order the Persons intrusted with the Delivery of the Present at Ohio [George Croghan and Andrew Montour] to make the Indians some overtures of this sort; but the Members appeared extremely averse to it, which obliged the Governor to desire Mr. Croghan to do no more than sound the Indians in a private manner, that he might know their Sentiments before he should do anything further in the matter, well knowing that unless the Assembly would go heartily into the Affair and make some Provision along with the Proprietaries for the maintenance of the Fort or Block House, and the People to be appointed for this service, it would be to no purpose to stir in it." He therefore did no more than lay before the Assembly the preceding extract from the proprietaries' letter, on which no action was taken.

During the year following that of Celeron's expedition the Frenchman Joncaire was again among the Indians on the Allegheny endeavoring to remove the ill feeling which Celeron's overbearing conduct had occasioned, and to secure for his countrymen the friendship and confidence of the savages. George Croghan (who, with the half-breed, Andrew Montour, had been sent to the Ohio by Governor Hamilton, of Pennsylvania, with presents to the Indians in that vicinity), in a letter dated "Logstown, on the Ohio, Dec. 16, 1750," said to the Governor,—

"Sir,—Yesterday Mr. Montour and I got to this town where we found thirty warriors of the Six Nations going to war against the Catawba Indians. They told us that they saw John Cœur [Joncaire] about one hundred and fifty miles up the river at an Indian town, where he intends to build a fort if he can get liberty from the Ohio Indians. He has five canoes loaded with goods, and is very generous in making presents to all the chiefs of the Indians he meets with. He has sent two messengers to this town, desiring the Indians here to go and meet him, and clear the road for him to come down the river, but they have so little respect for his message that they have not thought it worth while to send him an answer as yet."

Croghan was again among the Indians on the Ohio in the spring of 1751, and kept a journal of events which occurred during his stay. From that journal the following extracts are given as showing something of the movements of the French at that time, viz.:

"May 20.—Forty warriors of the Six Nations came to town [the Indian town of Chinique, otherwise called Logstown, located on the Ohio some miles below Pittsburgh] from the head of the Ohio with Mr. Joncœur and one Frenchman more in company."

"May 21.—Mr. Joncœur, the French interpreter, called a council with all the Indians then present in town, and made the following speech. [Here follows Joncaire's speech to the Indians, in which he told them he had come for an answer to the speech made to them by Celeron two years before, viz.: that Onontio, the Governor of Canada, desired them to turn away the English traders and deal wholly with the French. To this one of the Six Nation chiefs replied, saying that they would not turn the English away, but would continue to trade with them as long as they lived, and that if he, Joncaire, had anything to say, and was the man he pretended to be, he should 'say it to that man,' pointing to Croghan].”

“May 25.—I had a conference with Monsieur Joncœur; he desired I would excuse him, and not think hard of him for the speeches he made to the Indians requesting them to turn the English traders away and not to suffer them to trade, for it was the Governors of Canada who ordered him, and he was obliged to obey them, though he was very sensible which way the Indians would receive them, for he was sure the French would not accomplish their design with the Six Nations without it could be done by force, which he said he believed they would find to be as difficult as the method they had just tried, and would meet with the like success.”

There was probably at that time no other Frenchman who was so popular among the Indians as was this same Joncaire, yet he found it impossible to accomplish the object for which he came,—to draw the savages into alliance with the French, and procure the expulsion of the English-speaking traders,—and he was compelled to relinquish the design and retire up the Allegheny, after having recorded his protest, and re-notified Governor Hamilton, of Pennsylvania, of the French claims to the country in a letter of which the following is a translation:

“De Chinique (Logstown), June 6, 1751.

“Sir,—Monsieur the Marquis de la Galissoniere, Governor of the whole of New France, having honored me with his orders to watch that the English should make no treaty in the country of the Ohio, I have directed the traders of your government to withdraw. You cannot be ignorant, sir, that all the lands of this region have always belonged to the King of France, and that the English have no right to come here to trade. My superior has commanded me to apprise you of what I have done, in order that you may not affect ignorance of the reasons of it; and he has given me this order with so much the greater reason because it is now two years since Monsieur Celeron, by order of the Marquis of Galissoniere, then Commandant-General, warned many English who were trading with the Indians along the Ohio against so doing, and they promised him not to return to trade on the lands, as Monsieur Celeron wrote you.

(Signed) “Joncaire,
“Lieutenant of a Detachment of the Navy.”

In the year 1750 the “Ohio Company” (acting under an English charter and royal grant, obtained in 1749, sent its agent, Christopher Gist, to the Ohio River, to explore the country along that stream, with a view to its occupation and settlement. Under these instructions he viewed the country along the west bank of the river, from the mouth of the Allegheny southwestwardly to the Falls of the Ohio (opposite the present city of Louisville, Ky.), and in the following year (1751) he explored the other side of the stream down to the mouth of the Great Kanawha. In 1752 he was present, as agent of the “Ohio Company,” at the Logstown treaty, already mentioned, and took part, with Col. Joshua Fry and the two other commissioners of Virginia, in the proceedings with the chiefs of the Six Nations.

These and other movements on the part of those acting under authority of the British king caused the French to bestir themselves and move more energetically towards the occupation of the country west of the Alleghenies. Early in 1753 they began to move southward from Lake Ontario through the wilderness towards the Allegheny River, and on the 21st of May in that year intelligence was received that a party of one hundred and fifty French and Indians “had arrived at a carrying-place leading from the Niagara to the head of the Ohio.” On the same day, in the Provincial Council of Pennsylvania, “The Governor laid before the board several letters from Governor Clinton, inclosing accounts from Col. Johnson, and from the commanding officer at Oswego,[1] that a large Armament of French and Indians had passed by that Fort, destinated, as was suspected, for Ohio, in order to take Possession of that Country, and to build Forts on that River; whereupon he had dispatched Messengers to the Governors of Maryland and Virginia, and likewise Mr. West was sent to Sasquehannah, there to procure and send away two Messengers, one by Patowmack, and the other by Juniata to Ohio, to give the Indians notice of this, and to put them on their guard.”[2]

Information was also received by Andrew Montour, who had then just come in from the country of the Six Nations, to the effect “that he found the Indians not a little intimidated at the large armament of French and Indians which had gone by Oswego, on their way to Ohio, especially after hearing what was said by seven Indians who came into Council while he was present and declared they were sent by the Governor of Canada to inform their Council that the

“Oswego, May 15, 1753.

“Yesterday passed by here thirty odd French canoes, part of an Army going to Bell Riviere to make good their claim there; and by a Frenchman who passed this also yesterday, on his way to Cajocha, gave me the following account, which he said he learned from common Report in Canada, viz.: That the Army consisted of Six Thousand French, commanded by Monsieur Martin, who is ordered to Ohio to settle the Limits between us and them; that they lay claim on all the Lands on any of the Rivers or Creeks descending or terminating in the great Lake; that if he meet with any opposition, he is to make good his claim by Force of Arms, and to build Forts in such Places as he shall think most convenient to secure their Right; that one Fort is to be built at Kasaoosiyogo (a carrying Place), and another at Diouturogo; they are also to oblige all the English they meet with, whether Traders or others, to evacuate the Place, as they look upon all we possess now as their undoubted Right, which they mean to support by Force of Arms. . . .”

King of France, their Master, had raised a number of soldiers to chastise the Twightwees and drive away all the English traders from Ohio, and take those lands under their own care, because the Indians acted a foolish part, and had not Sense enough to take care of their own Lands. It is true, Mr. Montour said, they ordered those seven Indians to tell the Governor of Canada they would not suffer him to build Forts there, nor take possession of those Lands, nor drive away the English; that those Lands belonged to the Indians, and that neither French nor English should have anything to do with them; that the Indians were owners of the soil, and independent of both, and would keep the Lands in their own hands; but notwithstanding this answer, Mr. Montour said he saw plainly the Indians were frighted, and that there was a strong party for the French among the Indians, and the Senecas particularly were in their interest and countenanced the proceeding."

On the 25th of May further intelligence of the advance of the French towards the Allegheny was brought to Philadelphia by Michael Taafe and Robert Callender, Indian traders, who had just returned from the head of the Ohio. Callender reported that on the 7th of that month, when he was at Pine Creek, about twenty miles from the Indian village of Logstown, on the Ohio, in company with Capt. William Trent, of Virginia, George Croghan, and several other traders, they received a letter addressed to all the traders by John Fraser, also a trader, living at Weningo (Venango), about one hundred miles up the Allegheny, which letter informed them that he (Fraser) had received intelligence from the Mingo Indians "that there were then, and had been since March last, one hundred and fifty French and Indians at a carrying-place[1] which leads from Niagara to the heads of the Ohio, building canoes and making other preparations for the reception of a large body of French and Indians who were expected there every day with eight pieces of brass cannon and a large quantity of ammunition and provisions; that on the 8th of May they received full confirmation of the above account by two Indians who were sent by the Council at Onondaga to give the Ohio Indians notice of the preparations the French were making to attack them." When this intelligence came to the villages on the Ohio there was great excitement among the Indians, and one of the Mingoes at Logstown went to a Frenchman[2] who had been there for some time, told him of the news, and said that he (the Frenchman) had been amusing the Indians during the past winter with stories "as sweet as if his tongue was sweetened with sugar," but warned him that he should certainly be the first man to lose his scalp if his countrymen should make any attempt to attack the Indians or their friends, the English.

The French forces which had been seen passing through Lake Ontario and at the Chautauqua carrying-place moved by the same route which had been pursued by Celeron four years before to the Allegheny, and down that river to Weningo (Venango), where they at once proceeded to erect a stockade fort.

Another French force disembarked at a point farther west on Lake Erie, moved across the country to French Creek, then called La Rivière aux Bœufs, and built upon that stream the fort called by them Le Bœuf. Both these forts were finished before the end of September, that at Venango being completed as early as August, as is shown by the following extract from a letter written by John Fraser (the trader who had formerly been located at Venango, but was driven away from there by the French) to Mr. Young,[3] dated "Forks [present site of Pittsburgh], Aug. 27, 1753," viz.:

". . . Capt. Trent was here the night before last, and viewed the ground the fort is to be built upon, which they will begin in less than a month's time.[4] The money has been laid out for the building of it already, and the great guns are lying at Williamsburg, Va., ready to bring up.

"The French are daily deserting from the new Fort. One of them came here the other day with Capt. Trent; he has him along with him to Virginia; he has given the true Account of the Number of the French and all their Designs; there are exactly Twenty-Four Hundred of them in all; here is inclosed the Draught of the Fort the French built a little way the other side of Sugar Creek, not far from Weningo, where they have Eight Cannon. . . . [2] The person referred to, who was known among the Indians as "the White Frenchman," was Monsieur La Force, the same one who was with Jumonville when Col. Washington attacked and killed the latter near Fort Necessity, in May, 1754, and who in several accounts is mentioned as having been then in command of the French force. On this occasion he had come among the Indians at Logstown to secure their alliance with the French, and having failed to accomplish it had become abusive to them. In the Colonial Records, vol. vi. page 22, is given "A speech made by Monsieur La Force, the French Gentleman that was at Logs Town when Mr. Montour and I [George Croghan] left it, to the Six Nations there," viz.:

"Children,—I came here to know your minds, whether you intend to side with the English or not; and without asking you I am convinced that you have thrown away your fathers and taken to your brothers, the English. I tell you now that you have but a short time to see the Sun, for in twenty days you and your brothers the English shall all die!"

Whereupon the speaker of the Six Nations made him this reply,—

"Fathers,—You tell us in twenty days we and our Brethren the English must all die. I believe you speak true, that is, you intend to kill us if you can; but I tell you to be Strong and bring down your Soldiers, for We are ready to receive you in battle, but not in Peace. We are not afraid of you, and after an Engagement you will know who are the best Men, you or we."

[4] Referring to a fort which the Ohio Company were preparing to build at the confluence of the Monongahela and Allegheny.

It was not, however, commenced "in less than a month's time" from that date as told in the letter, but was commenced in the following February by the same Capt. Trent, and surrendered to the French before completion, as will be noticed hereafter. It then became the historic Fort Du Quesne.

Weningo was the White French Man that lived last Winter at Logs Town." This last named being the same one (La Force) before mentioned as having been threatened by the Indian with the loss of his scalp if his countrymen should make any attempt to attack the Indians or their English friends.

The alarm of the Indians at the head of the Ohio was very great when they heard of the building of the forts at Le Bœuf and Venango, and of the large French force which was gathered at the two posts. The old Half-King, Tanacharison (an Iroquois sachem living at Logstown, and representing the power of the Six Nations on the Ohio), immediately went up the Allegheny to remonstrate with the French commandant at Le Bœuf against the occupation of the country belonging to the Indians, but the French officer treated him very contemptuously, told him the country was owned by the king, his master, "and discharged him home, and told him he was an Old Woman, and that all his nation was in their [the French] Favour only him, and if he would not go home he would put him in Irons. He came home and told the English to go off the place, for fear they should be hurt, with Tears in his Eyes." And when other chiefs afterwards went up the river to warn the French to abandon their designs, the commandant treated them in much the same way in which he had treated the Half-King. "But this I will tell you," said he, "I am commanded to build four strong houses, viz.: at Weningo, Monongalio Forks, Logs Town, and Beaver Creek, and this I will do."[1]

On learning of the great alarm of the Indians at the Forks of the Ohio, and knowing them to be steadfast in their friendship for the English, Governor Dinwiddie, of Virginia, immediately sent them "One hundred Small Arms, Powder, Shot, and some Cloathing," to be placed in charge of Capt. William Trent, Christopher Gist, and Andrew Montour, "who were empowered to distribute them to the Indians as their Occasion and Behaviour should require." The Governor of Pennsylvania too, on receiving the intelligence conveyed in John Fraser's letter of August 27th (before quoted), laid the matter before the Assembly, who thereupon voted £800, to be placed in the Governor's hands, and expended by him at his discretion for the safety of the Indians and traders at the Forks of the Ohio, the confluence of the Allegheny and Monongahela.

The intelligence of the aggressive movements of the French caused the English home government to adopt more energetic measures than had previously been employed to meet and resist their advance into the Ohio River country. Among the official communications addressed by the Earl of Holderness, secretary of state, to the governors of the several American provinces was one to Governor Dinwiddie, of Virginia, containing directions concerning the French encroachments. The letter of the secretary was sent by a government ship, and reached Dinwiddie in October, 1753. In pursuance of the instructions contained, the Governor appointed and commissioned[2] GEORGE WASHINGTON, then a youth of only twenty-one years, but one of the adjutants-general of the military forces of Virginia, as bearer of dispatches to the commanding officer of the intruding French on the Ohio;[3] charged, also, with the duty of ascertaining the numbers and equipment of the French forces there, what forts, if any, they had erected, and various other items of military intelligence, which are made clear in his letter of instructions, of which the following is a copy:

"Whereas, I have received information of a body of French forces being assembled in a hostile manner on the river Ohio, intending by force of arms to erect certain forts on the said river within this territory, and contrary to the dignity and peace of our sovereign, the King of Great Britain,

"These are therefore to require and direct you, the said George Washington, forthwith to repair to Logstown, on the said river Ohio, and, having there informed yourself where the said French forces have posted themselves, thereupon to proceed to such place, and, being there arrived, to present your credentials, together with my letter, to the chief commanding officer, and in the name of his Britannic Majesty to demand an answer thereto.

"On your arrival at Logstown you are to address yourself to the Half-King, to Monacatoocha, and the other sachems of the Six Nations, acquainting them with your orders to visit and deliver my letter to the French commanding officer, and desiring the said chiefs to appoint you a sufficient number of their warriors to be your safeguard as near the French as you may desire, and to wait your further direction.

"You are diligently to inquire into the numbers and force of the French on the Obio and the adjacent country; how they are likely to be

[1] Colonial Records, v. 667.

[2] Following is a copy of the commission:

"TO GEORGE WASHINGTON, ESQUIRE, ONE OF THE ADJUTANTS-GENERAL OF THE TROOPS AND FORCES IN THE COLONY OF VIRGINIA.

"I, reposing especial trust and confidence in the ability, conduct, and fidelity of you, the said GEORGE WASHINGTON, have appointed you my express messenger; and you are hereby authorized and empowered to proceed hence with all convenient and possible dispatch to the part or place on the river Ohio where the French have lately erected a fort or forts, or where the commandant of the French forces resides, in order to deliver my letter and message to him; and after waiting not exceeding one week for an answer, you are to take your leave and return immediately back.

"To this commission I have set my hand and caused the great seal of this dominion to be affixed, at the city of Williamsburg, the seat of my government, this 30th day of October, in the twenty-seventh year of the reign of his Majesty George the Second, king of Great Britain, &c., &c., annoque Domini 1753. ROBERT DINWIDDIE."

And the following was the tenor of the Governor's passport:

"To all to whom these presents may come or concern, greeting:

"Whereas, I have appointed George Washington, Esquire, by commission under the great seal, my express messenger to the commandant of the French forces on the river Ohio, and as he is charged with business of great importance to his Majesty and this dominion,

"I do hereby command all his Majesty's subjects, and particularly require all in alliance and amity with the crown of Great Britain, and all others to whom this passport may come, agreeably to the law of nations, to be aiding and assisting as a safeguard to the said George Washington and his attendants in his present passage to and from the river Ohio, as aforesaid. ROBERT DINWIDDIE."

[3] He had previously sent Capt. William Trent on a similar errand. In a letter to the Lords of Trade he said, "My last to you was on the 16th of June, to which I beg you to be referred. . . . The person sent as a commissioner to the commandant of the French forces neglected his duty, and went no farther than Logstown on the Ohio. He reports the French were then one hundred and fifty miles farther up the river, and I believe was afraid to go to them."

assisted from Canada; and what are the difficulties and conveniences of that communication, and the time required for it.

"You are to take care to be truly informed what forts the French have erected, and where; how they are garrisoned and appointed, and what is their distance from each other, and from Logstown; and from the best intelligence you can procure, you are to learn what gave occasion to this expedition of the French; how they are likely to be supported, and what their pretensions are.

"When the French commandant has given you the required and necessary dispatches, you are to desire of him a proper guard to protect you as far on your return as you may judge for your safety against any straggling Indians or hunters that may be ignorant of your character and molest you. Wishing you good success in your negotiation, and safe and speedy return, I am, &c.

"ROBERT DINWIDDIE.

"WILLIAMSBURG, 30 October, 1753."

On the day of his appointment Washington left Williamsburg, and on the 31st reached Fredericksburg, Va., where he employed Jacob Van Braam as a French interpreter. The two then went to Alexandria, where some necessary purchases were made. Thence they proceeded to Winchester, where pack-horses were purchased; after which they rode to Wills' Creek (Cumberland, Md.), arriving there on the 14th of November. "Here," said Washington in his journal of the tour, "I engaged Mr. Gist[1] to pilot us out, and also hired four others as servitors,—Barnaby Currin and John McQuire, Indian traders, Henry Steward, and William Jenkins; and in company with these persons left the inhabitants the next day."

The party, now including seven persons, moved from Wills' Creek in a northwesterly direction, and proceeded by way of Gist's place[2] to Fraser's, on the Monongahela at the mouth of Turtle Creek. They had found the traveling through the wilderness so difficult that the journey to this point from Wills' Creek occupied a week. Referring to this part of the route the journal says, "The excessive rains and vast quantities of snow which have fallen prevented our reaching Mr. Fraser's, an Indian trader, at the mouth of Turtle Creek, on Monongahela River, till Thursday, the 22d. We were informed here that expresses had been sent a few days before to the traders down the river, to acquaint them with the French general's death, and the return of the major part of the French army into winter-quarters. The waters were quite impassable without swimming our horses, which obliged us to get the loan of a canoe from Fraser, and to send Barnaby Currin and Henry Steward down the Monongahela with our baggage to meet us at the Forks of the Ohio."

Crossing the Allegheny, Washington found Shingiss, the Delaware king, who accompanied the party to Logstown, which they reached in twenty-five days from Williamsburg. On their arrival they found the Indian Monakatoocha, but the Half-King was absent, hunting. Washington told the former, through his Indian interpreter, John Davidson, that he had come as a messenger to the French general, and was ordered to call and inform the sachems of the Six Nations of the fact. The Half-King[3] was sent for by runners, and at about three o'clock in the afternoon of the 25th he came in, and visited Washington in his tent, where, through the interpreter, Davidson, he told him that it was a long way to the headquarters of the French commandant on the Allegheny. "He told me," says the journal, "that the nearest and levelest way was now impassable by reason of many large miry savannahs; that we must be obliged to go by Venango, and should not get to the near fort in less than five or six nights' sleep, good traveling." He told Washington that he must wait until a proper guard of Indians could be furnished him. "The people whom I have ordered in," said he, "are not yet come, and cannot until the third night from this; until which time, brother, I must beg you to stay. I intend to send the guard of Mingoes, Shannoahs, and Delawares, that our brothers may see the love and loyalty we bear them."

Washington was anxious to reach his destination at the earliest possible time, but, in deference to the wishes of the friendly Tanacharison, he remained until the 30th of November, when, as it is recorded in the journal, "We set out about nine o'clock with the Half-King, Jeskakake, White Thunder, and the Hunter, and traveled on the road to Venango, where we arrived the 4th of December, without anything remarkable happening but a continued series of bad weather. This is an old Indian town, situated at the mouth of French Creek, on Ohio, and lies near north about sixty miles from Logstown, but more than seventy the way we were obliged to go."

On the 7th the party set out from Venango for the French fort, and reached it on the 11th, having been greatly impeded "by excessive rains, snows, and bad traveling through many mires and swamps." On the 12th, Washington waited on the commander (M. Legardeur de St. Pierre,[4] a Knight of St. Louis), acquainted him with the business on which he came, and in the afternoon exhibited his commission, and delivered the letter from Governor Dinwiddie. While it was being translated he employed his time in taking the dimensions of the fort and making other observations with which he was charged. In the evening of the 14th he received the answer of the commandant to the Governor; but although he was now ready to set out on his return, he could not get away until the second day after that, as the French,

[1] Christopher Gist, agent of the "Ohio Company," who, a few months previously—in 1753—had located and built a cabin near the centre of the territory of the present county of Fayette, at the place now known as Mount Braddock.

[2] "According to the best observation I could make," said Washington in his journal, "Mr. Gist's new settlement (which we passed by) bears about west-northwest seventy miles from Wills' Creek."

[3] Tanacharison, the Half-King, was and always continued to be a firm and steadfast friend of the English, but he lived less than a year from the time when Washington met him at Logstown. His death occurred at Harrisburg, Pa. (then Harris' Ferry), in October, 1754.

[4] This was not the same commandant who had previously abused the Half-King and called him an "Old Woman," that officer having died about two months before.

although treating him with the greatest outward show of politeness, were using every artifice with his Indians to seduce them from their allegiance and friendship to the English, and were constantly plying them with brandy, which made the Indians loth to leave the place. Washington could not well go without them, and even if he could have done so, he would have been very unwilling to leave them behind him, subject to the dangerous influence of the French officers and French brandy.

Finally, on the 16th, he induced the Half-King and other Indians to leave, and set out from the fort for Venango, which was reached on the 22d. There the chiefs were determined to remain for a time, and therefore Washington's party was compelled to proceed without them, accompanied only by the Indian, Young Hunter, whom the Half-King had ordered to go with them as a guide. The journal of Washington narrates the events of this stage of the journey as follows: "Our horses were now so weak and feeble, and the baggage so heavy (as we were obliged to provide all the necessaries which the journey would require), that we doubted much their performing it. Therefore, myself and the others, except the drivers, who were obliged to ride, gave up our horses for packs to assist along with the baggage. I put myself in an Indian walking-dress, and continued with them three days, until I found there was no probability of their getting home in reasonable time. The horses became less able to travel every day, the cold increased very fast, and the roads were becoming much worse by a deep snow, continually freezing; therefore, as I was uneasy to get back to make report of my proceedings to his Honor, the Governor, I determined to prosecute my journey the nearest way through the woods on foot. Accordingly I left Mr. Van Braam in charge of our baggage, with money and directions to provide necessaries from place to place for themselves and horses, and to make the most convenient dispatch in traveling. I took my necessary papers, pulled off my clothes, and tied myself up in a watch-coat. Then, with gun in hand and pack on my back, in which were my papers and provisions, I set out with Mr. Gist, fitted in the same manner, on Wednesday, the 26th."

On the following day the two travelers fell in with a party of French Indians,[1] one of whom fired on them, but fortunately missed. They took the fellow in custody, and kept him with them till nine o'clock at night, when they let him go, and they continued on their way, walking all night, to be out of reach of pursuit. On the next evening at dark they reached the Allegheny just above Shannapin's town. In crossing the river on an improvised craft, Washington was thrown off into the icy current, where the water was ten feet deep, but saved himself by catching at the logs of the raft. They were then obliged to land on an island, and to pass the night there, but in the morning found the river sufficiently frozen to enable them to cross in safety on the ice to the left bank of the river. They suffered severely from cold and exposure, and Gist had his fingers and toes frozen, but they finally succeeded in reaching Fraser's, at the mouth of Turtle Creek, on the Monongahela, in the evening of the 30th of December.

The journal proceeds: "As we intended to take horses here (at Fraser's), and it required some time to find them, I went up about three miles, to the mouth of the Youghiogany, to visit Queen Alliquippa, who had expressed great concern that we passed her in going to the fort. I made her a present of a watch-coat and a bottle of rum, which latter was thought much the better present of the two. Tuesday, the 1st of January, we left Mr. Fraser's house, and arrived at Mr. Gist's, at Monongahela, the 2d, where I bought a horse and saddle." From Gist's Washington proceeded on his return journey, and, without experiencing any notable incident or adventure (except meeting a party bound for the Forks of the Ohio for the purpose of building a fort there, as will hereafter be noticed), reached Williamsburg on the 16th of January, 1754, and delivered the letter of the French commandant to Governor Dinwiddie.

The preceding narrative of the journeying of Governor Dinwiddie's young envoy to and from the French fort "Le Bœuf" is given in these pages at considerable length, less on account of the importance of the events and incidents related than because it has reference to the first appearance of George Washington in the territory west of the Alleghenies, which he afterwards frequently visited, and became largely interested in as a property-owner. Within this territory is the spot which has become historic as his first battle-ground, and here were first disclosed his highest military abilities, in the wild and disordered retreat of Braddock's army from the field of disaster on the Monongahela.

[1] Gist, however, in his diary, does not mention any party of Indians, but only the one who fired on them. He says, "We rose early in the morning and set out about two o'clock, and got to the Murderingtown, on the southeast fork of Beaver Creek. Here we met an Indian whom I thought I had seen at Joncaire's, at Venango, when on our journey up to the French fort. This fellow called me by my Indian name, and pretended to be glad to see me. I thought very ill of the fellow, but did not care to let the Major (Washington) know I mistrusted him. But he soon mistrusted him as much as I did. . . . It was very light and snow was on the ground. The Indian made a stop and turned about. The Major saw him point his gun at us, and he fired. Said the Major, 'Are you shot?' 'No,' said I, upon which the Indian ran forward to a big standing white-oak, and began loading his gun, but we were soon with him. I would have killed him, but the Major would not suffer me. We let him charge his gun. We found he put in a ball, then we took care of him."

CHAPTER III.

FRENCH OCCUPATION AT THE HEAD OF THE OHIO —WASHINGTON'S CAMPAIGN OF 1754.

THE result of Washington's expedition was to show beyond all doubt that the design of the French was to occupy in force all the country bordering the headwaters of the Ohio River. Thereupon Governor Dinwiddie transmitted Washington's statement to England, and meanwhile, without waiting for instructions from the home government, commenced preparations for raising a force to be sent to the "Forks of the Ohio" (Pittsburgh), to take possession of that point, and to construct a defensive work to enable them to hold the position against the French. A party had already gone forward from Virginia across the mountains for the same purpose, it being the one alluded to in Washington's journal of the trip to Le Bœuf, where he says, "The 6th [of January, on his return from Gist's to Wills' Creek] we met seventeen horses loaded with materials and stores for a fort at the fork of the Ohio, and the day after, some families going out to settle."

The first military force that moved westward having the Ohio River for its objective-point was a company under Capt. William Trent, which marched from Virginia in January, 1754. From Wills' Creek Capt. Trent moved his force of about thirty-three men[1] over the same route which Washington had traversed to Gist's settlement. From Gist's he marched to the Monongahela, at the mouth of Redstone Creek, where his men were for a time employed in erecting a store-house (called the "Hangard") for the Ohio Company. After completing it they continued their march to the site of the present city of Pittsburgh, which place they reached on the 17th of February, and there met Christopher Gist and several others. They immediately commenced work in the construction of the fort, preparation for which had been begun in the previous August, as has been shown by Fraser's letter of that date. But at that time it was the Ohio Company who proposed to do it; now it was to be done under direction of the government of Virginia.

Not long after the commencement of the work, Capt. Trent returned by way of the Hangard and Gist's to Wills' Creek, and Lieut. Fraser went to his home on the Monongahela, at the mouth of Turtle Creek, leaving the other commissioned officer, Ensign Ward, in charge of the men engaged in the construction of the fort.

The work progressed slowly (on account of the severity of the weather) for about two months, when suddenly, on the 17th of April, Ensign Ward found himself confronted by a hostile force of about seven hundred French and Indians, having with them eighteen light pieces of artillery. This force, which had come down the Allegheny River in sixty bateaux and a great number of canoes, was under command of Capt. Contrecœur, who at once demanded a surrender of the work and position. The responsibility lay wholly with Ward, as he was the only commissioned officer with the force; but the Half-King, Tanacharison, who was present, and firm as ever in his loyalty to the English, advised the ensign to reply to Contrecœur that as he was not an officer of rank, and had no authority to answer the demand, he hoped that the French commander would wait until the arrival of his superior officer, whom he would at once send for. But Contrecœur refused to accede to this, and demanded immediate surrender, saying that, in case of non-compliance, he would immediately take possession by force of arms.

It was of course impracticable for this ensign's command of about thirty-three men to hold the position against a force of more than twenty times their number, with artillery; and, therefore, the unfinished fort was surrendered[2] without further parley. The French

[1] That the strength of Trent's company did not exceed thirty-three men is stated in the deposition (elsewhere given in this work) of Ensign (afterwards Major) Ward, the officer in command when the company and the fort which they were building at the head of the Ohio were surrendered to the French about two months later. There appears no reason to doubt Ward's statement, as he was certainly in a position to know the facts; and it is difficult to reconcile it with what is found in a letter addressed by Governor Dinwiddie, of Virginia, to Governor Hamilton, of Pennsylvania, dated Williamsburg, March 21, 1754, and also in a letter from George Croghan to Governor Hamilton, dated March 23, 1754. In the letter first referred to Dinwiddie says, ". . . In January I commissioned William Trent to raise one hundred men; he had got seventy and has begun a fort at the forks of the Monongalio." And Croghan (who had then just returned east from the Ohio) said in his letter, "Mr. Trent had received a commission from the Governor of Virginia, and had enlisted about seventy men before I left Ohio. I left him and his men at the mouth of Monongalio building a fort, which seemed to give the Indians great pleasure and put them in high spirits" (Colonial Records, vi. page 21). Perhaps Croghan included soldiers and laborers, while Ward had reference only to the former. There seems to be no other explanation of the discrepancy in the statements.

[2] The following from the "Calendar of Virginia State Papers and other Manuscripts, 1652 to 1781, preserved in the capitol at Richmond; arranged and edited by William Palmer, M.D., under authority of the Legislature of Virginia, vol. i., 1876," gives authentic information as to Captain Trent's operations at the head of the Ohio, and the surrender of the partially constructed fort by Ensign Ward to the French commander, viz.:

"Deposition taken March 10, 1777, at the house of Mr. John Ormsby, in Pittsburgh, &c. Agreeable to Notice given to Col. George Morgan, Agent for the Indiana Company, before James Wood and Charles Simms, pursuant to a resolution of the Hon^ble the Convention of Virginia appointing them Commissioners for Collecting Evidence on behalf of the Commonwealth of Virginia against the several Persons pretending to claim Lands within the Territory and Limits thereof, under Deeds of Purchases from Indians.

"Major Edward Ward Deposeth and saith that in the beginning of the year 1754, William Trent Esquire was appointed by Governor Dinwiddie of Virginia, Captain of a Company to be raised, of which this Deponent was appointed Ensign, by the said Trent. Who assembled the Chiefs and Deputies of the Six Nations, and requested of them permission to Erect a Trading House at the Junction of the Allegheny and Monongahale Rivers, to carry on a Free and open Trade with the Six Nations, and their dependants; which was granted by the said deputies, with this restriction, that he was to form no Settlements or improvements on the said Land, but on the Contrary to Evacuate the same when required by the Six Nations.

"After which the said Capt. Trent inlisted a number of men not exceeding thirty-three, and proceeded to erect a Fort at the place before mentioned. That on the 17th of April following, and before the Fort commander received Ensign Ward with great politeness, invited him to supper that evening, and entertained him for the night. On the morning of the 18th, Ward took his departure, marched his men up the valley of the Monongahela, and on the 19th arrived at the mouth of Redstone Creek. From that point he pushed on by way of Gist's, and thence to the Great Crossings of the Youghiogheny, and arrived at Wills' Creek on the 22d of April. The fort which Ward had been compelled to surrender to Contrecœur was completed by the French force with all practicable dispatch, and named "Fort Du Quesne" in honor of the Marquis Du Quesne, the French Governor-General of Canada.

While the events already related were in progress, troops, intended for the occupation of the "Forks of the Ohio," were being raised and organized under the authority of Governor Dinwiddie, in Virginia, and the first detachment of these was sent forward under command of Lieut.-Col. George Washington, who, on the 31st of March, had received from the Governor a commission (dated March 15th) of that grade, in the Virginia regiment of which Col. Joshua Fry was the commanding officer, with orders to take the troops then quartered in Alexandria, and to march them to the Ohio, "there to help Capt. Trent to build forts, and to defend the possessions of his Majesty against the attempts and hostilities of the French."

The detachment thus ordered forward under Washington consisted of two companies of infantry, commanded respectively by Capt. Peter Hogg and Lieut. James Van Braam.[1] Besides the commanding officer and the two company commandants, the force consisted of "five subalterns, two sergeants, six corporals, one drummer, and one hundred and twenty soldiers, one surgeon,[2] and one Swedish gentleman, who was a volunteer."

On Tuesday, the 2d of April, at noon, the force marched out of Alexandria with two wagons, and camped that night six miles from the town. From that time nothing of note occurred in fifteen days' marching, except that the detachment was joined by a small company under Capt. Stephen,[3] bringing the total strength of the command up to about one hundred and fifty men.

Washington kept no regular journal on the expedition, but he made hasty notes of many occurrences; which notes were captured by the French at the battle of the Monongahela in 1755, and were by them preserved and published, though Washington said afterwards that they had distorted parts of them. One memorandum, dated April 19th, is to this effect: "Met an express who had letters from Capt. Trent, at the Ohio,[4] demanding a reinforcement with all speed, as he hourly expected a body of eight hundred French.[5] I tarried at Job Pearsall's for the arrival of the troops, where they came the next day. When I received the above express, I dispatched a courier to Col. Fry, to give him notice of it.

"The 20th.—Came down to Col. Cresap's [Old Town, Md.] to order the detachment, and on my route had notice that the fort was taken by the French. That news was confirmed by Mr. Ward, the ensign of Capt. Trent, who had been obliged to surrender to a body of one thousand French and upwards,[6] under command of Capt. Contrecœur, who was come down from Venango with sixty bateaux and three hundred canoes, and who, having planted eighteen pieces of cannon against the fort, afterwards had sent him a summons to depart."

Ensign Ward, as before mentioned, arrived at Wills' Creek on the 22d. Washington, on receiving Ward's account of the surrender of the fort to the French, convened a council of war at Wills' Creek to determine on the proper course to be pursued in this exigency. The council was held on the 23d, and decided "that it would be proper to advance as far as Red-was nearly completed, this Deponent, who commanded in the absence of Capt. Trent, was put to the necessity of surrendering the possession to a Superior number of Troops, commanded by a French Officer, who demanded it in the name of the King of France; at which time the Half-King, and a number of the Six Nations in the English Interests were present. This deponent further saith that in the year 1752, and before his surrender to the French, there was a small Village, Inhabited by the Delawares, on the South East side of the Allegheny River, in the neighborhood of that place, and that old Kittanning, on the same side of the said River, was then Inhabited by the Delawares; that about one-third of the Shawanese Inhabited Loggs Town on the West Side of the Ohio, and tended Corn on the East Side of the River—and the other part of the nation lived on the Scioto River. That the Deputies of the Six Nations after the surrender Joined the Virginia Forces, Commanded by Colonel George Washington, who was then on his march at the Little Meadows, and continued with him in the service of Virginia till after the defeat of Monsieur La Force and a party of French Troops under his Command. And the deponent further saith that subsequent to the defeat of Colo. Washington at the great Meadows, the Shawanese, Delawares, and many of the Western Tribes of Indians, and an inconsiderable number of Renegades of the Seneca Tribe, one of the Six Nations, joined the French, and Prosecuted a War against the Frontiers of the States of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, till the conclusion of the Peace with the Indians in the year 1759, but that he ever understood that the Body of the Six Nations continued the firm Friends of the English. . . ."

[2] Dr. James Craik, afterwards the family physician of Washington, and his intimate and life-long friend.

[3] Afterwards Gen. Stephen, of the Revolutionary army, under Washington.

[4] Capt. Trent appears to have attempted to conceal the fact that he had absented himself from his command at the Forks of the Ohio, leaving Ensign Ward in charge, an offense for which he was severely censured by Governor Dinwiddie, who, on discovering it, proposed to have him court-martialed for it.

[5] Reinforcements had gone on about that time from Canada to the French on the Allegheny. On the 27th of March the commanding officer at Oswego (Lieut. Holland) had sent notice that "an Indian from Cataraqui had seen a few days before four hundred French on their way to the Ohio, and understood that two hundred more were to follow." Information was also brought to Philadelphia by Conrad Weiser from the Ohio that the Six Nations had sent word of three columns of French passing Lake Ontario on their way to the Ohio, the first column having four hundred men, the second three hundred, and the third four hundred, and that more were to come.

[6] Ward overestimated the numbers of Contrecœur's force, as it was very natural that he should do under the circumstances.

stone Creek, on Monongahela, about thirty-seven miles on this side of the fort, and there to raise a fortification, clearing a road broad enough to pass with all our artillery and baggage, and there to wait for fresh orders." The reasons for this decision were, "First, That the mouth of Redstone is the first convenient place on the river Monongahela. Second, That stores are already built at that place for the provisions of the company, wherein our ammunition may be laid up; our great guns may be also sent by water whenever we should think it convenient to attack the fort. Third, We may easily (having all these conveniences) preserve our people from the ill consequences of inaction, and encourage the Indians, our allies, to remain in our interests." When the council had arrived at this decision, Ensign Ward was sent forward to acquaint Governor Dinwiddie with the facts as well as to make his own report, taking with him an interpreter, and one of the young Indians, while another Indian runner was sent to the Half-King, at the Ohio, to notify him of the projected advance of the Virginians.[1] "I thought it proper also," said Washington, "to acquaint the Governors of Maryland and Pennsylvania of the news."

After a few brief preparations Washington's forces moved out on the path leading to the Great Crossings of the Youghiogheny, cutting out the road as they proceeded; so that it was not until the 9th of May that they reached the Little Crossings (Castleman's River). While they were at this place (May 11th) Washington sent out a reconnoitring party of twenty-five men, under command of Capt. Stephen and Ensign Peyronie, with orders to scout along the line of advance, as far as Gist's place, "to inquire where La Force[2] and his party were; and in case they were in the neighborhood, to cease pursuing, and take care of themselves;" and, also, "to examine closely all the woods round about," and if any straggling Frenchman should be found away from the others, to capture, and bring him in to be examined for information. "We were exceedingly desirous," said Washington, "to know if there was any possibility of sending down anything by water, as also to find out some convenient place about the mouth of Redstone Creek, where we could build a fort."

Washington's force left the Little Crossings May 12th, and on the same day he received, by courier, letters informing him that Col. Fry was at Winchester with upwards of one hundred men, and would start in a few days to join the advance detachment; also that Col. Innis was on the way with three hundred and fifty Carolinians. On the 16th the column met two traders, who said they were fleeing for fear of the French, parties of whom had been seen near Gist's. These traders told Washington that they believed it to be impossible to clear a road over which wagons or artillery-pieces could be taken to the mouth of Redstone Creek. On the 17th, Ensign Ward rejoined Washington, having come from Williamsburg, with a letter from the Governor, notifying him that Capt. Mackay, with an independent company of one hundred men, exclusive of officers, was on the way, and that he might expect them at any day. Two Indians came in from "the Ohio" the same evening, and reported that the French at Fort Du Quesne were expecting reinforcements sufficient to make their total force sixteen hundred men. Washington reached the Youghiogheny on the 18th, and remained there five days. On the 24th, at two o'clock in the afternoon, his force arrived at the Great Meadows, in what is now Fayette County. In the morning of that day, when the column was a few miles southeast of the Meadows, two Indian runners came in from the Ohio with a message from the Half-King saying that "the French army" was already on the march from Fort Du Quesne to meet the advancing force of Washington, and also notifying him that Tanacharison and the other chiefs would soon be with him to hold a council, as Washington had requested in the dispatch sent to him from Wills' Creek.

On the same afternoon that the troops arrived at the Great Meadows, a trader came in saying that he had come from Gist's, where the evening before he had seen two Frenchmen; he also knew that a strong French force was in the vicinity of Stewart's Crossings on the Youghiogheny. This report confirmed the news received from the Half-King, and thereupon Washington decided to remain for a time at the Meadows, and avail himself of the advantage offered by the position. There were here, as he said in his notes, "two natural intrenchments," which he caused to be strengthened to some extent artificially, and within these slight defenses he placed a part of the troops with the wagons. The troops worked two or three days in strengthening the position, and on the 27th of May Washington wrote, "We have with nature's assistance made a good intrenchment, and by clearing the bushes out of the meadows prepared a charming field for an encounter." Probably he never afterwards used so unmilitary an adjective in describing the construction and surroundings of a fortification.

On the 25th several small detachments were sent out from the camp with orders to reconnoitre the road[3] and the Indian trails, to examine the woods and every part of the country thoroughly, "and endeavor to get some news of the French, of their forces, and of their motions." But these parties returned in the evening of the same day without having made any discoveries.

[1] The Half-King had sent by some of his Indians to Washington, at Wills' Creek, an address or speech with belts of wampum. To that speech Washington now sent back by the runner a written reply, assuring him of the friendship and gratitude of the English, and that they were moving towards the Ohio in force, and clearing a road for a much larger army with great guns. He also requested the Half-King to come up and meet him on the way, to assist him by his wise counsel. To this request Tanacharison responded by meeting Washington between the Youghiogheny and Gist's, as will be seen.

[2] La Force was a Frenchman, who had been sent out from Fort Du Quesne about the 1st of May with a small party of French and Indians, ostensibly for the purpose of capturing deserters; but Washington, who had received information from an Indian runner sent by the Half-King, believed they had other purposes in view, and therefore ordered the reconnoissance.

[3] That is, the path which had been slightly cleared by Capt. Trent and the Ohio Company's party in the previous winter.

Early on the morning of the 27th, Christopher Gist arrived from his plantation, and reported that at about noon on the preceding day a French detachment of about fifty men had visited his house and committed considerable depredation there. He also said he had seen their tracks within five miles of the Virginians' camp. On receipt of this information, Washington sent out a detachment of seventy-five men under Capt. Hogg, Lieut. Mercer, and Ensign Peyronie in search of the French force. Information had already been received that a party of Indians, under the friendly Half-King, had come up the Monongahela, and was probably not very far from the Great Meadows. On the evening of the 27th, an Indian messenger from Tanacharison came to Washington with the information that the Half-King—whose camp, he said, was only six miles away—had seen the tracks of two Frenchmen, which he followed stealthily, and had thereby discovered the French party encamped in a rocky ravine, secluded, and difficult of access, and situated about half a mile from the trail.[1]

On receiving this intelligence, Washington was suspicious that the secret movements of the French were part of a stratagem to draw some of his forces away from the camp and then attack it. He therefore ordered the ammunition to be placed in a safe position, under a guard strong enough to prevent it from capture in case of attack, and then set out immediately, with the rest of his men,[2] for the camp of the Half-King. The night was rainy and very dark; the path over which they traveled was narrow, rough, and hard to distinguish; but they persevered, and in the morning at a little before sunrise reached the Half-King's camp, where, at a council held with the old sachem, it was determined to proceed at once to attack the French camp.

The party whose movements had been reported by Gist and others was the "French army," of whose departure from Fort Du Quesne Washington had been apprised. In some historical accounts of the campaign it has been stated that it was under command of M. La Force, but this was not the case; it was commanded by M. de Jumonville,[3] a French ensign, who was accompanied by La Force, but the latter was simply a volunteer, and held no military command in the expedition. Afterwards the French authorities and writers claimed that Jumonville himself was not engaged in a military enterprise, but that he was merely an envoy or bearer of dispatches, charged by the commandant at Fort Du Quesne with the duty of delivering a communication to the commanding officer of the English force, and that the military party which accompanied him was acting simply as his guard while performing this service. But if it was simply a guard to a peaceful envoy, then certainly its leader adopted a very strange course in lurking near Washington's encampment for two days, and hiding his men in an obscure and gloomy glen among rocks and brushwood.

It having been determined to attack Jumonville's party, Washington's men and Tanacharison's Indians left the headquarters of the latter, and marched "Indian file" to near the French camp, where a line was formed, with the English on the right and the Indians on the left, and in this order the combined forces moved to the attack. It was not a complete surprise, for the French discovered their assailants before they were within rifle-range. The right, under Washington, opened fire, and received that of the French. The conflict lasted only about a quarter of an hour,

[1] "On the 27th of May the Half-King sent Col. Washington Notice that a Party from the French Army was hankering about his Camp; if he would march some of his People to join them, he did not doubt of cutting them off. Col. Washington marched that Night and came up to the Indians; one of the Indian Runners tracked the French Men's Feet and came up to their Lodgment; they discovered our People about one hundred yards distant, flew to their Arms, and a small Engagement ensued. We lost one Man and another wounded; the French had Twelve killed and Twenty-one taken Prisoners, who are now in our Prison; the Indians scalped many of the dead French, took up the Hatchet against them, sent their Scalps and a String of black Wampum to several other Tribes of Indians, with a desire that they should also take up the Hatchet against the French, which I hope they have done.—Letter of Gov. Dinwiddie to Gov. Hamilton, of Pennsylvania, dated June 21, 1854.—Colonial Records, vi. p. 55.

[2] Most accounts have it that the force which Washington took with him on that night consisted of only forty men; but the language of his notes, though not entirely clear, indicate that the number left to guard the ammunition was about forty, and that the remainder of his force accompanied him on the expedition.

[3] Following is a translation of the orders given by M. de Contrecœur to Jumonville for this expedition:

"Be it known that the captain of a company belonging to the detachment of marines, commander-in-chief at the Ohio Fort Du Quesne, Prequ' Isle, and Rivière aux Bœufs, hath given orders to M. de Jumonville, an ensign of the troops, to depart immediately, with one officer, three cadets, one volunteer [La Force], one English interpreter, and twenty-eight men, to go up as far as the High Lands, and to make what discovery he can; he shall keep along the river Monongahela in Periaguas as far as the Hangard, after which he shall march along until he finds the road which leads to that said to have been cleared by the English. As the Indians give out that the English are on their march to attack us (which we cannot believe, since we are at peace), should M. de Jumonville, contrary to our expectations, hear of any attempt intended to be made by the English on the lands belonging to the French King, he shall immediately go to them and deliver them the summons we have given him. We further charge him to dispatch a speedy messenger to us before the summons be read, to acquaint us of all the discoveries he hath made, of the day he intends to read them the summons, and also to bring us an answer from them, with all possible diligence, after it is read.

"If M. de Jumonville should hear that the English intend to go on the other side of the Great Mountain [the Alleghenies] he shall not pass the High Lands, for we would not disturb them in the least, being desirous to keep up that union which exists between the two crowns.

"We charge M. de Jumonville to stand upon his guard against every attempt, either from the English or the Indians. If he should meet any Indians, he shall tell them he is traveling about to see what is transacting on the King's territories, and to take notice of every road, and shall show them friendship. Done at the camp at Fort Du Quesne, the 23d of May, 1754. (Signed) CONTRECŒUR."

when the French surrendered. Their loss was ten killed and one wounded. Among the killed was M. de Jumonville.[1] All the dead men were scalped by Tanacharison's Indians. Washington's loss was one man killed and two wounded.

The prisoners, twenty-one in number (among whom were La Force, M. Drouillard, and two cadets), were marched to the Half-King's camp, and thence to the Great Meadows. Two days later they were sent to Winchester, Va., with a guard of twenty men, under command of Lieut. West, who was also accompanied by Mr. Spindorph.

On the 30th, Washington "began to raise a fort with small palisadoes, fearing that when the French should hear the news of that defeat we might be attacked by considerable forces." The defenses which his men had constructed at the Great Meadows camp prior to this probably consisted of parapets, formed of logs (laid horizontally) and earth, along the crests of the "two natural intrenchments," which have already been mentioned, and the discovery of which at the Great Meadows, together with the advantage of a small stream that flowed near them, seems to have been a principal reason for his selecting that place as a site for his fortified camp and temporary base of operations.

The little stockade which Washington built after the fight at Jumonville's camp was evidently a very slight and primitive affair, for on the 2d of June it was completed, and religious services were held in it. In the previous evening the Half-King had arrived, bringing with him some twenty-five or thirty families of Indians, who had fled from the lower Monongahela and the neighborhood of Logstown for fear of the vengeance of the French. The fugitive party numbered between eighty and one hundred persons, including women and children. Among them was "Queen" Alliquippa and her son. Her heart had evidently been touched in its tenderest chord by Washington's present of a bottle of rum to her in the preceding December, and now she came to place herself under his protection, and she doubtless had visions of future favors from him. But the presence of these refugees was very embarrassing to the young commander on account of prospective scarcity of provisions, and for many other reasons, and the inconvenience was afterwards increased by the arrival of other parties of non-combatant Indians. One of these was a party of Shawanese, who came to the fort on the 2d of June, and others came in on the 5th and 6th. Washington wished to be disencumbered of these hangers-on, and tried to have a rendezvous of friendly Indians established at the mouth of the Redstone Creek, but did not succeed in effecting his purpose.

On the 6th of June, Christopher Gist arrived from Wills' Creek, with information that Col. Fry, commanding officer of the Virginia regiment, had died at that place on the 30th of May while on his way to the Great Meadows with troops. By his death Washington succeeded to the command of the regiment. On the 9th, Maj. Muse arrived from Wills' Creek with the remainder of the regiment and nine small swivel-guns, with ammunition for them. But although the last of the regiment had now arrived, the total force under Washington was but little more than three hundred men, in six companies, commanded respectively by Capts. Stephen, Jacob Van Braam, Robert Strobo, Peter Hogg, Andrew Lewis,[2] Polson, and George Mercer. Among the subalterns were Lieuts. John Mercer and Waggoner, and Ensigns Peyronie and Tower. Maj. Muse, as a man of some military experience, was detailed as quartermaster, and Capt. Stephen was made acting major.

Maj. Muse, on his arrival, reported that Capt. Mackay, of the South Carolina Royal Independent Company, had arrived with his command at Wills' Creek, and was not far behind him on the march to Great Meadows. He (Mackay) arrived on the following day (June 10th), having with him a force of about one hundred men, five days' rations of flour, sixty cattle on the hoof, and a considerable supply of ammunition. As Capt. Mackay was a regular officer in the royal service, he displayed from the first a disinclination to act under the orders of a "buckskin colonel" of Virginia provincial troops. This feeling extended to the private soldiers of the Carolina company, but no act of pronounced insubordination resulted from it.

Two days after the arrival of Capt. Mackay, some of Washington's scouts brought in word that they had discovered a French party, numbering, by estimate, about ninety men, between Gist's and Stewart's Crossings of the Youghiogheny. This intelligence caused the colonel to start out with about one hundred and thirty men and thirty Indians to find them; but before leaving the Meadows he took the same precaution that he observed when he went out to attack the party under Jumonville,—that is, he directed all his ammunition and stores to be placed in the safest possible position within the palisade, and set a strong guard over it, with orders to keep the strictest watch until his return; for he still feared that the reported movement by the French was part of a stratagem by which they hoped to capture the work in the absence of a large part of its defenders. On moving out with his party, however, he soon met an Indian party, who informed him that the alarm was unfounded, for, that instead of the reported party of ninety, there were but nine Frenchmen, and these were deserters. Thereupon he returned to the camp, leaving a small party to take the deserters and bring them in, which they accomplished soon afterwards.

[1] The killing of Jumonville was stigmatized by the French as the assassination of a peaceful envoy, and their writers have covered thousands of pages with accusations against Washington as commander of the attacking force. Even a greater amount of writing has been done by American historians to refute those false allegations. But the character of WASHINGTON needs no vindication, and certainly none will be offered in these pages.

[2] Afterwards Gen. Lewis, who fought the battle of Point Pleasant in Dunmore's war of 1774. He was a relative of Washington, and it is said that in 1775 the latter recommended him for the appointment which he himself soon after received, that of commander-in-chief of the American armies.

Finding that there was as yet no French force in his vicinity, Washington now resolved to advance towards Redstone, and accordingly on the 16th moved out on the path towards Gist's, taking with him his artillery pieces, some of the wagons, and all his men except the Carolinians under Mackay, who were left behind at the fort to guard the stores. This was done to avoid a possible conflict of authority with Mackay, who was indisposed to have his company perform its share of labor in clearing the way for the passage of the train.

This labor was found to be so great, that the force under Washington was employed thirteen days in making the road passable from the fort to Gist's, though the distance was only thirteen miles. Before reaching Gist's (on the 27th), Capt. Lewis was sent ahead, with Lieut. Waggoner, Ensign Mercer, and a detachment of seventy men, to attempt the opening of a practicable road beyond Gist's towards Redstone. Another detachment, under Capt. Polson, was sent out in advance to reconnoitre.

On the 29th of June, Washington arrived at Gist's, and there received information that a strong French force was advancing up the Monongahela. Thereupon he at once called a council of war, at which it was resolved to concentrate all the forces at that point, and there await the French attack. Intrenchments were immediately commenced and pushed with all possible vigor; a messenger was sent to call in Lewis' and Polson's detachments, and another to the Great Meadows with a request to Capt. Mackay to march his force without delay to Gist's. He promptly responded, and Lewis and Polson also came in the next morning. On their arrival Washington called a second council of war, which reversed the decision of the first, and resolved, without a dissenting voice, to abandon the work at Gist's and retreat to Wills' Creek, over the route by which they had advanced. This decision was at once acted on.

In the retreat, the means of transportation being very deficient, it is said that "Colonel Washington set a noble example to the officers by leading his own horse with ammunition and other public stores, leaving his baggage behind, and giving the soldiers four pistoles to carry it forward. The other officers followed this example. There were nine swivels, which were drawn by the soldiers of the Virginia regiment over a very broken road, unassisted by the men belonging to the Independent Company [Mackay's], who refused to perform any service of the kind. Neither would they act as pioneers, nor aid in transporting the public stores, considering this a duty not incumbent on them as king's soldiers. This conduct had a discouraging effect upon the soldiers of the Virginia regiment, by dampening their ardor and making them more dissatisfied with their extreme fatigue."[1]

The journey between Gist's and the Great Meadows, which Washington, on his outward march, had been unable to perform in less than thirteen days, was now made in less than two days, notwithstanding the insufficiency of transportation and the severe labor which the men were obliged to perform in hauling the artillery pieces and military stores, and the retreating column reached the fortified camp at Great Meadows on the 1st of July.

It had been the intention, as before noticed, to continue the retreat to Wills' Creek, but on the arrival at the Meadows, Washington found that it was impracticable to go on, for, says Sparks, "His men had become so much fatigued from great labor and a deficiency of provisions, that they could draw the swivels no farther, nor carry the baggage on their backs. They had been eight days without bread, and at the Great Meadows they found only a few bags of flour. It was thought advisable to wait here, therefore, and fortify themselves in the best manner they could till they should receive supplies and reinforcements. They had heard of the arrival at Alexandria of two independent companies from New York twenty days before, and it was presumed they must by this time have reached Wills' Creek. An express was sent to hasten them on with as much dispatch as possible."

When it had been decided to make a stand at the fortified camp at Great Meadows, Washington gave orders for the men to commence without delay to strengthen the rude defenses which had already been erected. More palisades were added, the stockade was extended and salient angles formed, and a broad but shallow ditch was made outside the fort, materially adding to the strength of the work. Outside this ditch there was constructed a line of defense similar in character to the modern rifle-pits, but all joined in one extended trench, further protected in front by a low parapet of logs, embanked with the earth thrown from the trench. The work was done under the supervision of Capt. Robert Stobo, who had had some experience in military engineering. When completed, Washington named it "Fort Necessity," as expressive of the necessity he was under to stand there and fight, because of his inability to continue the retreat to Wills' Creek, as he had intended. The extreme scarcity of provisions, and other supplies too, made the name appropriate.

Washington's selection of a site for his fortification has been often and severely criticised by military men as being badly calculated for defense, and commanded on three sides by high ground and closely approaching woods. The location was undoubtedly chosen partly on account of the peculiar conformation of the ground, which Washington called "natural intrenchments," and which materially lightened the labor of construction, and still more on account of the small stream which flowed by the spot, and across which at one point the palisade was extended, so as to bring it within the work, and furnish the defenders with an abundant supply of water, a consideration of vital importance if the fort was to be besieged.

Sparks, in describing the fort and its location, says, "The space of ground called the Great Meadows is a level bottom, through which passes a small creek, and is surrounded by hills of moderate and gradual descent. This bottom, or glade, is entirely level, covered with long grass and small bushes [Washington mentioned the clearing away of the bushes which covered the ground when the work was commenced], and varies in width. At the point where the fort stood it is about two hundred and fifty yards wide from the base of one hill to that of the opposite. The position of the fort was well chosen, being about one hundred yards from the upland or wooded ground on the one side, and one hundred and fifty on the other, and so situated on the margin of the creek as to afford easy access to the water. At one point the high ground comes within sixty yards of the fort, and this was the nearest distance to which an enemy could approach under shelter of trees. The outlines of the fort were still visible when the spot was visited by the writer in 1830, occupying an irregular square, the dimensions of which were about one hundred feet on each side. One of the angles was prolonged farther than the others, for the purpose of reaching the water in the creek. On the west side, next to the nearest wood, were three entrances, protected by stout breastworks or bastions. The remains of a ditch, stretching round the south and west sides, were also distinctly seen." If Sparks had been in the least acquainted with military matters, he probably would not have spoken of a fortified position as being "well chosen" when it was commanded on three sides by higher ground, in no place more than one hundred and fifty yards distant, with the opportunity for an enemy to approach on one side within sixty yards under cover of woods.

Leaving Washington and his little army in occupation of their frail defenses at the Great Meadows, let us take a brief glance at the enemy which was approaching them from Fort Du Quesne by way of the Monongahela Valley.

The French force which was marching in pursuit of Washington was commanded by M. Coulon de Villiers,[1] from whose journal of the campaign a few extracts are here given: "June the 26th.—Arrived at Fort Du Quesne about eight in the morning, with the several [Indian] nations, the command of which the General had given me. At my arrival, was informed that M. de Contrecœur had made a detachment of five hundred French, and eleven Indians of different nations on the Ohio, the command of which he had given to Chevalier le Mercier, who was to depart the next day. As I was the oldest officer, and commanded the Indian nations, and as my brother[2] had been assassinated, M. de Contrecœur honored me with that command, and M. le Mercier; though deprived of the command, seemed very well pleased to make the campaign under my orders. . . .

"The 28th.—M. de Contrecœur gave me my orders, the provisions were distributed, and we left the fort at about ten o'clock in the morning. I began from that instant to send out some Indians to range about by land to prevent being surprised. I posted myself at a short distance above the first fork of the river Monongahela, though I had no thought of taking that route. I called the Indians together and demanded their opinion. It was decided that it was suitable to take the river Monongahela, though the route was longer.

"The 29th.—Mass was said in the camp, after which we marched with the usual precaution.

"30th.—Came to the Hangard, which was a sort of fort built with logs, one upon another, well notched in, about thirty feet in length and twenty in breadth; and as it was late, and would not do anything without consulting the Indians, I encamped about two musket-shots from that place. At night I called the sachems together, and we consulted upon what was best to be done for the safety of our periaguas (large canoes), and of the provisions we left in reserve, as also what guard should be left to keep it.

"July the 1st.—Put our periaguas in a safe place. Our effects, and everything we could do without, we took into the Hangard, where I left one good sergeant, with twenty men and some sick Indians. Ammunition was afterwards distributed, and we began our march."

The force of De Villiers consisted of five hundred Frenchmen and about four hundred Indians.[3] Marching from the Hangard in the morning of the 1st of July (at which time Washington's force was approaching the Great Meadows on its retreat from Gist's plantation), the French and Indian column moved towards Gist's, where De Villiers expected to find Washington, his Indian scouts having reported the English force to be at that place.

"At about eleven o'clock," continues the journal, "we discovered some tracks, which made us suspect we were discovered. At three in the afternoon, having no news of our rangers, I sent others, who met those sent before, and not knowing each other, were near upon exchanging shots, but happily found their mistake; they returned to us and declared to have been at the road which the English were clearing; that they were of opinion no body had been that way for three days. We were no longer in doubt of our proceedings being known to the English."

At daybreak in the morning of the 2d the French force left its bivouac of the previous night and marched towards Gist's. "After having marched some time we stopped, for I was resolved to proceed no farther until I had positive news; wherefore I sent scouts upon the road. In the meanwhile came some of the Indians to me whom we had left at the Hangard; they had taken a prisoner, who called himself a deserter. I examined him, and threatened him with the rope if he offered to impose on me. I learned that the English had left their post [at Gist's] in order to rejoin their fort, and that they had taken back their cannon. Some of our people finding that the English had abandoned the camp we went thereto, and I sent some men to search it throughout. They found several tools and other utensils hidden in many places, which I ordered them to carry away. As it was late I ordered the detachment to encamp there. . . . We had rain all night."

When day broke on the morning of the 3d of July the weather was still wet and gloomy, but De Villiers moved forward at once with the main body, scouting parties having been sent in advance the previous evening. The rain continued, and increased during the long hours of the march towards Fort Necessity, but the French column pressed on with energy, and with all possible speed, for, said De Villiers, "I foresaw the necessity of preventing the enemy in their works." It also appears that he took the pains to ride away from the road into the woods, to make a flying visit to the rocky defile where Jumonville had lost his life five weeks before. "I stopped," he says, "at the place where my brother had been assassinated, and saw there yet some dead bodies," and then proceeds: "When I came within three-quarters of a league from the English fort I ordered my men to march in columns, every officer to his division, that I might the better dispose of them as necessity would require." His column was now within striking distance of the fort, after a drenching and dreary march of seven hours from Gist's.

Meanwhile, at Fort Necessity, Washington had been apprised of the arrival of the French at Gist's on the 2d, and had been constantly on the alert during the night. Not long after sunrise on the 3d some of the advance scouts of the French were seen, and one of Washington's men on picket was brought in wounded, but after this, three or four hours passed without further demonstrations. In the middle of the forenoon word came by scouts that the enemy in strong force was within two hours' march, and afterwards reports of their progress were brought in from time to time. Washington formed his forces in line of battle outside the defenses, awaiting the enemy's appearance, and hoping to induce him to attack in the open field. Finally, at a little before noon, the French appeared in the edge of the woods towards the northwest and began firing at long range, but did no execution. After a time, finding that the enemy manifested no disposition to make a general attack, Col. Washington withdrew his men within the defenses, the Carolinians occupying the rifle-pit trenches behind the low log pararet which formed the outer line (though they were afterwards driven out, not by the enemy's fire, but the torrents of rain that inundated the trenches in which they were posted). The French, finding their fire ineffectual from their distant position in the woods to the northwest,[1] moved to the left, where, on the eastern and southeastern side of the fort, the forest line was within fair musket-range of the work. From this new position they opened fire with more effect; the battle became general, and continued through the remainder of the day. An account of the conflict at Fort Necessity is thus given by Sparks:

"At eleven o'clock they [the French] approached the fort and began to fire, at the distance of six hundred yards, but without effect. Col. Washington had drawn up his men on the open and level ground outside of the trenches, waiting for the attack, which he presumed would be made as soon as the enemy's forces emerged from the woods, and he ordered his men to reserve their fire till they should be near enough to do execution. The distant firing was supposed to be a stratagem to draw Washington's men into the woods, and thus take them at a disadvantage. He suspected the design, and maintained his post till he found the French did not incline to leave the woods and attack the fort by an assault, as he supposed they would, considering their superiority of numbers. He then drew his men back within the trenches, and gave them orders to fire according to their discretion, as suitable opportunities might present themselves. The French and Indians remained on the side of the rising ground which was nearest to the fort, and, sheltered by the trees, kept up a brisk fire of musketry, but never appeared in the open plain below.

[1] De Villiers' account of the opening of the fight was as follows: "As we had no knowledge of the place, we presented our flank to the fort, when they began to fire upon us, and almost at the same time I perceived the English on the right, in order of battle, and coming towards us. The Indians, as well as ourselves, set up a great cry, and advanced towards them, but they did not give us time to fire upon them before they sheltered themselves in an intrenchment which was adjoining to their fort, after which we aimed to invest the fort, which was advantageously enough situated in a meadow within a musket-shot from the woods. We drew as near to them as possible that we might not expose his Majesty's subjects to no purpose. The fire was very brisk on both sides, and I chose that place which seemed to me the most proper in case we should be exposed to a sally. We fired so briskly as to put out (if I may use the expression) the fire of their cannon with our musket-shot." But, concerning the first part of the above account by De Villiers, Washington afterwards wrote, "I cannot help remarking on Villiers' account of the battle of and transaction at the Meadows, as it is very extraordinary, and not less erroneous than inconsistent. He says the French received the first fire. It is well known that we received it at six hundred paces' distance."

"The rain fell heavily through the day, the trenches were filled with water, and many of the arms of Col. Washington's men were out of order and used with difficulty. In this way the battle continued from eleven o'clock in the morning till eight at night, when the French called and requested a parley.[1] Suspecting this to be a feint to procure the admission of an officer into the fort, that he might discover their condition, Col. Washington at first declined listening to the proposal; but when the call was repeated, with the additional request that an officer might be sent to them, engaging at the same time their parole for his safety, he sent out Capt. Van Braam, the only person under his command that could speak French except the Chevalier de Peyronie, an ensign in the Virginia regiment, who was dangerously wounded and disabled from rendering any service on the occasion. Van Braam returned, and brought with him from M. de Villiers, the French commander, proposed articles of capitulation. These he read and pretended to interpret, and some changes having been made by mutual agreement, both parties signed them about midnight."

It was a mortifying close to Washington's first campaign, and the scene must have been a most dismal one when he signed the capitulation at dead of night amid torrents of rain, by the light of a solitary spluttering candle,[2] and with his dead and wounded men around him; but there was no alternative, and he had the satisfaction at least of knowing that he had done his best, and that all his officers, with a single exception,[3] had behaved with the greatest coolness and bravery.

The articles of capitulation were of course written in French. The following translation of them shows the terms granted to Washington, viz.:

"ARTICLE 1.—We grant leave to the English commander to retire with all his garrison, and to return peaceably into his own country, and promise to hinder his receiving any insult from us French, and to restrain, as much as shall be in our power, the Indians that are with us.

"ARTICLE 2.—It shall be permitted him to go out and carry with him all that belongs to them except the artillery, which we reserve.

"ARTICLE 3.—That we will allow them the honors of war,—that they march out with drums beating and one swivel gun,—being willing thereby to convince them that we treat them as friends.

"ARTICLE 4.—That as soon as the articles are signed by both parties the English colors shall be struck.

"ARTICLE 5.—That to-morrow, at break of day, a detachment of French shall go and make the garrison file off, and take possession of the fort.

"ARTICLE 6.—As the English have but few oxen or horses left, they are at liberty to hide their effects, and come again and search for them when they have a number of horses sufficient to carry them off, and that for this end they may have what guards they please, on condition that they give their word of honor to work no more on any buildings in this place, or any part on this side of the mountains.

"ARTICLE 7.—And as the English have in their power one officer, two cadets, and most of the prisoners made at the assassination of M. de Jumonville, and promise to send them back with a safe guard to Fort Du Quesne, situate on the Ohio, for surety of their performing this article as well as this treaty, M. Jacob Van Braam and Robert Stobo, both captains, shall be delivered as hostages till the arrival of our French and Canadians above mentioned. We oblige ourselves, on our side, to give an escort to return these two officers in safety, and expect to have our French in two months and a half at farthest."

The capitulation was signed by Washington, Mackay, and Villiers. The latter had cunningly caused the articles to be so worded that the English officers (who knew nothing of the French language) were made to sign an apparent acknowledgment that the killing of Jumonville[4] was an act of assassination. It was expected that Van Braam, the so-called interpreter, knowingly connived at the deception, and this opinion was firmly held by Washington, who afterwards wrote in reference to it as follows: "That we were wilfully or ignorantly deceived by our interpreter in regard to the word assassination I do aver, and will to my dying moment, so will every officer that was present. The interpreter was a Dutchman, little acquainted with the English tongue, therefore might not advert to the tone and meaning of the word in English; but whatever his motives were for so doing, certain it is he called it the death or the loss of the Sieur Jumonville. So we received and so we understood it, until, to our great surprise and mortification, we found it otherwise in a literal translation."

The numbers of the English forces engaged in the battle at the Great Meadows is not precisely known. The Virginia regiment went in three hundred strong, including officers, and their loss in the engagement was twelve killed and forty-three wounded.[5] Capt. Mackay's company numbered about one hundred, but its losses in killed and wounded were not officially stated. On the French side, according to the statement of De Villiers, the losses were two Frenchmen and one Indian killed, fifteen Frenchmen and two Indians seriously, and a number of others slightly wounded.

[1] The account given by De Villiers of the closing scenes of the battle, and of the call for a parley, is as follows: "Towards six at night the fire of the enemy increased with more vigor than ever, and lasted until light. We briskly returned their fire. We took particular care to secure our posts to keep the English fast up in their fort all night; and after having fixed ourselves in the best position we could we let the English know that if they would speak to us we would stop firing. They accepted the proposal; there came a captain to the place where I was. I sent M. la Mercier to receive him, and I went to the Meadow, where I told him that as we were not at war we were very willing to save them from the cruelties to which they exposed themselves on account of the Indians; but if they were stubborn we would take away from them all hopes of escaping; that we consented to be favorable to them at present, as we were come only to revenge my brother's assassination, and to oblige them to quit the lands of the king my master. . . ."

[2] An officer who was present at the capitulation wrote: "When Mr. Van Braam returned with the French proposals we were obliged to take the sense of them from his mouth; it rained so hard that he could not give us a written translation of them, and we could scarcely keep the candle lighted to read them by."

[3] When in the following August the Virginia House of Burgesses passed a vote of thanks to Washington and his officers "for their bravery and gallant defense of their country" at Fort Necessity, the names of all the officers were mentioned except that of the major of the regiment, who was charged with cowardice in the battle, and Capt. Van Braam, who was believed to have acted a treacherous part in interpreting the articles of capitulation.

[4] "We made the English," said Villiers, "consent to sign that they had assassinated my brother in his camp."

[5] By Washington's own official statement.

On the 4th of July, at break of day, the troops of Washington filed out of the fort with drums beating and colors flying, and (without any transportation for their effects other than was afforded by the backs and shoulders of the men, and having no means of carrying their badly wounded except on improvised stretchers) moved sadly away to commence their weary journey of sixty miles over hills and streams to Wills' Creek.

Upon the evacuation of the fort by Washington the French took possession, and immediately proceeded to demolish the work, while "M. le Mercier ordered the cannon of the English to be broken, as also the one granted by capitulation, they not being able to carry it away." The French commander very prudently ordered the destruction of some barrels of rum which were in the fort, to guard against the disorder and perhaps bloodshed which would probably have ensued if the liquor had been allowed to fall into the hands of the Indians.

De Villiers felt no little anxiety lest the expected reinforcements to Washington should arrive, which might place him in an unpleasant position and reverse the fortunes of the day. He therefore lost no time, and took his departure from the Great Meadows at as early an hour as possible, and marched about two leagues before he encamped for the night. On the 5th, at about nine o'clock in the forenoon, he arrived at Gist's, where he demolished the stockade which Washington had partially erected there, "and after having detached M. de la Chauvignerie to burn the houses round about," continued on the route towards Redstone to a point about three leagues northwest of Gist's, where his forces made their night bivouac. In the morning of the 6th they moved at an early hour, and reached the mouth of Redstone at ten o'clock. There they "put their periaguas in order, victualed the detachment, carried away the reserve of provisions which they had left there, found several things which the English had hidden," and then, after burning the "Hangard" store-house, embarked and went down the Monongahela. In the passage down the river, says De Villiers, "we burned down all the settlements we found," and about four o'clock in the afternoon of the 7th of July they arrived at Fort Du Quesne.

As to the manner of the departure of Washington's troops from the surrendered fort, De Villiers said, "The number of their dead and wounded moved me to pity, notwithstanding my resentment for their having in such a manner taken away my brother's life. The savages, who in everything had adhered to my wishes, claimed the right of plunder, but I restrained them; however, the English being frightened fled, and left their tents and one of their colors." But Washington, commenting on these statements of De Villiers, said, in a letter written not long afterwards, "That we left our baggage and horses at the Meadows is certain; that there was not a possibility to bring them away is equally certain, as we had every horse belonging to the camp killed or taken away during the action, so that it was impracticable to bring anything off that our shoulders were not able to bear, and to wait there was impossible, for we had scarce three days' provisions, and were seventy miles from a supply, yet to say that we came off precipitately is absolutely false, notwithstanding they did, contrary to the articles, suffer their Indians to pillage our baggage[1] and commit all kinds of irregularity. We were with them until ten o'clock the next day; we destroyed our powder and other stores, nay, even our private baggage, to prevent its falling into their hands, as we could not bring it off. When we had got about a mile from the place of action we missed two or three of the wounded, and sent a party back to bring them up; this is the party he speaks of. We brought them all safe off, and encamped within three miles of the Meadows. These are circumstances, I think, that make it evidently clear that we were not very apprehensive of danger. The colors he speaks of as left were a large flag of immense size and weight; our regimental colors were brought off, and are now in my possession."[2]

From his camping-ground, three miles southeast of the demolished fort, the Virginia regiment, with Mackay's South Carolinians, moved forward in the morning of the 5th of July, and fording the Youghiogheny at the Great Crossings, retraced their steps over the route previously traveled, and reached Wills' Creek after a slow and very toilsome journey. From that place Washington went to Alexandria, and the Virginia troops returned to their homes. Mackay's Carolina company remained at Wills' Creek, and together with two independent companies from New York,—all under command of Col. James Innes,—erected the fortification afterwards called "Fort Cumberland." This was then the western outpost of English power, and in all the country west of the mountains there was left no bar to French occupation and supremacy.

[1] "We all know that the French are a people that never pay any regard to treaties longer than they find them consistent with their interest, and this treaty [the Fort Necessity capitulation articles] they broke immediately by letting the Indians demolish and destroy everything our people had, especially the doctor's box, that our wounded should meet with no relief."—Extract from a letter written by Col. James Innes to Gov. Hamilton, dated Winchester, July 12, 1754.

[2] It appears that the Half-King, Tanacharison, had a poor opinion of Washington's ability as a military commander, and freely expressed that opinion to the Indian agent and interpreter, Conrad Weiser, who reported it as follows:

"The colonel [Washington] was a good-natured man, but had no experience. He took upon him to command the Indians as his slaves, and would have them every day upon the scout, and to attack the enemy by themselves, but would by no means take advice from the Indians. He lay in one place from one full moon to the other, without making any fortifications except that little thing on the Meadow, whereas had he taken advice and built such fortifications as he [Tanacharison] advised him he might easily have beat off the French. But the French in the engagement," he said, "acted like cowards, and the English like fools."

CHAPTER IV.

BRADDOCK'S EXPEDITION IN 1755.

THE news of Washington's defeat, and the consequent domination of the French over the broad territory west of the Alleghenies, was forwarded without delay to England, where it produced a general alarm and excitement, and roused the ministry to a determination to retrieve the disaster and expel the French, at whatever cost, from the valleys of the Monongahela and Allegheny Rivers. In pursuance of this determination, it was decided to send out a military force, to march from the Potomac to the "Forks of the Ohio," there to wrest from the French, by force of arms, their most menacing possession,—Fort Du Quesne.[1]

The expeditionary force, which was intended to be a very formidable one (for that early day), was to be composed of the Forty-fourth and Forty-eighth Royal Regiments of Foot,[2] commanded respectively by Col. Sir Peter Halket and Col. Thomas Dunbar, with some other troops to be raised in Virginia and other American provinces. The command of the expedition was given to Maj.-Gen. Edward Braddock, of the regular British army, who was also made commander-in chief of all his Majesty's forces in America.

Gen. Braddock sailed from Cork, Ireland, on the 14th of January, with the two regular regiments, on board the fleet of Admiral Keppel, of the British navy. The fleet arrived in Hampton Roads on the 20th of February, and the general, with the admiral, disembarked there and proceeded to Williamsburg, Va., for conference with Governor Dinwiddie. There, also, the general met his quartermaster-general, Sir John Sinclair, who had preceded him to America, and had already visited Fort Cumberland to make the preliminary arrangements for the campaign. "Virginia levies" had already been raised for the purpose of being incorporated with the Forty-fourth and Forty-eighth Regiments, and these levies had been ordered to Alexandria, whither, also, the fleet was ordered for disembarkation of the troops.

Leaving Williamsburg, Gen. Braddock, Sir John Sinclair, and the admiral arrived on the 26th at Alexandria, which place was the headquarters of the expedition for nearly two months, during which time (on the 14th of April) a council was held there, composed of the commander-in-chief, Admiral Keppel, Governor Dinwiddie, of Virginia; Governor Shirley, of Massachusetts; Governor Delancey, of New York; Governor Morris, of Pennsylvania; and Governor Sharpe, of Maryland; at which conference the plan of the campaign[3] was decided on, and arrangements made to facilitate the forwarding of the provincial troops destined for the expedition.

Sir John Sinclair was dispatched from Alexandria soon after his arrival with orders to proceed to Winchester, Va., and thence to Fort Cumberland, to complete all arrangements for the army's transportation. By his advice Braddock adopted the plan of moving his force from Alexandria in two divisions, viz.: one regiment and a portion of the stores to proceed to Winchester, whence a new road was nearly completed to Fort Cumberland, and the other regiment, with the remainder of the stores and the artillery, to move to the fort (which had been designated as the general rendezvous) by way of Frederick, Md. Accordingly, on the 9th of April, Sir Peter Halket left Alexandria for the fort, by way of Winchester, with six companies of the Forty-fourth Regiment, leaving the other four companies behind under command of Lieut.-Col. Gage[4] to escort the artillery. On the 18th Col. Dunbar, with the Forty-eighth, marched for Frederick, Md., and the commander-in-chief left Alexandria for the same place on the 20th, leaving Gage to follow with the artillery. When Dunbar arrived at Frederick he found that there was no road to Cumberland through Maryland,[5] and accordingly, on the 1st of May, he recrossed the Potomac, struck the Winchester route, and nine days later was in the neighborhood of the fort. "At high noon on the 10th of May, while Halket's command was already encamped at the common destination, the Forty-eighth was startled by the passage of Braddock and his staff through their ranks, with a body of light-horse galloping on each side of his traveling chariot, in haste to reach Fort Cumberland. The troops saluted, the drums rolled out the Grenadiers' March, and the cortege passed by. An hour later they heard the booming of the artillery which welcomed the general's arrival, and a little later themselves encamped on the hillsides about that post." The artillery escorted by Gage arrived at the fort on the 20th.

Arriving at the fort on the 10th, the general remained there about one month, during which time his expeditionary force was completed and organized. Two companies, Rutherford's and Clarke's, had been stationed at the fort during the winter, and were still there. The Forty-fourth and Forty-eighth regulars

[1] There were, however, two other expeditions projected,—one against Niagara and Frontenac, under Gen. Shirley, and another against Crown Point, under Gen. William Johnson; but the principal one was that intended for the reduction of Fort Du Quesne.

[2] These regiments, however, were far from being full, numbering only about five hundred men each.

[3] The council, however, had really nothing to do with the adoption of the plan of operations, which was made entirely according to the martinet ideas and opinions of the commander-in-chief.

[4] The same Gage who as major-general commanded the British forces in Boston in 1775.

[5] Capt. Orme, in his journal of the expedition, says, "The general ordered a bridge to be built over the Antietum, which being furnished and provision laid upon the road Col. Dunbar marched with his regiment from Frederick on the 28th of April, and about this time the bridge over the Opeccon was finished for the passage of the artillery, and floats were built on all the rivers and creeks." The "Antietum" here mentioned is the same historic stream whose locust-fringed banks witnessed the terrific battle between the Union and Confederate hosts under McClellan and Lee, on the 17th of September, 1862.

had been augmented to a total of fourteen hundred men by the addition of Virginia and Maryland levies at Alexandria. A company of Virginia light-horse, under command of Capt. Stewart, acted as the general's body-guard. A body of seventy provincials was formed into two companies of pioneers, each having a captain, two subalterns, and two sergeants, and with these was also a very small company of guides. A lieutenant, Mr. Spendelow, and two midshipmen from Admiral Keppel's fleet were present with about thirty sailors to have charge of the cordage and tackles, necessary for the building of bridges and the hoisting of artillery pieces and other heavy material over precipices. The other provincial troops brought the total number up to about two thousand one hundred and fifty, including officers, but exclusive of wagoners and the usual complement of non-combatant camp-followers, among whom were a number of women. There were eight friendly Indians who accompanied the expedition. The forces of Gen. Braddock were brigaded by his orders as follows:

First Brigade, commanded by Sir Peter Halket, composed of The Forty-fourth Regiment of Regulars.
Capt. John Rutherford's } Independent Companies of New York.
Capt. Horatio Gates'[1] }
Capt. William Polson's Company of Pioneers and Carpenters.
Capt. William Peyronie's Virginia Rangers.
Capt. Thomas Waggener's Virginia Rangers.
Capt. Eli Dagworthy's Maryland Rangers.
Second Brigade, commanded by Col. Thomas Dunbar, composed of The Forty-eighth Regiment of Regulars.
Capt. Paul Demerie's South Carolina detachment.
Capt. Dobb's North Carolina Rangers.
Capt. Mercer's Company of Carpenters and Pioneers.
Capt. Adam Stephen's[2] }
Capt. Peter Hogg's } Virginia Rangers.
Capt. Thomas Cocke's }

Capt. Andrew Lewis had been sent with his company of Virginians to the Greenbrier River for the protection of settlers there, but he afterwards rejoined Braddock's column on its way to Fort Du Quesne.

The field-officers under Braddock were Lieutenant-Colonels Burton and Gage; Majors Chapman and Sparks; Brigade-Major Francis Halket; Major Sir John Sinclair, deputy quartermaster-general; Matthew Leslie, assistant quartermaster-general. The secretary to the commanding general was William Shirley, and his aides-de-camp were Capt. Robert Orme, George Washington,[3] and Roger Morris. Christopher Gist and Nathaniel Gist, his son, accompanied the expedition as principal guides. George Croghan and Andrew Montour were with the general as Indian interpreters.

"The soldiers were ordered to be furnished with one new spare shirt, one new pair of stockings, and one new pair of shoes; and Osnabrig waistcoats and breeches were provided for them, as the excessive heat would have made the others insupportable; and the commanding officers of companies were desired to provide leather or bladders for the men's hats."[4]

The transportation which was collected at Fort Cumberland for the use of Braddock's force consisted of one hundred and ninety wagons and more than fifteen hundred horses. When he landed in Virginia he expected that "two hundred wagons and one hundred and fifty carrying-horses" would be furnished by the provincial authorities, but when he arrived at Frederick, Md., he found that not more than a tenth part that number had been raised, and that some of these even were in an unserviceable condition. Upon learning this he burst out in fierce invective against the inefficiency, poverty, and lack of integrity among the provincials, and declared that the expedition was at an end, for that it was impracticable to proceed without one hundred and fifty wagons, and a corresponding number of horses at the very least. But Dr. Benjamin Franklin, who was present at Frederick, told the general that the Pennsylvania farmers were able to furnish the necessary transportation, and that he (Franklin) would contract for a specified sum to deliver one hundred and fifty wagons and the necessary horses at Fort Cumberland within a given time, whereupon Braddock proceeded on his march; and in about two weeks Franklin had caused the specified number of wagons and animals to be at the fort. Gen. Braddock was very grateful for this service, and he warmly complimented Franklin in a letter which he wrote to the Secretary of State, dated at Wills' Creek, June 5th, as follows:

"Before I left Williamsburg the quartermaster-general told me that I might depend on twenty-five hundred horses and two hundred wagons from Virginia and Maryland; but I had great reason to doubt it, having experienced the false dealings of all in this country with whom I had been concerned. Hence, before my departure from Frederick, I agreed with Mr. Benjamin Franklin, postmaster in Pennsylvania, who has great credit in that province, to hire one

[1] Afterwards Major-General Gates, to whom Burgoyne surrendered at Saratoga.

[2] Afterwards General Stephen, of the Revolutionary army.

[3] After his return from the Fort Necessity campaign, Col. Washington's rank, as well as that of other colonial officers, was reduced by royal order, which caused him to resign his commission, and at the time of Gen. Braddock's arrival in America he was not in the military service. But Braddock, well aware of the importance of securing his services, urged Washington to take the position of volunteer aide-de-camp on his staff, and the offer, so earnestly pressed, was accepted.

Sparks, in his "Life of Washington" (page 58), in speaking of Washington's acceptance of Braddock's proposition to accompany him on the expedition as a member of his military family, says, "His views on the subject were explained, with a becoming frankness and elevation of mind, in a letter to a friend: 'I may be allowed,' said he, 'to claim some merit if it is considered that the sole motive which invites me to the field is the laudable desire of serving my country, not the gratification of any ambitious or lucrative plans. This, I flatter myself, will manifestly appear by my going as a volunteer, without expectation of reward or prospect of obtaining a command, as I am confidently assured it is not in General Braddock's power to give me a commission that I would accept. . . . It is true I have been importuned to make this campaign by Gen. Braddock as a member of his family, he conceiving, I suppose that the small knowledge I had an opportunity of acquiring of the country and the Indians is worthy of his notice, and may be useful t him in the progress of the expedition.'" hundred and fifty wagons and the necessary number of horses. This he accomplished with promptitude and fidelity; and it is almost the only instance of address and integrity which I have seen in all these provinces."

It has been said that, in procuring the wagons and horses from the Teutonic farmers in the Southern Pennsylvania counties, he was materially aided by the presence of Braddock's quartermaster-general. "Sir John Sinclair [1] wore a Hussar's cap, and Franklin made use of the circumstance to terrify the German settlers with the belief that he was a Hussar, who would administer to them the tyrannical treatment they had experienced in their own country if they did not comply with his wishes."

At a council of war held at Fort Cumberland the order of march was determined on, viz.: the advance was to be led by "a party of six hundred men, workers and coverers, with a field-officer and the quartermaster-general; that they should take with them two six-pounders, with a full proportion of ammunition; that they should also take with them eight days' provisions for three thousand two hundred men; that they should make the road as good as possible, and march five days towards the first crossing of the Yoxhio Geni,[2] which was about thirty miles from the camp, at which place they were to make a deposit of provisions, building proper sheds for its security, and also a place of arms for the security of the men. If they could not in five days advance so far, they were at the expiration of that time to choose an advantageous spot, and to secure the provisions and men as before. When the wagons were unloaded the field-officer with three hundred men was to return to camp, and Sir John S[t] Clair with the first engineer was to remain and carry on the works with the other three hundred."[3]

This advance detachment was to be followed by the remainder of the forces in three divisions, in the following order: First, Sir Peter Halket's command, with "about one hundred wagons of provisions, stores, and powder;" second, Lieut.-Col. Burton, "with the independent companies, Virginia, Maryland, and Carolina Rangers," taking the artillery, ammunition, and some stores and provisions; third, Col. Dunbar's brigade, "with the provision-wagons from Winchester, the returned wagons from the advanced party, and all the carrying-horses."

In accordance with this order, Maj. Chapman with a body of six hundred men, and accompanied by Sir John Sinclair, marched at daybreak on the 30th of May, but "it was night before the whole baggage had got over a mountain about two miles from camp. . . . The general reconnoitred this mountain, and determined to set the engineers and three hundred more men at work on it, as he thought it impassable by howitzers. He did not imagine any other road could be made, as a reconnoitring-party had already been to explore the country; nevertheless, Mr. Spendelow, lieutenant of the seamen, a young man of great discernment and abilities, acquainted the general that in passing that mountain he had discovered a valley which led quite round the foot of it. A party of a hundred men with an engineer was ordered to cut a road there, and an extreme good one was made in two days, which fell into the other road about a mile on the other side of the mountain."

"Everything being now settled, Sir Peter Halket, with the Forty-fourth Regiment, marched on the 7th of June; Lieutenant-Colonel Burton, with the independent companies and Rangers, on the 8th, and Colonel Dunbar, with the Forty-eighth Regiment, on the 10th, with the proportions of baggage as was settled by the council of war. The same day the general left Fort Cumberland, and joined the whole at Spendelow Camp, about five miles from the fort."[4] The camp was named in honor of Lieut. Spendelow, who discovered the route around the foot of the mountain.

At Spendelow Camp a reduction of baggage was made, and the surplus sent back to the fort, together with two six-pounders, four cohorns, and some powder and stores, which cleared about twenty wagons of their loads, "and near a hundred able horses were given to the public service. . . . All the king's wagons were also sent back to the fort, they being too heavy, and requiring large horses for the shafts, which could not be procured, and country wagons were fitted for powder in their stead."

[1] This same Sir John Sinclair was a man of very rough speech and imperious and domineering character, as is made apparent by the following extract from a letter written by Messrs. George Croghan, James Burd, John Armstrong, William Buchanan, and Adam Hoopes to Governor Morris, of Pennsylvania, dated Fort Cumberland, April 16, 1755, at which time some of the companies, as well as Sir John himself, had already reached the rendezvous. The writers of the letter had been appointed to view and lay out a road over the mountains, and had returned from their mission to the fort. In the letter they say, "Last evening we came to the camp, and were kindly received by the officers, but particularly Capt. Rutherford. We waited for Sir John coming to camp from the road towards Winchester, who came this day at three o'clock, but treated us in a very disagreeable manner. He is extremely warm and angry at our province; he would not look at our draughts, nor suffer any representations to be made to him in regard to the province, but stormed like a lion rampant. He said our commission to lay out the road should have issued in January last, upon his first letter; that doing it now is doing nothing; that the troops must march on the first of May; that the want of this road and the provisions promised by Pennsylvania has retarded the expedition, which may cost them their lives, because of the fresh number of the French that are suddenly like to be poured into the country; that instead of marching to the Ohio he would in nine days march his army into Cumberland County, to cut the roads, press wagons, etc.; that he would not suffer a soldier to handle an axe, but by fire and sword oblige the inhabitants to do it, and take every man that refused to the Ohio, as he had yesterday some of the Virginians; that he would kill all kind of cattle, and carry away the horses, burn houses, etc.; and that if the French defeated them by the delays of this province, that he would with his sword drawn pass through the province and treat the inhabitants as a parcel of traitors to his master; that he would to-morrow write to England by a man-of-war, shake Mr. Penn's proprietaryship, and represent Pennsylvania as disaffected. . . . and told us to go to the general, if we pleased, who would give us ten bad words for one he had given."

On the 13th the column moved to Martin's plantation; on the 15th it "passed the Aligany Mountain, which is a rocky ascent of more than two miles, in many places exceedingly steep; its descent is very rugged and almost perpendicular; in passing which we entirely demolished three wagons and shattered several." That night the First Brigade camped about three miles west of Savage River. On the 16th the head of the column reached the Little Meadows, ten miles from Martin's plantation; but the rear did not arrive there until the 18th. At this place they found Sir John Sinclair encamped with three hundred men, this being the farthest point he could reach in the five days specified in the orders.

At the Little Meadows the general adopted a new plan of campaign,—to move forward with a division composed of some of his best troops, with a few guns and but little baggage, leaving the remainder of his force behind to bring up the heavy stores and artillery.

This decision was taken largely through the advice of Washington, who, although not of rank to sit in the councils of war, possessed no small share of the general's confidence, by reason of the experience he had gained in the campaign of the preceding year. He gave it as his opinion that the movement of the army was too slow, on account of the cumbrous wagon-train, which on the march stretched out for a distance of more than three miles, thus not only retarding the progress of the forces, but affording an excellent opportunity for lurking parties of the enemy to attack and destroy some lightly-defended part of it before help could arrive from the main body. He had from the first urged the use of pack-horses instead of wagons for the greater part of the transportation, and although his advice was ignored by the general, its wisdom now became apparent. Orme's Journal says that by the experience of the four days' march from Spendelow Camp to the Little Meadows, "it was found impossible to proceed with such a number of carriages. The horses grew every day fainter, and many died; the men would not have been able to have undergone the constant and necessary fatigue by remaining so many hours under arms, and by the great extent of the baggage the line was extremely weakened. The general was therefore determined to move forward with a detachment of the best men, and as little incumbrance as possible."

The selected force destined to move in the advance consisted of between twelve and thirteen hundred men. "A detachment of one field-officer with four hundred men and the deputy quartermaster-general marched on the 18th to cut and make the road to the Little Crossing of the Yoxhio Geni, taking with them two six-pounders with their ammunition, three wagons of tools, and thirty-five days' provisions, all on carrying-horses, and on the 19th the general marched with a detachment of one colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, one major, the two eldest grenadier companies, and five hundred rank and file, the party of seamen, and eighteen light-horse, and four howitzers with fifty rounds each, and four twelve-pounders with eighty rounds each, and one hundred rounds of ammunition for each man, and one wagon of Indian presents; the whole number of carriages being about thirty. The howitzers had each nine horses, the twelve-pounders seven, and the wagons six. There was also thirty-five days' provisions carried on horses." The troops left behind with Col. Dunbar numbered about nine hundred, including four artillery officers. Eighty-four wagons and all the ordnance stores and provisions not immediately needed by the advance column were also left in his charge.

The advanced force under Braddock reached the Little Crossings (Castleman's River) on the evening of the 19th, and camped on the west side of the stream. At this camp Washington was taken seriously ill with a fever, and when the troops marched the next morning he was left behind with a guard and proper attendance[1] and comforts. As soon as able he was to come on with the rear division under Col. Dunbar; but it has been stated that he asked and received from Gen. Braddock a promise that the fort should not be attacked until he had recovered and rejoined the assaulting column. It does not, however, seem reasonable to suppose that he would have wished to jeopardize the success of the expedition by asking such an indefinite delay, nor that Braddock would, under any circumstances, have bound himself by such a promise.

In four days from his departure from the Little Meadows, Gen. Braddock's column had made nineteen miles, and arrived at the Great Crossings of the Youghiogheny, which the troops crossed without bridging.[2] On the 24th of June they passed an Indian camp, recently vacated, which gave indications that it had been occupied by about one hundred and seventy persons. "They had stripped and painted some trees, upon which they and the French had written many threats and bravadoes, with all kinds

[1] In some accounts of this sickness of Washington, it has been stated that Dr. James Craik (who was with the expedition as a surgeon in the Virginia troops, and who was also the life-long friend and physician of Washington) was left behind at the Little Crossings to attend him, but such does not appear to have been the case. The Hon. James Finley, in a letter written to the editor of Niles' Register, dated Youngstown, Pa., March 27, 1818, relates some conversations which he had with Washington in reference to Braddock's campaign, from which letter the following extracts are made: "On one occasion, in a mixed company, some question being asked of me, then sitting next the President (Washington), about the Big Meadows and Dunbar's Run, by Col. Sprigg, of Maryland, which I could not answer, the President, to whom I referred the question, in answering them described Dunbar's camp, to which the remains of Braddock's army retired after the defeat. . . . Looking round seriously to me, he said, 'Braddock was both my general and my physician. I was attacked with a dangerous fever on the march, and he left a sergeant [not a surgeon] to take care of me, and James' fever powders, with directions how to give them, and a wagon to bring me on when I would be able, which was only the day before the defeat.'"

[2] An entry in Orme's Journal for this day is to this effect: "The 24th of June we marched at five in the morning, and passed the second branch of the Yoxhio Geni, which is about one hundred yards wide, about three feet deep, with a very strong current."

of scurrilous language." The French had received early information of Braddock's coming, and parties of them with their Indian allies had advanced east beyond the Laurel Hill to meet the English; not for the purpose of attacking them, but to hover along their front and flanks, to spy out their movements, murder stragglers, and to keep the commandant at Fort Du Quesne informed, from day to day, of the progress of the English forces. From the time when the troops crossed the Youghiogheny, hostile Indians were always near them along the route, and evidences of their presence multiplied with each succeeding day's march.

In fact, nearly all the savages west of the mountains were now ranged on the side of the French. A few only of the Indian allies of the English had remained true to them after the surrender of Fort Necessity, and among these were Monacatoocha, the successor of the friendly Half-King,[1] and Scarooyada, whose acquaintance Washington had made on his trip to Le Bœuf in the previous year. These two chiefs, with nearly a hundred and fifty Seneca and Delaware warriors, had joined the English on their march, and proposed to accompany them as scouts and guides. They could without doubt have rendered great service in that capacity, and if the warnings of their forest experience had been listened to, might perhaps have saved Braddock's army from the disaster which overtook it. But the general despised and rejected their services, and treated them with so much of slight and contempt that they finally retired in disgust and left him to his fate.

On the 25th of June, "at daybreak, three men who went without the sentinels were shot and scalped." Gen. Braddock was greatly incensed at these murders, and issued an order directing that "every soldier or Indian shall receive five pounds for each Indian scalp." At their halting-place on the same evening they found the marks of another French and Indian camp, so lately vacated that the fires were yet burning. "The Indians who had occupied it," said Orme, "had marked in triumph upon trees the scalps they had taken two days before, and many of the French had written on them their names and sundry insolent expressions. We picked up a commission on the march, which mentioned the party being under the command of the Sieur Normanville. This Indian camp was in a strong situation, being upon a high rock, with a very narrow and steep ascent to the top. It had a spring in the middle, and stood at the termination of the Indian path to the Monongahela, at the confluence of Redstone Creek. By this path the party came which attacked Mr. Washington last year, and also this which attended us. By their tracks they seemed to have divided here, the one party going straight forward to Fort Du Quesne, and the other returning by Redstone Creek to the Monongahela. A captain, four subalterns, and ninety volunteers marched from the camp with proper guides to fall in the night upon that party which we imagined had returned by the Monongahela. They found a small quantity of provisions and a very large bateau, which they destroyed," but they saw nothing of the foe they were sent to capture.

On the 27th of June the troops reached Gist's plantation, where they found Lieut.-Col. Burton and Sir John Sinclair, with a detachment of about four hundred men, who had been sent forward to cut out the road in advance of the main body. On the 28th the forces moved on from Gist's, crossed the Youghiogheny on the 30th, and thence moved northward along the route of the old Iroquois war trail, leading to the Allegheny. On the 3d of July "we marched," says Orme in his journal, "about six miles to the Salt Lick Creek.[2] Sir John St. Clair proposed to the General to halt at this camp, and to send back all our horses to bring up Colonel Dunbar's detachment," which was then encamped at Squaw's Fort, about three miles east of the Great Crossings of the Youghiogheny, in the present county of Somerset. Upon this suggestion of Sir John, the general convened a council of war, composed of Col. Sir Peter Halket, Lieut.-Cols. Gage and Burton, Maj. Sparks, and Sir John Sinclair, D.Q.G. After due consideration of the proposition, "the council were unanimously of the opinion not to halt there for Col. Dunbar, but to proceed the next morning." The camp where this council of war was held was about one and one-half miles below the site of the present town of Mount Pleasant, in Westmoreland County. From this place the column marched on to the Great Sewickley; thence to the Brush Fork of Turtle Creek, where Braddock halted in indecision, as the crossing of that stream and the passage through the ravines appeared hazardous. He finally decided to abandon the route originally proposed from this point along the ridges to Fort Du Quesne, and accordingly, turning sharply to the left, he moved towards the Monongahela, encamping on the night of the 8th of July about two miles east of the river, below the mouth of the Youghiogheny. It was at this camp that Washington (although not yet fully recovered from his illness) rejoined the army, having left Col. Dunbar's force near the Great Meadows, and came on "in a covered wagon," under protection of a detachment sent on to guard a pack-horse train laden with provisions for the advance column.

On the morning of the 9th of July the troops marched to the Monongahela and crossed to the southwest shore, moving thence on the left bank for about three miles; then recrossed the river at Fraser's, just below the mouth of Turtle Creek. The crossing was completed at about one o'clock in the afternoon, and when the column reformed on the right bank of the Monongahela, it was within three-fourths of a mile of the place where the French with their Indian allies lay hidden along the slopes of the forest defile which, ere the sun went down on that memorable day, was to be reddened by the blood of the bravest, and made historic for all time as "Braddock's Field" of disaster and defeat.

[1] The Half-King, Tanacharison, had died in the preceding October, at Harris' Ferry (now Harrisburg), on the Susquehanna.

[2] Now known as Jacobs Creek.

The bloody battle of the Monongahela has been too often described to require repetition here. It resulted in the utter defeat and rout of the English, and the headlong flight of the survivors to the south side of the river at the point where they had crossed. The force which entered the defile was fourteen hundred and sixty strong,[1] including officers and privates. Of this force four hundred and fifty-six were killed and four hundred and twenty-one wounded, making a total of eight hundred and seventy-seven; while only five hundred and eighty-three escaped unhurt. Of eighty-nine commissioned officers, sixty-three were killed or wounded, including every officer above the rank of captain except Col. Washington, who, however, was a colonel only by courtesy. Of the captains, ten were killed and five wounded; of the lieutenants, fifteen killed and twenty-two wounded. Gen. Braddock had four horses shot under him, and while mounting the fifth received the wound which proved mortal. Washington had two horses shot under him. Sir Peter Halket (next in command to Braddock) was killed instantly. Secretary Shirley was killed. Col. Burton, Sir John Sinclair, and Lieut.-Col. Gage were among the wounded, also Brig.-Maj. Halket, Dr. Hugh Mercer,[2] Maj. Sparks, and Capt. Orme. Of the naval officers present, Lieut. Spendelow and Midshipman Talbot were killed. A number of women and officers' servants were also killed and scalped, though every wagoner escaped. One hundred beeves were captured by the enemy, also the general's papers (orders, instructions, and correspondence), and the military chest, containing £25,000 in money, as well as all of Washington's papers, including his notes referring to the Fort Necessity campaign of the previous year. The journal of Capt. Orme alone of all the military papers was saved. All the artillery, ammunition, baggage, and stores fell into the hands of the French and Indians, and the dead and badly wounded were left on the field to be scalped and tortured by the savages, who, however, strangely enough, made little show of pursuit.

Braddock, when he received his fatal wound, expressed a wish to be left to die on the field, and this wish came near being gratified. Nearly all his panic-stricken followers deserted him, but his aide-de-camp, Orme, and Capt. Stewart, of the Virginia light-horse, stood faithfully by him, and at the imminent risk of their own lives succeeded in bearing him from the woods and across the river. On reaching the south side of the Monongahela the general, though suffering intense pain from his wound, gave orders that the troops should be rallied and a stand made at that place, but this was found impossible. A few subordinate officers and less than one hundred soldiers were all who remained around him. Of this Capt. Orme's journal says, "We intended to have kept possession of that ground till we could have been reinforced. The general and some wounded officers remained there about an hour, till most of the men ran off. From that place the general sent Mr. Washington to Col. Dunbar with orders to send wagoners for the wounded, some provisions and hospital stores, to be escorted by the two youngest grenadier companies, to meet him at Gist's plantation, or nearer if possible. It was found impracticable to remain here, as the general and officers were left almost alone; we therefore retreated in the best manner we were able. After we had passed the Monongahela the second time, we were joined by Lieut.-Col. Gage, who had rallied near eighty men. We marched all night and the next day, and about ten o'clock that night we got to Gist's plantation."

During the time when Gen. Braddock was advancing to the Monongahela, Col. Dunbar was toiling slowly along with the rear division, the artillery, and heavy stores. Leaving the Little Crossings soon after Braddock's departure, he came on by the same route, passing the ruins of Fort Necessity on the 2d of July, and a few days later reached the place, high up on the Laurel Hill, which is known to this day as "Dunbar's Camp,"[3] and where he then encamped his troops and parked his trains. This was the end of Dunbar's outward march, for he there received from the Monongahela battle-field the fearful tidings which forbade all thoughts of a farther advance.

It was to this camp that "Mr. Washington" (as he was designated by Orme, he holding no military rank under Braddock) was ordered from the lower crossing of the Monongahela to proceed with all possible speed, and with peremptory orders[4] to Col. Dunbar to send

[1] The force had increased by nearly two hundred men between the time when Braddock moved forward from the Little Meadows with between twelve and thirteen hundred men and the time when they reached the Monongahela. This increase was made principally by small detachments which were detailed from the rear-guard, under Dunbar, as guards to the trains which were sent forward with supplies to the advance.

[2] Afterwards Gen. Mercer, who was killed at the battle of Princeton, Jan. 3, 1777. The wound which he received at the battle of the Monongahela was a very severe one. He was left on the field with the other badly wounded, but managed to conceal himself behind a fallen tree, where he witnessed the atrocities committed by the savages on the other wounded men and on the dead. His place of concealment was not discovered by the Indians, who soon left the field. When darkness came on he crept from the woods, crossed the Monongahela, and after wandering in the woods for many days with his wound undressed, and nearly famished, he at last reached Fort Cumberland in safety.

[3] Col. Burd, who visited this place in 1759, when on his way to erect a fort on the present site of Brownsville, said of Dunbar's camp that it was "the worst chosen piece of ground for an encampment I ever saw."

[4] It was known that there was ill feeling on the part of Dunbar towards the commander-in-chief, and it was therefore thought necessary to send the most positive orders in Braddock's name to insure obedience.

wagons with supplies and hospital stores without delay, as has already been noticed. He set out with two private soldiers as an escort, and traveling without halt through the long hours of the dark and rainy night which succeeded the day of the battle, came early in the morning of the 10th to the camp of Col. Dunbar, who, as it appears, was greatly demoralized by the startling intelligence which he brought. At about the middle of the forenoon several of Braddock's Pennsylvania Dutch wagoners (from the eastern counties) arrived at the camp, bringing the dread news from the battle-field, and announcing themselves as the only survivors of the bloody fight on the Monongahela. Nearly at the same time arrived Sir John Sinclair and another wounded officer, brought in by their men in blankets.

Dunbar's camp was then a scene of the wildest panic, as the rattle of the "long roll," beaten by his drummers, reverberated among the crags of the Laurel Hill. Each one, from the commander to the lowest camp-follower, believed that the savages and the scarcely less dreaded French were near at hand and would soon surround the camp.

True to their cowardly instincts, Dunbar's wagoners and pack-horse drivers, like those who were with Braddock on the Monongahela, and like many others of the same base brood on a hundred later battle-fields, were the first to seek safety in flight, mounting the best horses and hurrying away with all speed towards Fort Cumberland,[1] leaving their places on the wagons and with the pack-horse trains to be filled by brave soldiers from the ranks. Their base example infected the numerous camp-followers, who, as well as many of those from whom better things might have been expected, fled towards the Allegheny Mountains, and it was with the greatest difficulty that Dunbar prevented the desertion and flight from becoming general.

At ten o'clock in the evening of the same day (Thursday, July 10th), Gen. Braddock reached Gist's. From the place where he fell he was brought away on a tumbril. Afterwards the attempt was made to move him on horseback, but this he could endure only for a short time, after which he was dismounted and carried all the remaining distance by a few of his men. The weary journey was continued with scarcely a halt during all the night succeeding the battle and all the following day. Through all the sad hours of that long march the gallant Capt. Orme (himself suffering from a painful wound) and the no less brave and steadfast Virginia cavalry captain, Stewart, were constantly by the side of their helpless commander, never leaving him a moment.

The mortally wounded general must have been suffering intense agony of mind as well as of body, but through it all, like the brave and faithful officer that he was, he never forgot that there were other maimed and suffering ones who sorely needed aid. "Despite the intensity of his agonies," says Sargent, "Braddock still persisted in the exercise of his authority and the fulfillment of his duties." On reaching Gist's he found that no provisions, stores, nor surgical aid had arrived there in obedience to the command sent by Washington to Col. Dunbar, and thereupon he sent still more peremptory orders to that officer to forward them instantly, with the two only remaining companies of the Forty-fourth and Forty-eighth Regiments, to assist in bringing off the wounded. The wagons arrived on the morning of Friday, the 11th, and a party was then immediately sent back towards the Monongahela to rescue such of the wounded as could be found, and with a supply of provisions to be left along the road for the benefit of those who might be missed and come

[1] A few days after their cowardly flight from Dunbar's camp, several of these panic-stricken wagoners appeared at Carlisle, bringing with them the first news of the disaster to Braddock's army. Thereupon they were examined by the Governor of Pennsylvania at that place, and their depositions taken and subscribed before him are found in the Pennsylvania Archives. Two of these depositions (similar in tenor to all the others) are here given, viz.:

Matthew Laird being duly sworn, deposed and said,—

". . . That this examinant continued with Col. Dunbar. And on the tenth of this instant the regiment being at about seven miles beyond a place called the Great Meadows at eleven o'clock of that day, there was a rumor in the camp that there was bad news, and he was soon after informed by wagoners and pack-horse drivers, who were then returned to Col. Dunbar's camp, but had gone out with the advanced party under Gen. Braddock, that the general with the advanced party was defeated by the French on the ninth instant about five miles from Fort Du Quesne, and about forty miles from where Col. Dunbar then was, at which engagement the wagoners and pack-horse drivers said they were present; that the English were attacked as they were going up a hill by a numerous body of French and Indians, who kept a continual fire during the whole engagement, which lasted nigh three hours; that most of the English were cut off, and the whole train of artillery taken; that General Braddock was killed, as also Sir Peter Hacket, Capt. Orme, and most of the officers. This examinant further saith he saw a wounded officer brought through the camp on a sheet; that about noon of the same day they beat to arms in Col. Dunbar's camp, upon which the wagoners as well as many common soldiers and others took to flight in spite of the opposition made by the centrys, who forced some to return, but many got away, amongst whom was this examinant."

Following is the deposition of Jacob Huber:

"This examinant saith that he was in Col. Dunbar's camp the tenth of July instant, and was informed that two officers who had come from Fort Cumberland, and had proceeded early in the morning with a party of Indians to join General Braddock, returned to the camp in about three hours after they set out, and a rumor spread that there was bad news, and that the officers could not pass to the general by reason of the Indians; that about nine or ten o'clock the same day this examinant saw and spoke with several wagoners who were come into Col. Dunbar's camp from Gen. Braddock's, and who informed this examinant that Gen. Braddock with his advanced party of fifteen hundred men had been attacked on the ninth instant within five miles of Fort Du Quesne by a great many French and Indians who surrounded them; that the action lasted three hours; that the most part of the English were killed; that Gen. Braddock was wounded and put into a wagon, and afterwards killed by the Indians; that Sir Peter Hacket and Capt. Orme were also killed. And this examinant further saith that he saw some soldiers return into Col. Dunbar's camp, who he was informed had been of General Braddock's advanced party, some of whom were wounded, some not; also saw two officers carried on sheets, one of whom was said to be Sir John St. Clair, whom the examinant was informed had received two wounds; that about noon of the same day Col. Dunbar's drums beat to arms; and both before and after that many soldiers and wagoners with other attendants upon the camp took to flight, and amongst others this examinant. And further saith not."

up afterwards. Of the movements of the general and his party on that day, Capt. Orme's Journal has the following entry:

"Gist's plantation, July 11th.—Some wagons, provisions, and hospital stores arrived. As soon as the wounded were dressed, and the men had refreshed themselves, we retreated to Col. Dunbar's camp, which was near Rock Fort. The general sent a sergeant's party back with provisions to be left on the road, on the other side of the Yoxhio Geni, for the refreshment of any men who might have lost their way in the woods. Upon our arrival at Col. Dunbar's camp we found it in the greatest confusion. Some of his men had gone off upon hearing of our defeat, and the rest seemed to have forgot all discipline. Several of our detachments had not stopped till they had reached the camp. It was found necessary to clear some of the wagons for the wounded, many of whom were in a desperate situation; and as it was impossible to remove the stores, the howitzer shells, some twelve-pound shot, powder, and provisions were destroyed or buried."

The terror and consternation at Dunbar's camp had been constantly on the increase from the time when the first of the frightened wagoners had galloped in with the alarming news on the morning of the 10th. Through all that day and the following night terrified fugitives from the field, many of them wounded, were continually pouring in, each telling a fearful tale of rout and massacre, and all uniting in the assertion that the French and savages in overwhelming force were following close in the rear. This latter statement was wholly false, for the enemy had made no attempt at pursuit from the shores of the Monongahela; but the tale was believed, and its effect was an uncontrollable panic at the camp.

On the arrival of Capt. Stewart with his escort, bearing the wounded general, a decision was at once arrived at to retreat without delay to Fort Cumberland, destroying everything which could not be carried. It was a strange proceeding, and one which must now appear cowardly, for an army of fully a thousand men, many of them veteran soldiers, with sufficient artillery and an abundance of ammunition, to abandon a mountain position which might soon and easily have been rendered impregnable, and to fly before the imaginary pursuit by an enemy which was greatly inferior in numbers, and had already retired in the opposite direction. But if the retreat was to be made, then it was necessary to destroy nearly everything except a meagre supply of provisions, for there was barely transportation enough for the sick and wounded, who numbered more than three hundred. There were more than enough wagons to carry everything, but the number of horses was small, many of the best having been ridden away by the frightened wagoners and other fugitives, and most of those sent forward with the trains of the advance column having been captured by the enemy.

The work of destruction and preparation for retreat were commenced immediately, and completed on the 12th. The howitzers and every other artillery piece except two were burst, as were also a great part of the shells. Some of the shells and nearly all the solid shot were buried. A great number of wagons (having no horses to draw them) were burned. Only a small part of the provisions was saved for the march, most of them being destroyed by burning, or thrown into the little pond of water that had been formed by damming the spring a short distance below the camp. The powder-casks were opened, and their contents—stated at fifty thousand pounds of powder—thrown into the pool. Of all the immense quantity of material and stores which had with such great expense and labor been transported across the Alleghenies, and to the top of Laurel Hill, there was only saved the least amount that could possibly meet the necessities of the retreat to Cumberland.

It has been generally believed that the artillery pieces were not burst, but buried at Dunbar's camp, as well as a great deal of other property. Stories were told, too, that a large amount of money was buried there by Dunbar on the eve of his retreat. As to the statement concerning the burial of the cannon, it was indorsed by and perhaps originated with Col. Burd;[1] but it was disproved by a letter dated Aug. 21, 1755, addressed to Governor Shirley by Col. Dunbar, and indorsed by his officers, in which they said, "We must beg leave to undeceive you in what you are pleased to mention of guns being buried at the time Gen. Braddock ordered the stores to be destroyed, for there was not a gun of any kind buried."

The question, who was responsible for the disgraceful retreat from Dunbar's camp, and the destruction of the stores and war material at that place, has generally received an answer laying the blame on Dunbar himself; and this appears to be just, though in his letter, above quoted, he mentions the order for the destruction as having been given by Braddock. It is true that the orders were still issued in his name, but the hand of death was already upon him, and he was irresponsible. The command really lay with Col. Dunbar, had he been disposed to take it, as he undoubtedly would readily have done had it not happened that the so-called orders of Braddock were in this instance (and for the first time in all the campaign) in accordance with his wishes.

In regard to the issuance of these orders by the dying commander, and Dunbar's very ready and willing obedience to them, Sargent—who, however, almost contradicts himself in the first and last parts of the extract given below—says, "Braddock's strength was now fast ebbing away. Informed of the disorganized condition of the remaining troops, he abandoned all hope of a prosperous termination to the expedition. He saw that not only death but utter defeat was inevitable. But, conscious of the odium the latter event would excite, he nobly resolved that the sole responsibility of the measure should rest with himself, and consulted with no one upon the steps he pursued. He merely issued his orders, and insisted that they were obeyed. Thus, after destroying the stores to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy (of whose pursuit he did not doubt), the march was to be resumed on Saturday, the 12th of July, towards Wills' Creek. Ill judged as these orders were, they met with too ready acquiescence at the hands of Dunbar, whose advice was neither asked nor tendered on the occasion. . . . For this service—the only instance of alacrity that he displayed in the campaign—Dunbar must not be forgiven. It is not perfectly clear that Braddock intelligently ever gave the orders, but in any case they were not fit for a British officer to give or to obey. Dunbar's duty was to have maintained here his position, or at least not to have contemplated falling back beyond Wills' Creek. That he had not horses to remove his stores was, however, his after-excuse."

The destruction of the guns, ammunition, and stores was finished at Dunbar's camp on the 12th of July, and on the morning of Sunday, the 13th, the retreating troops, composed of Dunbar's command and the remnant of the force that fought on the Monongahela, moved away on the road to Cumberland. They took with them the only artillery pieces that were left (two six-pounders), a small quantity of provisions and hospital stores, and the remaining wagons, nearly all of which were laden with the sick and wounded. The commander-in-chief, now rapidly approaching his end, was borne along with the column. The entry for this day in Capt. Orme's Journal reads: "July 13th.—We marched hence to the camp near the Great Meadows, where the general died."

At the place where Dunbar's troops bivouacked after this day's march, about two miles west of Fort Necessity, at eight o'clock on that midsummer Sunday night, Gen. Braddock breathed his last. He had spoken very little after the time when he was brought from the fatal field. It is related that on the first night he repeated, as if soliloquizing, "Who would have thought it! who would have thought it!" and after that was silent[1] until the fourth day, when he said to Capt. Orme, "We shall better know how to deal with them another time." He spoke no more, and soon after expired; Capt. Stewart, of the light-horse, having never left him from the time he received his wound until after his death. Washington and Orme were also with him at the last moment, and it is said (by Sargent) that shortly before his death the general bequeathed to Washington[2] his favorite charger and his body-servant, Bishop, so well known in after-years as the faithful attendant of the patriot chief.

On the morning of the 14th of July the dead general was buried at the camp where he died, and the artillery pieces, the wagon-train, and the soldiers, moving out to take the road to Wills' Creek, passed over the spot, to obliterate all traces of the new grave,[3] and thus to save it from desecration by the savages,

[1] This conflicts strongly with Sargent's statement that at Dunbar's camp he "issued his orders and insisted that they were obeyed."

[2] Notwithstanding the many absurd accounts which have been given of the disagreements which occurred between Braddock and Washington, and of the insolent and contemptuous manner in which the latter was treated by his chief, all evidence that is found tends to show that there existed between the two a friendship such as is very rarely known as between a commanding general and a mere youth serving under him without military rank, for in this campaign Washington held none, and was consequently never admitted to Braddock's councils of war. He was by the British officers below Braddock contemptuously styled "Mr. Washington," for they disliked him, principally because of the consideration shown him by Braddock, and partly because he was merely a "Virginia buckskin," which latter fact made Braddock's friendship for him all the more galling to them. In later years President Washington, in speaking (see Niles' Register, xiv. p. 179) of Braddock, said, "He was unfortunate, but his character was much too severely treated. He was one of the honestest and best men of the British officers with whom I was acquainted; even in the manner of fighting he was not more to blame than others, for of all that were consulted only one person objected to it. . . . Braddock was both my general and my physician," alluding in the latter remark to the time when he (Washington) had been taken sick near the Little Meadows on the outward march, on which occasion Braddock gave his personal attention to the case, leaving Washington with a sergeant to take care of him, with medicine and directions (given by himself) of how to take it, also with instructions to come on and rejoin him (the general) whenever he should find himself able to do so.

As to the accounts, with which all are familiar, of Washington assuming command after the fall of Braddock, and saving the remnant of the force from destruction, its utter absurdity is made apparent by the extracts which have been given from Capt. Orme's Journal. Washington exercised no command in that campaign, and the only circumstance which can give any color to the story is that some of the Virginians, knowing him as an officer in the militia of that colony, were disposed in the confusion of the battle to follow him in preference to the British officers, who despised their method of backwoods fighting.

[3] The precise spot where Gen. Braddock was buried has never been certainly known. Col. Burd, who visited it in 1759, when on his way to erect Fort Burd, on the Monongahela, said it was about two miles from Fort Necessity, and "about twenty yards from a little hollow, in which there was a small stream of water, and over it a bridge." Gen. Washington said that it had been his purpose to return to the spot and erect a monument to his memory, but that he had no opportunity to do so until after the Revolution, and then, after the most diligent search, he found it impossible to recognize the spot where the general was buried on account of the change in the road and the extension of the clearing.

In 1812 a party of men who were engaged in working on the road dug out, near the bank of the small stream known as Braddock's Run, the bones of a human skeleton, and with them some military trappings; from which latter circumstance the bones were supposed to be those of Braddock, and it is not improbable that they were so, though there is no proof that such was the case. Some of the larger bones were taken away by the people of the vicinity as relics, but these were afterwards collected, and they as well as the others were reinterred about 1820, at the spot which has since been known as "Braddock's Grave," and which was so marked by the words cut or painted on a board which was nailed to a tree over the place of reinterment. This tree has since been cut down, the grave inclosed, and evergreen trees planted over it. The spot is a few rods north of the National road, in Wharton township, Fayette County.

who were expected soon to follow in pursuit. The wagons containing the sick and wounded took the lead, then came the others with the hospital stores and the meagre stock of provisions, then the advance of the infantry column, then the ammunition and guns, and finally the two veteran companies of the Forty-fourth and Forty-eighth British regular regiments, with Stewart's Virginia light-horse as a guard to the rear and flanks. In the evening of the same day the Youghiogheny River was crossed by the last men of the force, and the rear-guard bivouacked for the night on the eastern side of the stream.

It seems that the progress made on the retreat was very rapid, for, although Braddock's road was rough and in many places barely passable, the head of the wagon-train bearing the wounded and sick arrived at Cumberland on the 17th, and three days later the last of Dunbar's soldiers reached the fort and lighted their bivouac fires within the range of its guns.

The expedition of Braddock, from which such brilliant results had been expected, had proved a dismal and bloody failure. The objective-point (Fort Du Quesne) was still held by the French, who, with their Indian allies, soon extended their domination over the country lying to the southeast. Gaining courage from their victory, they came to Dunbar's camp a week or two after his forces had left it, and there completed the little work of destruction which he had left undone. They held complete possession and sway from the Ohio to the Potomac. There was not left west of the mountains in this region a single settler or trader other than those who were favorable to the French and their interests. And this state of things continued in the country west of the Alleghenies for more than three years from the time of Braddock's defeat on the Monongahela.

CHAPTER V.

INCURSIONS AND RAVAGES DURING THE FRENCH OCCUPATION — CAPTURE OF FORT DU QUESNE AND EXPULSION OF THE FRENCH—EXPEDITIONS UNDER BOUQUET.

Soon after the French had succeeded in expelling the English forces from the region of country west of the Alleghenies, and establishing themselves in the absolute possession of that territory, they reduced their force at Fort Du Quesne, sending a part of it to Venango and other northern posts, and many of their Indian allies scattered and returned to their homes, being in a state of discontent and incipient disaffection, though still holding to their French allegiance. But it soon became apparent that they had no intention to be at peace with the English, for within a little more than two months from the time of Dunbar's retreat the Shawanese, and the Delawares under King Shingiss, had advanced eastward to the Alleghenies, and made incursions beyond that range. About the 25th of September a body of one hundred and sixty Indians (afterwards found to be Shawanese and Delawares under command of Shingiss) set out from Fort Du Quesne and its vicinity on an expedition against the English, and a few days later they burst upon the defenseless people of the Maryland and Virginia settlements. On the 4th of October, Capt. William Trent wrote Col. James Burd, at Shippensburg: "Last night came to the Mill at Wolgomoth's an Express going to the Governor of Maryland with an account of the Inhabitants being out on Patterson's Creek; and about the Fort (Cumberland), the Express says, there is forty killed and taken, and that one whole family was burnt to death in an house. The Indians destroy all before them, firing Houses, Barns, Stackyards, and everything that will burn." A week later Governor Sharpe, of Maryland, wrote the Governor of Pennsylvania: "Within a few days I have received several Letters by express from Captain Dagworthy, who commands the Garrison consisting of one hundred and thirty-seven men at Fort Cumberland, and from some other people, advising me that the Indians have, since the 1st instant, cut off a great many families who lived near Fort Cumberland, and on both sides of Powtowmack, some miles eastward of the Fort. It is supposed that near one hundred persons have been murdered or carried away Prisoners by these barbarians, who have burnt the Houses and ravaged all the plantations in that part of the Country. Parties of the enemy appear within sight of Fort Cumberland every day, and frequently in greater numbers than the Garrison consists of. As I presume it will not be long before these people pay a visit to your borders, I take this opportunity of intimating what I think may be expected."

The first blow struck by the Indians within the bounds of Pennsylvania was on the 18th of October, when they attacked the settlements on Mahanoy or John Penn's Creek, that flows into the Susquehanna about five miles below the confluence of the North and West Branches. Information of this incursion was sent to Governor Morris on the 22d by Conrad Weiser. "I take this opportunity," he said, "to inform you I received news from Shamokin that six families have been murdered on John Penn's Creek, on the west side of Susquehanna, about four miles from that river; several people have been found scalped, and twenty-eight are missing; the people are in a great consternation, and are coming down, leaving the Plantations and corn behind them."

On the 23d of October a party of white settlers (forty-six in number) who had been to Shamokin to ascertain if possible where the party came from who did the murderous work on Penn's Creek were on their return fired on from an ambush, and four killed, four drowned in attempting to swim the river, and the rest put to flight. Upon this "all the settlements between Shamokin and Hunter's Mill, for the space of fifty miles along the River Sasquehannah, were deserted." Adam Terrence, one of the white party who were fired on, said, "As I understood the Delaware tongue, I heard several of the Indians that were engaged against us speak a good many words in that tongue during the action." The savages who attacked were supposed to be a part of a force mentioned by Governor Morris in a letter to the Governor of Virginia, dated October 29th. He said, "I have received Intelligence that a large body of French and Indians were seen to pass the Allegheny Mountains, moving towards the Inhabitants of this Province, and that a party of them have since passed the Susquehannah, and killed all before them, and were within five miles of Harris' Ferry [Harrisburg]. The people are mostly without arms, and struck with such a panick that they flee as fast as they can from their habitations." On the same date, John Harris, of Paxton, said in a letter to Edward Shippen, of Lancaster, "The Indians is cutting us off every day, and I had a certain account [from Andrew Montour] of about fifteen hundred Indians beside French being on their march against us and Virginia, and now close to our borders, their Scouts Scalping our Families on our Frontiers daily. . . . I am informed that a French officer was expected at Shamokin this week with a party of Delawares and Shawanese, no doubt to take possession of our River; and as to the state of the Sasquehannah Indians, a great part of them is actually in the French Interest."

In the morning of Sunday, the 2d of November, the Indian allies of the French attacked the Great Cove settlement, in Cumberland County, killed six persons, and carried away seventeen prisoners. On the same day Benjamin Chambers wrote from Fallow Spring:[1]

"To the Inhabitants of the Lower Part of the County of Cumberland. If you intend to go to the assistance of your neighbours, you need not wait any longer for the Certainty of News. The Great Cove is destroyed. James Campbell left this Company last night and went to the Fort at Mr. Steel's Meeting-House, and there saw some of the Inhabitants of the Great Cove, who gave this account, that as they came over the Hill they saw their houses in flames. The messenger says there is but one hundred, and that they divided into two parts, the one part to go against the Cove, and the other against the Conolloways, and that there are no French among them. They are Delawares and Shawanese. The part that came against the Cove are under the command of Shingis, the Delaware King. The people of the Cove that came off saw several men lying dead; they heard the murder shout and the firing of Guns, and saw the Indians going into the Houses that they had come out of before they left sight of the Cove. I have sent express to Marsh Creek at the same time that I send this, so I expect there will be a good Company from there this day, and as there is but one hundred of the Enemy, I think it is in our power (if God permit) to put them to flight if you turn out well from your parts."

On the day following the massacre and burning at Great Cove the settlements at Little Cove and Conolloways were attacked, all the houses burned, and several persons carried away as prisoners. Mr. Potter, sheriff of Cumberland County, reported "that of ninety-three families which were settled in the two Coves and the Conolloways forty-seven were either killed or taken and the rest deserted."

On Sunday, the 16th of November, the Indians, having penetrated Berks County, attacked the settlements only a few miles from the town of Reading, murdering and burning as before. A letter dated at Reading on that day, written by Edward Biddle to his father in Philadelphia, said, "I am in so much horror and confusion I scarce know what I am writing. The drum is beating to arms, and bells ringing and all the people under arms. Within these two hours we have had different though too uncertain accounts, all corroborating each other, and this moment is an express arrived, dispatch from Michael Reis at Tulpehoccon, eighteen miles above this town, who left about thirty of their people engaged with about an equal number of Indians at the said Reis'. This night we expect an attack, and truly alarming is our situation. . . . I have rather lessened than exaggerated our melancholy account." On the 18th the Governor notified the mayor and corporation of Philadelphia as follows: "I have received intelligence that the Indians have fallen upon the settlements at Tulpehoccon; that they had slaughtered many of the Inhabitants and laid waste the country, and were moving towards the Town of Reading, which is within Sixty Miles of this city; and though I am in hopes their cruel progress will be stopped long before they can come hither, yet as I can get no certain intelligence of their strength, or of the number of Frenchmen that are among them, I think it my duty to take every cautionary measure in my power for the preservation and safety of the people and the province."

Passing on from Berks into Northampton County, the French and Indian force on the 21st of November attacked the Moravian settlement of Gnadenhutten, on the Lehigh. "Six of the Moravians were killed, and their dwelling-houses, meeting-house, and all their outhouses burnt to ashes, with all the Grain, Hay, Horses, and upwards of forty head of fat cattle that were under cover." On the 11th of December the enemy, about two hundred strong, attacked Brodhead's plantation and other settlements in the vicinity of the Delaware Water Gap, killed several families and laid the country waste. On the 29th the secretary of the Council presented to that body an account of Indian outrages committed since the first outbreak east of the mountains on the 18th of October. In the closing part of this account he said, "During all this Month [December] the Indians have been burning and destroying all before them in the county of Northampton, and have already burned fifty houses here, murdered above one hundred persons, and are still continuing their ravages, murders, and devastations, and have actually overrun and laid waste a great part of that County, even as far as within twenty miles of Easton, its chief town. And a large body of Indians, under French officers, have fixed their headquarters within the borders of that county, for the better security of their prisoners and plunder. . . . All our frontier country, which extends from the River Patowmac to the River Delaware, not less than one hundred and fifty miles in length and between twenty and thirty in breadth, but not fully settled, has been entirely deserted, the houses and improvements reduced to ashes, the cattle, horses, grain, goods, and effects of the inhabitants either destroyed, burned, or carried off by the Indians.

"All our accounts agree in this, that the French, since the defeat of Gen. Braddock, have gained over to their interest the Delawares, Shawanese, and many other Indian nations formerly in our alliance, and on whom, through fear and their large promises of rewards for scalps, and assurances of reinstating them in the possession of the lands they have sold to the English, they have prevailed to take up arms against us, and to join heartily with them in the execution of the ground they have been long meditating, the possession of all the country between the river Ohio and the river Susquehanna, and to secure that possession by building a strong fort at Shamokin, which, by its so advantageous situation at the conflux of the two main branches of Susquehannah (one whereof interlocks with the waters of the Ohio and the other heads in the centre of the country of the Six Nations) will command, and make the French entire masters of all that extensive, rich, and fertile country, and of all the trade with the Indians, and from whence they can at pleasure enter and annoy our territories, and put an effectual stop to the future extension of our settlement on that quarter, not to mention the many other obvious mischiefs and fatal consequences that must attend their having a fort at Shamokin. Note.—Some Fachines have lately been discovered floating down the river Susquehannah, a little below Shamokin, by which, as the Indians were never known to use Fachines, it is conjectured the French have begun, and are actually building a fort at that most important place."

In the spring of 1756 the enemy continued their depredations. McCord's block-house, on Conococheague, was attacked and burned by savages, and twenty-seven persons killed or captured. The marauding party was pursued and a part of it overtaken at Sideling Hill, where a fight ensued and the whites were repulsed with severe loss. About the 1st of April a party of French and Indians, discovered in the vicinity of Fort Cumberland, were attacked by a party from the fort, and the French commander was killed and scalped. In his pocket were found the following instructions from Monsieur Dumas, who had recently superseded Contrecœur as commandant at Fort Du Quesne:

"Fort Du Quesne, 23d March, 1756.

"The Sieur Donville, at the head of a detachment of fifty Indians, is ordered to go and observe the motions of the enemy in the neighborhood of Fort Cumberland. He will endeavor to harass their convoys and burn their magazines at Gonokocheagun (Conococheague should this be practicable. He must use every effort to take prisoners, who may confirm what we already know of the enemy's designs. The Sieur Donville will employ all his talents and all his credit to prevent the savages from committing cruelties upon those who may fall into their hands. Honor and humanity ought in this respect to serve as our guide.

"Dumas."

In view of the numerous and bloody forays of the French and Indians into the country east of the Alleghenies, and in deference to the demands of the people of that region, the Governor of Pennsylvania, with the advice and consent of the Council, issued on the 14th of April a proclamation, declaring war against the Delaware nation[1] and offering rewards for scalps and prisoners, as follows: "For every male Indian enemy over twelve years of age as prisoner, one hundred and fifty Spanish dollars or Pieces of Eight; for the Scalp of any such, one hundred and thirty Spanish dollars or Pieces of Eight; for every female Indian prisoner, and for every male Indian prisoner under twelve years, one hundred and thirty Pieces of Eight; for the scalp of every Indian woman, produced as evidence of being killed, fifty Pieces of Eight; and for every English subject that has been taken and carried from this Province into captivity, and recovered and brought to Philadelphia to the Governor, one hundred and fifty Pieces of Eight, but nothing for their scalps;" these rewards to be paid out of the appropriation of sixty thousand pounds then recently granted by the Assembly for the use of His Majesty, and which was placed at the Governor's disposal for that and other purposes of defense.

Soon after the declaration of war against the Delawares, Governor Morris received a letter from Sir William Johnson, deprecating the action that had been taken, because of the bad effect it might produce among the Indians of the Six Nations, and on that account asking a postponement of hostilities under the declaration. To this communication the Governor made reply by letter dated April 24, 1756,[2] in which he said,—

"You cannot conceive what Havock has been made by the Enemy in this defenceless Province, nor what Numbers of Murders they have committed, what a vast Tract of Territory they have laid waste, and what a Multitude of Inhabitants, of all ages and both sexes, they have carried into Captivity; by Information of several of the Prisoners who made their Escape from them, I can assure you that there are not less than three hundred of our People in Servitude to them and the French on

[1] The Delawares had long been friends of the English, and continued to be so regarded up to the commencement of the murderous outrages committed by them under lead of their king, Shingiss. The Shawanese were regarded as enemies without any formal declaration to that effect.

[2] Colonial Records, vii. 97–98.

the Ohio [meaning, however, more particularly the Allegheny, which was then called Ohio to its head-waters], the most of them at Shingas' Town, called Kittaning, about thirty Miles above Fort Duquesne; and Scarryoddy and Montour must have acquainted you that they saw more or less English Prisoners in almost every one of the Delaware towns on the Susquehannah as high up as Diahoga.

"At first the enemy appeared in small Parties and committed their Outrages where they could do it with most Safety to themselves, but of late they have penetrated to the inhabited Part of the Country in larger Bodies, and have defeated several Detachments of our armed Forces, burned and laid waste whole Countries, and spread a general Terror amongst us, so that I have been constrained to yield to the importunate Demands of the enraged People (not being able otherwise to afford them a sufficient Protection for want of Arms, Ammunition, and an equal and compulsory Militia Law) to delare the Delaware Nation Enemies and Rebels to his Majesty, and to offer large Rewards for Prisoners and Scalps, hoping that this would engage such of our Inhabitants as had any Courage left, as well as all others in the neighboring Provinces, to hunt, pursue, and attack them in their own country, and by these means keep them at home for the Defense of their own Towns, and prevent the total Desertion of the Back Counties, which there is good Reason to be apprehensive of. . . . You may be assured, Sir, that a Peace on honourable Terms will be extremely acceptable, as we form this charitable Opinion of the Delawares, that they were hurried into this Measure by the Artifices and Intimidations of the French, and did always believe when they came to open their eyes they would relent and cease injuring their innocent Brethren and allies, who have never hurt them either in Thought or Action. It was this opinion of that good Disposition towards us that influenced us to suffer so long their hostilities without declaring them Enemies, until the Blood streamed in such Quantities down our Mountains and filled the Vallies to such a Degree that we could no longer delay the Publication of their horrid Cruelties.

"I do not perceive that any of the Delawares living on the Ohio came to the Meeting appointed by the Deputies of the Six Nations, or that they have been spoke to; and they are, as you know, the most numerous of all. Indeed, the main body of the Delawares live at Kittaning and the other Delaware towns on and beyond the Ohio, and have been the most mischievous, and do still, even so late as last Week, continue to murder and destroy our Inhabitants, treating them with the most barbarous Inhumanity that can be conceived. . . .

"A Party of Delawares lately done some Mischief in Potomac; they were headed by a French officer, who was killed, and the Party routed;[1] and in the Officer's Pocket was found a Paper of Instructions from the French Commandant, Monsieur Dumas, at Fort Du Quesne, ordering him to burn and destroy what he could meet with on that River; from the Ohio therefore we must expect the greatest Mischief, and all means possible should be used to separate the Delawares and Shawanese from the French there, and prevail with them not to join in burning, ravaging, and laying waste our Frontier Counties."

The matter of Sir William Johnson's protest against the declaration of war upon the Delawares was brought to the attention of the Council, whereupon

"It was then Considered, as the Delawares on the Ohio were still in open Warr, and a Grand attack might be expected to be made this Month from that Quarter on the Frontier Inhabitants, whether the Cessation should extend to them; and it was after Long consultation agreed that it should; but an Account coming from the Postmaster at Annapolis that these Indians had Penetrated and Were Destroying the Inhabitants of Virginia, twelve miles Within Winchester and Conolloways, and a Great part of Conegocheague, and had very lately Defeated forty Regular Forces of Fort Cumberland, and were Determined to attack that fort, the Matter was reconsidered, and Agreed to advise the Governor to Confine the Cessation of arms to the Sasquehannah Indians."

Intelligence of the above-mentioned foray into Maryland and Virginia by the French from Fort Du Quesne, with their Delaware and Shawanese allies, was communicated by Governor Dinwiddie, of Virginia, to the Governor of Pennsylvania in a letter dated Williamsburg, April 30, 1756, as follows:

"Sir,—This is to Inform you of the miserable Situation of our Affairs on our Frontiers; the French and Indians have cutt off the communication from Fort Cumberland to Winchester, have Committed many Cruel Robberies, murders, and Devastation among the poor back Settlers, and by the last Letters they have invested the Town of Winchester with a great number of their People, and they further report that they have besieged Fort Cumberland with five hundred Men, French and Indians.

"This Disagreeable News obliged me to Give Orders for summonsing the Militia of Eleven Contiguous Counties to Winchester, and I hope, when Collected together, they will amount to four thousand men, who I have ordered to march directly for Winchester, to repel the Fury of the Invaders, and protect our back Settlements, which will answer, I hope, my expectations.

"The Expedition against the Shawanese proved unsuccessful after Six Weeks' march in the Woods. The Rivers they were to Cross were much swelled by the fall of Rain and Snow; they lost several Canoes with Provisions and Ammunition, on which they were forced to return in a Starving Condition, killing their Horses for food."

In July the Indians in strong force, headed by King Shingiss, appeared at Fort Granville[2] (near the present site of Lewistown), stormed it, killed several whites, and took a number of prisoners, whom they carried to Kittaning, an Indian village on the Allegheny, at or near the site of the present town of the same name in Armstrong County. This Indian Kittaning was at that time the residence of King Shingiss, as also of the redoubtable Delaware chief, Captain Jacob, both of whom had been among the most prominent of the Indian leaders of murdering parties in this and the preceding year. To this place the French sent ammunition and supplies for their savage allies, and it was a principal rendezvous from which Indian war parties made their bloody forays into the settlements. For these reasons it was decided to send an expedition against the Delaware stronghold to destroy it if possible; and Lieut.-Col. John Armstrong, who commanded the eight companies of the Second Pennsylvania Battalion stationed west of the Susquehanna, was designated as the commander for the campaign.

[1] This was the fight at Sideling Hill with the French and Indians under the Sieur Donville, who was killed, as before mentioned. The instructions found on his person have also already been given.

[2] To afford some degree of security against the incursions of the French and Indians, the province of Pennsylvania built, at a total expense of £85,000, a chain of forts and block-houses, extending across the province from the Delaware to the Maryland line, commanding the principal passes of the mountains. On the east side of the Susquehanna, and extending to the Delaware, were Forts Depui, Lehigh, Allen, Everitt, Williams, Henry, Swatara, Hunter, Halifax, and Augusta. West of the Susquehanna were Fort Louther, at Carlisle; Forts Morris and Franklin, at Shippensburg; Fort Granville; Fort Shirley, on a branch of the Juniata; Fort Lyttleton; and Fort Loudoun, on Conococheague Creek. Lieut.-Col. John Armstrong, with eight companies of Pennsylvania troops, was stationed on the west side of the Susquehanna

Col. Armstrong accordingly marched from Fort Shirley (in what is now Huntington County) on the 30th of August with a force of about two hundred men, a body of about one hundred having previously been advanced as scouts.[1] On the 3d of September, at the Beaver Dams, they came up with the advance party, who reported fresh Indian tracks found two or three miles from that place, as also the marks of an Indian camp recently vacated. On the 6th the force of Col. Armstrong was within fifty miles of Kittaning, and scouts were sent ahead to reconnoitre the place. The party consisted of an officer, two rangers, and a guide supposed to be acquainted with the country. It appears that they made quick work, for on the following day the advancing column met them returning with the report that the path was clear, "and that they had the greatest reason to believe they were not discovered; but from the rest of the intelligence they gave it appeared they had not been nigh enough the town, either to perceive the true situation of it, the number of the enemy, or what way it might be most advantageously attacked."[2] This was on the 7th. After receiving the report of the reconnoitring party the march was continued, and though the route was "rough and incommodious, on account of the stones and fallen timber," a total distance of thirty miles was made on that day, and a "little before the setting of the moon" the front reached the Allegheny about one hundred perches below the main body of the town," where there came to the ears of the wearied troops "the beating of the drum and the whooping of the warriors at their dances."

The attack was made on the following morning, the Indians in the town being apparently wholly unaware of the approach of an enemy. Captain Jacob was present in the town, and at the first alarm of attack gave the war-whoop, and called out in a loud voice that "the white men have come at last, and we will have scalps enough," but at the same time took the precaution to order the squaws and children to take to the woods. The house where this warrior lived was the rallying-point for the Indians, a sort of citadel, from which the fire on the attacking party was constant and severe. Col. Armstrong thereupon caused the neighbor houses to be set on fire, and the flames spread rapidly through the town, finally enveloping the stronghold of the chief Jacob, who "tumbled himself out of the garret or cock-loft window, at which he was shot," or at least was supposed to be, for the white prisoners afterwards liberated in the town were willing "to be qualified to the powder-horn and pouch there taken off him, which they say he had lately got from a French officer in exchange for Lieut. Armstrong's boots, which he carried from Fort Granville, where the lieutenant was killed," and the same prisoners said they were "perfectly assured of his scalp, as no other Indians wore their hair in the same manner. They also said they knew his squaw's scalp by a particular bob, and also knew the scalp of a young Indian called the King's Son."

"During the burning of the houses," said Col. Armstrong, "which were nearly thirty in number, we were agreeably entertained with a quick succession of charged guns gradually firing off as they reached the fire, but more so with the explosion of sundry bags and large kegs of gunpowder, wherewith almost every house abounded, the prisoners afterwards informing that the Indians had frequently said they had a sufficient stock of ammunition for ten years to war with the English. . . . There was also a great quantity of goods burnt, which the Indians had received but ten days before from the French."

The attack on "the Kittaning" by Col. Armstrong was evidently either badly planned or badly executed. The town was destroyed by fire it is true, but the greater number of Indians who were in it at the time of the assault escaped, and a considerable body of their warriors attacked Armstrong's forces on their return soon after they left the ruins of the town. The loss of the Indians was unknown. That of the whites was seventeen killed, thirteen wounded,[3] and nineteen missing in the assault and subsequent fight. The results of the campaign were the destruction of the Indian rendezvous of Kittaning, with large quantities of ammunition and stores, the release of eleven English prisoners who had been captured east of the mountains by Shingiss' and Captain Jacob's bands. Jacob was supposed to be among the killed at the burning of the town, but this was afterwards found to be a mistake. He was alive in 1764, and present at a conference held by the Indians with Col. Bouquet on the Muskingum in that year. Shingiss was absent at the time of the attack, and, as was said by the prisoners, to have been expected to come down the river that very day with a large party of Delawares and French to Kittaning, where they were to be joined by Captain Jacob and his band, and all were to proceed across the Alleghenies, intending to attack Fort Shirley. A considerable party of Indians from Kittaning had already gone forward for the purpose of scouting and reconnoitring that fort, which accounts for the comparatively small number of Indians in the town when Armstrong attacked it.

The destruction of Kittaning caused great rejoicing in the settlements,[4] and corresponding depression

[1] His entire force numbered three hundred and seven men.

[2] Col. Armstrong's Report.

[3] Among the wounded was Capt. (afterwards general) Hugh Mercer, who was killed Jan. 3, 1777, at the battle of Princeton. Col. Armstrong, the leader of the Kittaning expedition, was also wounded in the assault on the Indian town.

[4] The corporation of the city of Philadelphia passed a vote of thanks to Col. Armstrong and the officers engaged with him in the Kittaning expedition "for the courage and conduct shown by them on that occasion." The sum of £150 was voted by the corporation, to be applied in part to the purchase of "pieces of plate, swords, or other things suitable for presents to the said officers," and in part to the relief of the widows and dismay among the hostile Indians. To them it was a severe blow. They were amazed to find that the white settlers, whom they had supposed to be cowering behind their stockades east of the mountains, had suddenly and boldly advanced into the wilderness and destroyed the Indian stronghold, with all its accumulated supplies and munitions of war.

After the destruction of old Kittaning the French used every means in their power to goad the Indians to further bloodshed and hostility against the English, to avenge the destruction of their principal town and the killing of their kindred; but they did not readily respond to these appeals, and for a long time they refused to go out in parties against the Eastern settlements, fearing that another blow might fall on their villages during their absence. "Such of them as belonged to Kittaning and had escaped the carnage refused to settle again on the east of Fort Du Quesne, and very wisely resolved to place that fortress and the French garrison between them and the English."[1] They had also begun to show no little dissatisfaction with the French, on account of the meagre return which they were receiving for their services on the war-path, and symptoms of open disaffection were becoming apparent. This is shown in a statement made by one John Cox (an escaped prisoner from Kittaning,) which is found in the minutes of the proceedings of the Council at a meeting of that body on Tuesday, Sept. 6, 1756,[2] as follows:

"Mr. Joseph Armstrong, Member of Assembly, and Mr. Adam Hoops, Commissary of Provisions for the Supply of the Forces in Cumberland County, Attending with a Young Man who was taken Prisoner by the Indians and had made his escape; they were examined as to the Truth of the several matters mentioned in the Petitions, and they confirmed the same, saying further that a Year ago there were three thousand Men fit to bear Arms, livers in that County, and now exclusive of the Provincial Forces they were certain they did not amount to an hundred; that there never was in the memory of Man a more abundant harvest; that after the burning of Fort Granville by the Indians (which was done while the country people, guarded by Detachments of the Forces, were employed in reaping) the Farmers abandoned their Plantations, and left what Corn was not then stacked or carried into Barns to perish on the Ground. . . .

"Then the Young Man, one John Cox, a son of the Widow Cox, who had made his escape from Kittanin, gave the following information: That himself, his brother Richard, and John Craig in the beginning of February last were taken by nine Delaware Indians from a Plantation two Miles from McDowell's Mill, and carried to the Kittaning Town on the Ohio; that on his way thither he met Shingas [the Delaware king] with a Party of thirty Men, and afterwards with Captain Jacobs and fifteen, who were going on a Design to destroy the Settlements in Conegochege: that when He arrived at Kittanin, he saw there about one hundred fighting Men of the Delaware Tribe, with their Families, and about Fifty English Prisoners, consisting of Men, Women, and children; that during his stay there, Shingas' and Jacob's Parties returned, the one with nine Scalps and ten Prisoners, the other with several Scalps and five prisoners, and that another Company of eighteen came from Diahogo with seventeen Scalps fixed on a Pole, and carried them to Fort Du Quesne to obtain their reward. . . .

"That they (the Delawares) with the prisoners during the whole summer have been in a starving condition, having very little Venison and corn, and reduced to the necessity of living upon Dog Flesh and the few Roots and Berrys they could collect in the Woods;[3] that several of the Prisoners have dyed for want of Food; That six Weeks ago about one hundred Indians went off from the Susquehanna to the Ohio for a Supply of Provisions and Ammunition, and were expected back in thirty days; That while they were in this distressed Situation they talked several times of making Peace with the English, and many of them observed that it was better to do so than starve, for that the Rewards the French gave were not sufficient to support them, not having received from them more than one loaf of Bread for each Scalp. But that old Makomesy, his [Cox's] Master and one of their chiefs, endeavored to dissuade them from entering into any peaceable Measures with the English, and had constantly encouraged them to continue the War; That while these things were in Agitation an Indian chief came among them, and informed them that the Mingoes could live with the English and be furnished with Provisions and every thing they wanted, while the Delawares were starving for carrying on the war against them. That about thirty days ago he saw several of the Indians going away, with an Intention (as he was informed) to know of the Governor of Pennsylvania whether the English would agree to make peace; but that he was told by Makomesy they were only gone to see whether the English were strong, and to get Provisions from them. . . ."

This prisoner had escaped from the Indians on the 14th of August, and reached Fort Augusta in safety. "The poor Boy," says the record, "was extremely reduced, had dangerous swellings on his Body, and and children of men who lost their lives in the campaign. To the commanding officer was presented a medal of honor, bearing the legend, "Kittaning destroyed by Colonel Armstrong, September, 1756," and on the reverse another, "The gift of the Corporation of the City of Philadelphia."

[1] Early History of Western Pennsylvania.

[2] Col. Rec., vii. p. 241.

[3] It does not seem clear how the Indians could have been reduced to this starving condition when the region which they had ravaged, and from which they had driven away the white settlers, had been blessed (as appears by the preceding statement of Armstrong and Hoops) with the most abundant harvest known in the memory of man.

was in a sickly condition. The Governor therefore ordered him lodging and the attendance of a Doctor."

The account which came to Philadelphia of disaffection among the Indians towards the French, and an apparent inclination to make peace with the English, caused the Governor and Council to declare on the 10th of September a suspension of hostilities against the Delawares and Shawanese, and in January, 1757, this was extended for a further period of fifty days. Finally, on the 4th of August, at a treaty council held at Easton, Pa., with Teedyuscung, the king of the Eastern Delawares, a peace was concluded, and messengers were at once sent by the king to proclaim it to the Delawares at the head of the Ohio. "Menatochyand and Netowatquelemond, two of the Principal Men of the Ohio Indians," received the news favorably; they acknowledged that they had been deluded by the French, and they returned this message to Teedyuscung: "We have heard of the good work of peace you have made with our brethren the English, and that you intend to hold it fast. We will not lift up our hatchet to break that good work you have been transacting." King Shingiss, however, did not return any such assurances, but remained hostile, and held a large body of the Delawares with him. The Shawanese also continued hostile, and acted with the French, though considerably disaffected towards them.

Meanwhile the Governor of Virginia had formed an alliance with the Cherokee Indians of the South, by which the services of a large number of their warriors were secured to act against the French and their savage allies. These Cherokees were sent out in parties under white officers to scout in the vicinity of the French fort and bring intelligence of the movements there. The first of these parties (being also the first force sent by the English to the vicinity of Fort Du Quesne after Braddock's defeat) left Fort Cumberland in the latter part of May, 1757, and returned on the 8th of June. What they did during their expedition is told in a letter written on the 15th of June by Col. George Washington to Col. Stanwix, at Fort Loudon, as follows:

"I have the pleasure to inform you that a scouting Party consisting of 5 Soldiers and 15 Cherokee Indians that were sent out the 20th ult°. towards the Ohio under Lieut. Baker,[1] returned on the 8th Instant to Fort Cumberland with 5 Scalps, and a French Officer Prisoner, having killed two other Officers of the said Party. Mr. Baker met with this Party, viz., Ten French, Three Officers, on the Head of Turtle Creek, 2 Miles from Fort Duquesne (the day after they had parted with 50 Shawanese Indians returning from the War), And would have killed and made Prisoners of them all had it not been for the Death of the Indian chief, who being killed prevented his Men from pursuing them. One other Indian was wounded and brought in upon a Bier near 100 Miles by the Party, who had nothing to live upon for the four last Days but wild Onions. . . . Capt. Spottswood with 10 Soldiers and 20 Indians, who went out at the same Time with but to a different Place from Lt. Baker, is not yet come in, nor any News of him, which makes me Uneasy."

On June 14th another Cherokee party brought to Fort Cumberland the alarming news that a large French force was marching towards that fort from the Ohio.[2] In a letter written at Winchester, Va., June 16th, by Capt. William Trent to William Cox,[3] the writer said,—

"By an Express arrived here last Night from Capt. Dagworthy, at Fort Cumberland, we learn that Six Cherokees were arrived there, who report that they lay about Fort Duquesne some Days, where they saw a large Body of French and Indians and a great Number of Carriages and Horses. That they were obliged to go a Distance from there in order to hunt, as they were afraid to shoot nigh the Fort, and could get nothing to kill with their Bows and Arrows. After they had got some Provisions they returned to the Fort, where they stayed till they see them set off, and dogged them till they crossed the Monongahela at the Place where Gen. Braddock was defeated; then they sent off these Cherokees with the News, and the rest of the Party followed them in order to send Intelligence from Time to Time of their Motions. The Virginians in these Parts have not above 230 Soldiers. Col. Washington is sending off to raise the Militia. There is about 80 Indians in these Parts. A Party of Cherokees fell in with Ten ffrench Men, killed and took Six, Four of which were Commissioned Officers; One Officer, the only Prisoner they saved, is expected in Town to-night; The Swallow Warrior was killed and his Son wounded, which was the rea-

[1] An account of another small reconnoitring party that was sent toward Fort Du Quesne a short time afterwards is found in Sparks (ii. 283), in one of Washington's letters, dated May, 1758, as follows: "An Indian named Ucahula was sent from Fort Loudon with a party of six soldiers and thirty Indians, under command of Lieut. Gist. After great fatigues and suffering, occasioned by the snows on the Allegheny Mountains, they reached the Monongahela River (at the mouth of the Redstone), where Lieut. Gist, by a fall from a precipice, was rendered unable to proceed, and the party separated. Ucahula, with two other Indians, descended the Monongahela in a bark canoe till they came near Fort Du Quesne. Here they left their canoe, and concealed themselves on the margin of the river till they had an opportunity of attacking two Frenchmen, whom they killed and scalped. These scalps were brought to Fort Loudon by Ucahula."

[2] A letter from Governor Sharpe, of Maryland, to Governor Denny, of Pennsylvania, dated the 14th of July (1757), stated "that one Street, who was taken at Fort Granville by the French, and carried to a Place near Fort Duquesne, and was afterwards in the Fort, and had made his Escape from thence with a Negro Man, was examined on Oath, and on Examination declared that about a month before the Garrison in that Place consisted of between three and four hundred French and a few Indians; they were afterwards reinforced with two hundred French from the Mississippi in twelve Boats; that Seven Hundred more were expected from a Fort on the Lake, with a Train of Artillery, and that an Expedition was intended against these Provinces, to be conducted by the Officers from the Mississippi."—Minutes of the Provincial Council, Colonial Records, vol. vii. p. 716.

son of their killing the Prisoners. 'Tis said the French Army consists of Two Thousand. . . . This Night I expect the French Army is at the Little Meadows, about 20 miles from [west of] Fort Cumberland."

This report of the approach of a strong French force created a general alarm. On the 16th, Washington again wrote Col. Stanwix, saying that if the enemy was coming in such numbers, and with a large train of artillery as reported, Fort Cumberland must inevitably fall into their hands, after which they would without doubt march to the investment of Fort Loudon, where there was a very large amount of stores insufficiently guarded, and he plainly intimated his belief that they would have little difficulty in also capturing that work and the magazines. It soon appeared, however, that the first report had been considerably exaggerated. On the 17th, Capt. Dagworthy, commandant at Fort Cumberland, wrote Col. Stanwix the following further information in the matter,[1] viz.: "Yesterday in the evening Six Indians from Fort Du Quesne, who left that Place last Sunday, and brought with them two Scalps, which they took within a Hundred Yards of the Fort. I learn from them that the ffiring of the Cannon and small Arms which I mentioned in my last was occasioned by a large scouting Party leaving that Place to come this Way. They say the Indians who came in before made a false Report as to their bringing Waggons and Artillery, and account for it by their being Young Warriors and much frightened; this last Party lay some time in Sight of the Fort, but could not discover either Waggons or Horses, and but few Men."

But it is probable that the reason why the first report was so much exaggerated was not so much because the Cherokees who brought it were young warriors and frightened as because Capt. Dagworthy had no competent interpreter to inform him of what they really said. This, at least, was the view taken of the case by George Croghan, and expressed by him in a letter to Col. Armstrong, dated June 28th, in which he says, "I have seen some of both Parties of Indians that brought the Intelligence of the March of the French Army, and upon examining them I find that Capt. Dagworthy has been at a loss for an interpreter. The Accounts of the Indians are these: The first party say they saw the French at Work before the Fort, mounting their Cannon upon Wheels, and that they saw a large Body of French and Indians march from the Fort with a great many Baggage Horses; And that when they got to where Gen. Braddock was defeated, They heard the Cannon fired at the Fort. The last Party say they saw about 80 Indians in one Company, and a Body of French, a great number of Baggage Horses, and large Tracks of several Parties of Indians on both Sides the Road, the Number They think cannot be less than between Five and Seven Hundred; They took the old Pennsylvania Trading Road, but they saw no Carriages or Tracks of Carriages the Road they went."

On the same day (June 28th) Col. Stanwix said, in a letter to Governor Denny, "Am of Opinion that a large Party of French and Indians did leave Fort Duquesne the 10th Instant, but without Artillery or Waggons; but what is become of them I cannot yet learn. As it was probable they might appear towards Ray's Town [Bedford], I augmented the Garrison at Fort Lyttleton 150 men, And ordered Scouts out towards Ray's Town, but no Intelligence of them, tho' now 18 Days since the Enemy was supposed to be in Motion. I have had ffour Spys out over the North Mountains; Some are returned, but without seeing any Enemy. I march a Captain's Piquet Two or Three Times a Week as scouting Parties, but as yet have found the Coast all clear." The event proved that the French and Indian force was not as large as represented; that it had no artillery, and that its designs were not against Fort Cumberland nor Fort Loudon, but against the settlements farther to the northward, in the region of the forks of the Susquehanna. This was about the last of the forays in which the Indians were engaged against the English settlements during that year. At its close (in the latter part of December, 1757) seven Indians came to Philadelphia, having been thirty-one days on their journey from the Allegheny towns, and reported that when they left, some of the French officers were in the Indian villages "about twenty miles from the French fort called Onango" [Venango], with presents and wampum belts, endeavoring to again stir up the Indians to go with them on a great expedition against the English; but that the head chief, Casteraqua, had gathered his young men together and told them not to listen to the French, but to remain at home. They remained entirely quiet from that time during the winter and following spring, by which time their disaffection against the French and inclination for peace became assured. On the 25th of March, 1758, Governor Denny, in a letter of that date, addressed to Col. Washington, said, "Several accounts have been brought during the winter, as if there was a disposition in the Western Indians to return to their old friends the English; and as there has been little or no mischief done on the frontiers of this and the neighboring Provinces of late, it is not unlikely but the Indians are changing every day in our favour. From the mouth of the messengers who came directly from the Ohio by the way of Diahoga, they expressly declare that since the Peace Belts sent by these Indians, who were formerly our friends, have been so kindly received by this Government they are sure that on their receiving this news they shall be sent back immediately with an acco un of their separating from the French and coming to join our friendly Indians."

In 1758 the English ministry planned and sent forward an expedition much more formidable than that placed under Braddock, three years before, for the capture of Fort Du Quesne. Gen. Abercrombie, who had been appointed commander-in-chief of His Majesty's forces in North America, assigned the command of this new expedition to Brig.-Gen. John Forbes. His force (of which the rendezvous was appointed at Raystown, now Bedford, Pa.) was composed of three hundred and fifty Royal American troops, twelve hundred Scotch Highlanders, sixteen hundred Virginians, and two thousand seven hundred Pennsylvania provincials, two hundred and fifty men from Maryland, one hundred and fifty from North Carolina, and one hundred from "the lower counties on Delaware," a total of six thousand three hundred and fifty effective men, besides one thousand wagoners and laborers. The Virginia troops were comprised in two regiments, commanded respectively by Col. George Washington and Col. James Burd, but both under the superior command of Washington as acting brigadier. Gen. Forbes arrived at Raystown about the 10th of September,[1] but Col. Henry Bouquet had previously (in August) been ordered forward with an advanced column of two thousand men to the Loyalhanna to cut out roads. The main body, with Washington in advance, moved forward from Raystown in October. In the mean time Bouquet (perhaps thinking he could capture the fort with his advance division, before the arrival of the main body, and thus secure the principal honor) sent forward a reconnoissance in force, consisting of eight hundred men (mostly Highlanders) under Maj. William Grant. This force reached a point in the vicinity of the fort,[2] where, on the 14th of September, it was attacked on both flanks and in the rear by a body of about seven hundred French and a large number of savages, under command of a French officer named Aubry. Here Grant was defeated with much slaughter, the Indians committing terrible atrocities on the dead and wounded Highlanders. The losses of Grant's force were two hundred and seventy killed, forty-two wounded, and a number of prisoners, among whom was Maj. Grant himself. The French and Indians then advanced against Bouquet and attacked his intrenched position at Fort Ligonier, but were finally (though with great difficulty) repulsed on the 12th of October, and forced to retreat to their fort.

Gen. Forbes with the main body of his army arrived at Loyalhanna early in November. A council of war was held, at which it was decided that on account of the lateness of the season and approach of winter (the ground being already covered with snow) it was "unadvisable, if not impracticable, to prosecute the campaign any further till the next season, and that a winter encampment among the mountains or a retreat to the frontier settlements was the only alternative that remained." But immediately afterwards a scouting party brought in some prisoners, from whom it was learned that the garrison of Fort Du Quesne was weak, and the Indian allies of the French considerably disaffected. Thereupon the decision of the council of war was reversed, and orders at once issued to move on to the assault of the fort.

The march was commenced immediately, the troops taking with them no tents or heavy baggage, and only a few pieces of light artillery. Washington with his command led the advance. When within about twelve miles of the fort word was brought to Forbes that it was being evacuated by the French, but he remembered the lesson taught by Braddock's rashness, and treated the report with suspicion, continuing the march with the greatest caution, and withholding from the troops the intelligence he had received. On the 25th of November, when they were marching with the provincials in front, they drew near the fort and came to a place where a great number of stakes had been planted, and on these were hanging the kilts of the Highlanders slain on that spot in Grant's defeat two months before. When Forbes' Highlanders saw this they became infuriated with rage and rushed on, reckless of consequences and regardless of discipline in their eagerness to take bloody vengeance on the slayers of their countrymen. They were bent on the extermination of their foes and swore to give no quarter, but soon after, on arriving within sight of the fort, it was found to be indeed evacuated and in flames, and the last of the boats in which its garrison had embarked were seen in the distance passing Smoky Island on their way down the Ohio.

The fort was found to have been mined, but either the enemy had left in too much haste to fire the train or the fuse had become extinguished. All the guns had been burst or sunk in the river. The troops at once marched up to take possession, Washington with his command being the first on the ground. On the following day he wrote to the Governor of Virginia a report of the evacuation and capture of the post as follows:

"CAMP AT FORT DU QUESNE,
"28th November, 1758.

"TO GOV. FAUQUIER:

"SIR,—I have the pleasure to inform you that Fort Duquesne, or the ground rather on which it stood, was possessed by his Majesty's troops on the 25th instant. The enemy, after letting us get within a day's march of the place, burned the fort and ran away by the light of it, at night going down the Ohio by water to the number of about five hundred men, according to our best information. This possession of the fort has been matter of surprise to the whole army, and we cannot attribute it to more probable causes than the weakness of the enemy, want of provisions, and the defection of the Indians. Of these circumstances we were luckily informed by three prisoners who providentially fell into our hands at Loyal Hanna, when we despaired of proceeding farther. A council of war had determined that it was not advisable to advance this season beyond that place; but the above information caused us to march on without tents or baggage, and with only a light train of artillery. We have thus happily succeeded. It would be tedious and I think unnecessary to relate every trivial circumstance that has happened since my last. . . . This fortunate and indeed unexpected success of our arms will be attended with happy effects. The Delawares are sueing for peace, and I doubt not that other tribes on the Ohio are following their example. A trade free, open, and on equitable terms is what they seem much to desire, and I do not know so effectual a way of riveting them to our interest as by sending out goods immediately to this place for that purpose . . ."

[1] On the 9th of September, Gen. Forbes wrote from Fort Loudon to Governor Denny, of Pennsylvania: "Everything is ready for the Army's advancing; but that I cannot do unless I have a sufficient quantity of provisions in the magazine at Raystown. The road that leads from the advanced posts to the French fort may be opened as fast as a convoy can march it. Therefore my movements depend on his Majesty's subjects entering cheerfully in carrying up the necessary provisions. The new road has been finished without the enemies knowing it. The troops have not suffered the least insult in the cutting of it." He also stated that the road was then open to within forty miles of Fort Du Quesne.

[2] This fight took place at "Grant's Hill," in the present city of Pittsburgh. The commander and Maj. Lewis were taken prisoners by the French and Indians.

Thus, after repeated attempts, each ending in blood and disaster, the English standard was firmly planted at the head of the Ohio, and the French power here overthrown forever.

The Indians had become greatly dissatisfied with the French, and had entirely ceased acting with them against the English. Gen. Forbes, in his report to Governor Denny, dated November 26th, after announcing the capture of the fort, said that the French were "abandoned, or at least not seconded, by their friends the Indians, whom we had previously engaged to act a neutral part, and who now seem all willing to embrace His Majesty's most gracious protection." On the capture of the fort the Delawares sued for peace, which was granted to them at a treaty conference held with them at the fort immediately after it came into possession of the English forces.

On the ruins of Fort Du Quesne another work was constructed—a weak and hastily-built stockade with a shallow ditch—and named "Fort Pitt," in honor of William Pitt, Earl Chatham. Two hundred and eighty men of Washington's command were left to garrison it, under command of Col. (afterwards general) Hugh Mercer, and the main army marched east. Gen. Forbes returned to Philadelphia, and died there in March, 1759. The new Fort Pitt was commenced in August, 1759, and completed during the fall of that year by a force under command of Gen. Stanwix. In the same autumn Col. James Burd was sent from Carlisle to open a road from Braddock's road on Laurel Hill to the Monongahela, and at the latter point to build a fort, the object being the establishment of a route for transportation from the East to Fort Pitt, with defensive works and bases of supply at intermediate points. The fort was built by Col. Burd's detachment, on the present site of the town of Brownsville, on the Monongahela, and a road was opened from it to Braddock's road on the summit of Laurel Hill. The work on the road was commenced on the 13th of September, and on the fort on the 24th of October. On Sunday, the 4th of November, a sermon was preached in the fort by his chaplain, the Rev. Dr. Allison, who on the same day left for Philadelphia. The fort was completed a few days later, and named "Fort Burd." A garrison of twenty-five men remained in it, and Col. Burd, with the rest of his detachment, marched to Fort Pitt.

Gen. Stanwix remained at Fort Pitt until the following year, and during his stay was very successful in cultivating the friendship of the Indians. A treaty council was held with them at the old fort on the 4th of July, 1759, and another at the new Fort Pitt in the following October, on which latter occasion Gen. Stanwix announced to the Indians the fall of the French fortress at Quebec,[1] which had been taken by the forces of Gen. Wolfe in September, and which event, as he told them, was virtually an ending of the war. The Indians then formally buried the hatchet, and declared themselves the fast friends of the English for all time. On the 25th of March, 1760, Gen. Stanwix set out for Philadelphia with a military escort and thirty-five chiefs of the Ohio Indians, leaving the fort garrisoned by seven hundred men. In September of that year the French post of Montreal surrendered, and this, with the fall of Detroit and other French posts, closed the "French and Indian War."

When the "Pontiac war" broke out in 1763 the Indians in this region, like those in all parts of the West, became actively hostile. They made their first demonstrations about the 1st of June in that year, in the neighborhood of Fort Pitt, then moved across the Alleghenies, and again committed fearful havoc in the settlements of the same region which they had ravaged from the fall of 1755 to 1757. A large body of savages also besieged Fort Pitt, cutting off all supplies and communication. No information could be obtained as to the situation at the fort, and great alarm was felt for the safety of the garrison. At this crisis Col. Bouquet was ordered forward to its relief with a force composed of a body of colonial troops and the remnants of the Forty-second and Seventy-seventh Royal Regiments (Highlanders), who had then just returned from the siege of Havana, in the island of Cuba. Gen. Bouquet arrived at Fort Bedford July 25, 1763, and three days later commenced his march across the mountains, having with him a train of wagons loaded with provisions, stores, and munitions of war for Fort Pitt. At Fort Ligonier he left his wagons, and pushed on with his forces towards Fort Pitt. On the second day out from Ligonier the troops had marched seventeen miles, and had come within half a mile of Bushy Run (in the present county of Westmoreland), where they were expecting to halt and refresh themselves at a large spring, preparatory to a night march through the dangerous Turtle Creek ravines, when the war-whoop resounded on every side, and the advance-guard of eighteen men were fired upon from ambush. Twelve of the eighteen fell dead at the first fire. The remaining six ran back to the main body of troops, and then began, at one o'clock P.M., August 5th, the battle of Bushy Run, one of the most desperate conflicts in which the red men and pale-face ever engaged.

[1] The French Fort Niagara had previously been taken by the English, Aug. 5, 1759. A few days later the French abandoned their posts at Venango and Le Bœuf, but left the Indians in good humor "by distributing Laced Coats, Hats, and other Clothing among them." They told the Indians they were obliged to leave them for a time, but would soon return and take possession of the whole river.

In their first assault the Indians were repulsed and pursued a considerable distance, but they immediately returned and again attacked with renewed vigor. Again and again they were repulsed, but as often returned to the attack. The fight continued without intermission through the long hours of that blazing August afternoon, but Bouquet stubbornly held his ground against great odds.

Darkness closed the conflict, but the hungry, weary troops, almost famished and suffering greatly from thirst, were obliged to keep vigilant watch all night long to guard against surprise. They had lost nearly one-fourth their number, and the Indians had been largely reinforced. With the dawn came repeated and persistent assaults. The enemy grew bolder as their numbers increased, and the fatigue and distress of the soldiers became more and more apparent. It was comparatively easy for the brave Highlanders to put the savages to rout, charging on them with the bayonet, for no Indian has ever stood up before a well-directed bayonet charge. But the moment the Scotchmen returned to the inner circle of defense the wily and dextrous savages, leaping from tree to tree, returned to the conflict with terrific yells. They pressed close enough to wound the frightened pack-horses, two hundred and fifty of which, laden with provisions and ammunition for the relief of Fort Pitt, were crowded together in the centre. The terrified drivers hid among the bushes regardless of commands from the officers. Matters were becoming desperate. The whites were rapidly falling, and their relentless foes were growing stronger and bolder. It was a crisis requiring the highest kind of military genius and indomitable resolution, but Bouquet was equal to the occasion, and from the very jaws of defeat, disaster, and death he snatched one of the most brilliant victories ever won over the Indians.

Taking advantage of the lay of the ground within the circle of fire with which they were encompassed, Bouquet formed an ambuscade with as large a body of Highlanders as could be spared for a brief space from the outer line of defense. The Indians were led to believe that the army was about to retreat to Fort Ligonier, and they massed their warriors for a charge where the line of defense was made to appear weakest. This was what Bouquet expected and desired in order that the cold steel of the Highlanders might tell effectually. Part of the line gave way before the onset of the savages, and retreated in good order towards the centre of the camp, closely followed by the whooping and exultant warriors; but when fully inside the ambuscade the savages were astonished to see the retreating Scots suddenly wheel and dash at them with fixed bayonets. Confident of victory with their superior numbers, and eager for the spoils of the camp, they met the assault of the Highlanders with great impetuosity, and even broke the line of steel. But nerved to desperation by the horrors of the fate that awaited them in the case of defeat, encouraged by the knowledge of the strategic movement hastening to a climax, and inspired by the presence and example of the heroic Bouquet, the broken line of Highlanders rallied, reformed, and bore down with dauntless courage on the ferocious savages. The Indians slowly began to yield before the sturdy Scotchmen, when they were startled by volleys from the men in ambush, and perceiving the trap in which they had been caught they gave a despairing whoop and fled in wild disorder. Through the woods and over the hills Bouquet's men pursued the flying savages, who never stopped until they were across the Allegheny. The defeat and rout were complete and final. Fort Pitt was relieved, and its garrison was not again disturbed by Indians. In the battle of Bushy Run, Bouquet lost fifty killed and sixty wounded. The loss of the Indians was not known, but sixty of their warriors lay dead on the field after the fight was over.

The savages retreated to the wilderness, thoroughly humbled and cowed for the time, but they were not yet sufficiently punished to insure peace to the settlements. In the following year (1764) Bouquet was sent out with another expedition, composed of the same Highland regiments who fought at Bushy Run, with Pennsylvania and Virginia provincial troops, amounting in all to nearly two thousand men. They assembled at Carlisle on the 5th of August, and immediately marched thence over the mountains, arriving at Fort Pitt on the 15th of September. Bouquet left Fort Pitt October 3d with his force, and marched down the Ohio, his objective-point being the Tuscarawas. October 13th he arrived near the forks of the Muskingum, having met no enemy. On the 17th the Indian chiefs met him in council, asking for peace, but nothing was done there. Again they met on the 20th, and promised to bring their white prisoners to Bouquet at a place about one mile from the forks of the river. Bouquet on the 22d marched his force to the appointed place, where he took the precaution to intrench, to guard against perfidy, and built a house in which to receive the Indians. They came at the time agreed on, and were loud in their professions of a desire for peace. With them was Guyasutha, a Seneca chief, who was once a friend to the whites, but afterwards their most implacable foe. Bouquet treated the Indians sternly, telling them he would yield nothing to them and distrusted their protestations. Whichever they wanted, peace or war, he was prepared to give them. If it was peace, then they must deliver up all their white prisoners, and each tribe give hostages to vouch for their good faith.

The savages could do nothing but accede to the terms offered them, though they did so with a bad grace. The treaty was concluded with King Beaver and other Delaware chiefs on the 7th of November, and with the Shawanese on the 12th of the same month. In a letter written by Bouquet to the Governor of Pennsylvania, dated "Camp at the Forks of Muskingum, 15th November, 1764," the general said, "I have the pleasure to inform you that the Mingoes, the Delawares, and the Shawanese after a long struggle have at last submitted to the terms prescribed for them, viz.: First, to deliver all the prisoners without exception. Second, to give fourteen hostages, to remain in our hands as a security for the performance of the first article, and that they shall commit no hostilities against his Majesty's subjects."

Of the hostages, the Mingoes gave two, the Delawares six, and the Shawanese six. Two hundred white captives had already been delivered, "and many of them," said Bouquet, "have remained so many years amongst them [the Indians] that they part from them with the greatest reluctance." But it was a part of the terms granted by Bouquet that all captives should be given up and forced to leave the savages, whether willing to do so or not. "I give you," said Bouquet, on the 6th of November, "twelve days from this date to deliver into my hands at Wakatamake all the prisoners in your possession, without any exception, Englishmen, Frenchmen, women, children, whether adopted in your tribes, married or living amongst you under any denomination and pretense whatsoever, together with all negroes. And you are to furnish the said prisoners with clothing, provisions, and horses to carry them to Fort Pitt. When you have fully complied with these conditions you shall then know on what terms you may obtain the peace you sue for."

Two hundred and six prisoners were given up by the Indians, but there were still nearly one hundred more held by the Shawanese at distant points. These they promised to bring in in the following spring, and did bring nearly all of them. On the 18th of November the troops set out on their return to Fort Pitt, and arrived there on the 28th. A few days afterwards Bouquet left the fort and returned to Philadelphia.

It had been made a part of Bouquet's agreement with the Indians on the Muskingum that they should go to Sir William Johnson on the Mohawk to subscribe to a formal treaty of peace. This they did according to agreement, and a treaty was concluded May 8, 1765.

CHAPTER VI.

DUNMORE'S WAR.

In the year 1774 occurred a series of Indian incursions and butcheries (chiefly by the Shawanese) in the white settlements of the western frontier, and a retaliatory and entirely successful campaign carried on against the savages by white troops under command of Lord Dunmore, then Governor of Virginia, and his lieutenants, which operations, extending through the summer and part of the autumn of the year named, have usually been known as "Dunmore's war." In that conflict the territory which is now Washington County saw but little of actual bloodshed and Indian atrocity, yet in the universal terror and consternation caused by the savage inroads and massacres, most of which occurred farther to the west and south, this region came near being as completely depopulated as all the territory west of the Laurel Hill range had been twenty years before by the panic which succeeded the French victory over Washington at Fort Necessity.

Dunmore's war was the result[1] of several collisions

[1] In reference to the causes which led to the Indian hostilities of 1774, an extract is given below from a letter written upon that subject, dated at Redstone Old Fort, on the Monongahela, in October, 1774, immediately after the close of Lord Dunmore's successful campaign against the Shawanese. It is not known who was the writer, but he was evidently a person of position under Lord Dunmore, and had been present with the Governor in the campaign and at the treaty which followed it. The letter is found in American Archives, vol. i. p. 1016, viz.:

"It will not be improper to investigate the cause of the Indian war which broke out in the spring, before I give you a sketch of the history of the expedition which his Excellency Lord Dunmore has carried on so successfully against the Shawanese, one of the richest, proudest, and bravest of the Indian nations. In order to do this it is necessary to look back as far as the year 1764, when Col. Bouquet made peace with that nation. The Shawanese never complied with the terms of that peace. They did not deliver up the white prisoners, there was no lasting impression made upon them by a stroke from the troops employed against them in that campaign, and they barely acquiesced in some articles of the treaty by command of the Six Nations. The Red Hawk, a Shawanese chief, insulted Col. Bouquet with impunity, and an Indian killed the colonel's footman the day after the peace was made. This murder not being taken notice of gave rise to several daring outrages committed immediately after.

"In the year following several murders were committed by the Indians on New River, and soon after several men employed in the service of Wharton and Company were killed on their passage to Illinois, and the goods belonging to the company carried off. Some time after this outrage a number of men employed to kill meat for the garrison of Fort Chartres were killed, and their rifles, blankets, &c., carried to the Indian towns. These repeated hostilities and outrages being committed with impunity made the Indians bold and daring. Although it was not the Shawanese alone that committed all these hostilities, yet letting one nation pass with impunity when mischief is done inspires the rest of the tribes with courage, so that the officers commanding his Majesty's troops on the Ohio at that time, not having power or spirit to pursue the Indians nor address to reclaim them, mischief became familiar to them; they were sure to kill and plunder whenever it was in their power, and indeed they panted for an opportunity. It is probable you will see Lord Dunmore's speech to some chiefs of the Six Nations who waited on his Lordship; it mentions the particular murders and outrages committed by them every year successively since they pretended to make peace with Col. Bouquet.

"The most recent murders committed by the Indians before the white people began to retaliate were that of Capt. Russell's son, three more white men, and two of his negroes, on the 15th of October, 1773; that of a Dutch family on the Kanawha in June of the same year, and one Richard in the July following; and that of Mr. Hogg and three white men on the Great Kanawha early in April, 1774. Things being in this situation, a message was sent to the Shawanese, inviting them to a conference in order to bury the tomahawk and brighten the chain of friendship. They fired upon the messengers, and it was with difficulty they escaped with their lives. Immediately on their return letters were written by some gentlemen at Fort Pitt, and dispersed among the inwhich took place in the spring of 1774, on the Ohio River above the mouth of the Little Kanawha, between Indians and parties of white men, some of whom had rendezvoused in that region for the purpose of making explorations in the country farther to the southwest, and others who had gone there to clear lands and make preparations for settlement. Of the latter class was Capt. Michael Cresap, who was the owner of a store or trading-post at Redstone Old Fort (now Brownsville), on the Monongahela, which was his base of operations, but who had taken up (under authority of the colonial government of Virginia) extensive tracts of land at and below the mouth of Middle Island Creek (now Sistersville, W. Va.), and had gone there in the early spring of the year named with a party of men to make clearings and build houses upon his lands there. Ebenezer Zane, afterwards a famed Indian-fighter and guide, was engaged at the same time and in the same way with a small party of men on lands which he had taken up at or near the mouth of Sandy Creek. Another and larger party had gathered at the mouth of the Little Kanawha (the present site of Parkersburg, W. Va.), and were waiting there for the arrival of other Virginians who were expected to join them at that point, from whence they were to proceed down the river to the then scarcely known region of Kentucky, there to explore with a view to the planting of settlements. A leading spirit in this party (though not, strictly speaking, the leader of it) was George Rogers Clarke, who a few years later became widely famed as the general who led a body of Virginia troops on an expedition (which proved entirely successful) against Vincennes and other British posts in and west of the valley of the Wabash. Many years afterwards Gen. Clarke wrote an account (dated June 17, 1798) of the circumstances attending the commencement of hostilities in the spring of 1774, and of the movements of his party of Virginians and the other parties with Cresap and Zane along the Ohio at that time. His account, which was written at Louisville, Ky., is as follows:

"This Country [Kentucky] was explored in 1773. A resolution was formed to make a settlement in the spring following, and the mouth of the Little Kanawha appointed the place of general rendezvous, in order to descend the Ohio from thence in a body. Early in the spring the Indians had done some mischief. Reports from their towns were alarming, which deterred many. About eighty or ninety men only arrived at the appointed rendezvous, where we lay some days. A small party of hunters that lay about ten miles below us were fired upon by the Indians, whom the hunters beat back and returned to camp. This and many other circumstances led us to believe that the Indians were determined on war. The whole party was enrolled, and determined to execute their project of forming a settlement in Kentucky, as we had every necessary store that could be thought of. An Indian town called the Horsehead Bottom, on the Scioto, and near its mouth, lay nearly in our way. The determination was to cross the country and surprise it. Who was to command was the question. There were but few among us who had experience in Indian warfare, and they were such as we did not choose to be commanded by. We knew of Capt. Cresap being on the river, about fifteen miles above us, with some hands settling a plantation, and that he had concluded to follow us to Kentucky as soon as he had fixed there his people. We also knew that he had been experienced in a former war. He was proposed, and it was unanimously agreed to send for him to command the party. Messengers were dispatched, and in half an hour returned with Cresap. He had heard of our resolution by some of his hunters that had fallen in with ours, and had set out to come to us.

"We thought our army, as we called it, complete, and the destruction of the Indians sure. A council was called, and to our astonishment our intended commander-in-chief was the person that dissuaded us from the enterprise. He said that appearances were very suspicious, but there was no certainty of a war; that if we made the attempt proposed he had no doubt of our success, but a war would at any rate be the result, and that we should be blamed for it, and perhaps justly. But if we were determined to proceed he would lay aside all considerations, send to his camp for his people, and share our fortunes. He was then asked what he would advise. His answer was that we should return to Wheeling as a convenient spot to hear what was going forward; that a few weeks would determine. As it was early in the spring, if we found the Indians were not disposed for war, we should have full time to return and make our establishment in Kentucky. This was adopted, and in two hours the whole were under way. . . .

"On our arrival at Wheeling (the whole country being pretty well settled thereabouts) the whole of the inhabitants appeared to be alarmed. They flocked to our camp from every direction, and all we could say we could not keep them from under our wings. We offered to cover their neighborhood with scouts until further information if they would return to habitants of the Ohio, assuring them that a war with the Shawanese was unavoidable, and desiring them to be on their guard, as it was uncertain where the Indians would strike first. In the mean time two men of the names of Greathouse and Baker sold some rum near the mouth of Yellow Creek, and with them some Indians got drunk and were killed. Lord Dunmore has ordered that the manner of their being killed be inquired into. Many officers and other adventurers who were down the Ohio in order to explore the country and have lands surveyed, upon receiving the above intelligence and seeing the letters from the gentlemen at Fort Pitt, thought proper to return. Capt. Michael Cresap was one of these gentlemen. On their return to the river they fell in with a party of Indians, and being apprehensive that the Indians were preparing to attack them, as appeared by their manœuvres, the white people, being the smallest number, thought it advisable to have the advantage of the first fire, whereupon they engaged, and after exchanging a few shots killed two or three Indians and dispersed the rest; hostilities being then commenced on both sides, the matter became serious."

their plantations, but nothing would prevail. By this time we had got to be a formidable party. All the hunters, men without families, etc., in that quarter had joined our party. Our arrival at Wheeling was soon known at Pittsburgh. The whole of that country at that time being under the jurisdiction of Virginia,[1] Dr. Connolly[2] had been appointed by Dunmore captain-commandant of the district, which was called West Augusta.[3] He, learning of us, sent a message addressed to the party, letting us know that a war was to be apprehended, and requesting that we would keep our position for a few days, as messages had been sent to the Indians, and a few days would determine the doubt. The answer he got was, that we had no inclination to quit our quarters for some time, that during our stay we should be careful that the enemy did not harass the neighborhood that we lay in. But before this answer could reach Pittsburgh he sent a second express, addressed to Capt. Cresap, as the most influential man amongst us, informing him that the messengers had returned from the Indians, that war was inevitable, and begging him to use his influence with the party to get them to cover the country by scouts until the inhabitants could fortify themselves. The reception of this letter was the epoch of open hostilities with the Indians. A new post was planted, a council was called, and the letter read by Cresap, all the Indian traders being summoned on so important an occasion. Action was had, and war declared in the most solemn manner; and the same evening (April 26th) two scalps were brought into camp. The next day some canoes of Indians were discovered on the river, keeping the advantage of an island to cover themselves from our view. They were chased fifteen miles and driven ashore at Pipe Creek. A battle ensued; a few were wounded on both sides, one Indian only taken prisoner. On examining their canoes we found a considerable quantity of ammunition and other warlike stores. On our return to camp a resolution was adopted to march the next day and attack Logan's[4] camp on the Ohio, about thirty miles above us. We did march about five miles, and then halted to take some refreshments. Here the impropriety of executing the projected enterprise was argued. The conversation was brought forward by Cresap himself. It was generally agreed that those Indians had no hostile intentions, as they were hunting, and their party was composed of men, women, and children, with all their stuff with them. This we knew, as I myself and others present had been in their camp about four weeks past on our descending the river from Pittsburgh. In short, every person seemed to detest the resolution we had set out with. We returned in the evening, decamped, and took the road to Redstone."

From this account it appears that Clarke's party, well knowing that an Indian war must follow the events here narrated, abandoned the original idea of proceeding to Kentucky, and marched with Cresap's men to his headquarters at Redstone Old Fort, on the Monongahela. They carried with them on a litter one man who had been mortally wounded in the fight with the Indians on the 27th of April. Two others had been wounded but not seriously. The party, in marching from Wheeling to Redstone, proceeded by way of Catfish Camp (now Washington borough), and in the evening of the 29th stopped there at the house of William Huston, who was then the only white resident at that place. A certificate setting forth the circumstances of this occurrence was made in 1798 by Huston, subscribed before David Redick, then prothonotary of Washington County, and placed in his hands. A copy of it is here given, viz.:

"I, William Huston, of Washington County, in the State of Pennsylvania, do hereby certify to whom it may concern: That in the year 1774 I resided at Catfish's Camp, on the main path from Wheeling to Redstone; that Michael Cresap, who resided on or near the Potomac River, on his way up from the river Ohio, at the head of a party of armed men, lay some time at my cabin. I had previously heard the report of Mr. Cresap having killed some Indians said to be the relations of Logan, an Indian Chief. In a variety of conversations with several of Cresap's party they boasted of the deed, and that in the presence of their chief. They acknowledged that they had fired first on the Indians. They had with them one man on a litter who was in the skirmish.

"I do further certify that, from what I learned from the party themselves, I then formed the opinion, and have not had any reason to change that opinion since, that the killing, on the part of the whites, was what I deem the grossest murder. I further certify that some of the party who afterwards killed some women and other Indians at Baker's Bottom also lay at my cabin on their march to the interior part of the country; they had with them a little girl, whose life had been spared by the interference of some more humane than the rest. If necessary, I will make affidavit to the above to be true. Certified at Washington, this 18th day of April, A.D. 1798.

"WILLIAM HUSTON."

Immediately after the occurrence of the events narrated as above by Clarke came the killing of the Indians at Captina Creek and the murder of the relatives of the Mingo chief Logan at Baker's Bottom, on the Ohio, the date of the last-named event being April 30th. The so-called speech of Logan fastened the odium of killing his people in cold blood on Capt. Michael Cresap, of Redstone Old Fort. That the charge was false and wholly unjust is now known by all people well informed on the subject. Cresap did, however, engage in the killing of other Indians, being no doubt incited thereto by the deceitful tenor of Dr. Connolly's letters, which were evidently written for the express purpose of inflaming the minds of the frontiersmen by false information, and so bringing about a general Indian war.

The chief Logan, with a hunting party of his Indians, and having with them their women and children, had pitched his hunting-camp at the mouth of Yellow Creek, about thirty miles above Wheeling, on the west side of the Ohio, and opposite Baker's Bottom on the Virginia side, where lived Joshua Baker, whose chief occupation was selling liquor to the Indians. From the time when Logan had first pitched his camp at Yellow Creek it had been the determination of some of the whites to attack it and kill the Indian party, but in their first attempt to do this they had been overruled in their purpose, chiefly by the influence of Capt. Cresap, as is shown in Clarke's account before quoted. But after Cresap and Clarke had departed with their men for Redstone, and while they were making their way from Catfish Camp to the Monongahela, on the day succeeding the night which they spent at William Huston's cabin, the plan to kill the Indians of Logan's party was put in execution (during the absence of the chief) by enticing a part of them across the river to Baker's cabin, where a party of white men lay concealed. There liquor was given them, and then when they or some of them were in a state of partial intoxication the bloody work was done, all the Indians at the house being killed except an infant child. The party who did the perfidious and cold-blooded deed were under the leadership of Daniel Greathouse, a settler on King's Creek near its mouth. Several accounts of the affair have been given, generally agreeing as to the main facts, but disagreeing to some extent as to the minor details. One account has it that in the evening preceding the tragedy a friendly squaw came across the river from Logan's camp and told Baker's wife with many tears that the lives of herself (Mrs. Baker) and her family were in danger, as the Indians were planning to come across and murder them. She wished well to Mrs. Baker, and thus risked her own life to serve her by bringing the information so as to allow the family time to escape. Upon receipt of this warning Greathouse's party was collected in haste at the cabin. No Indians appeared during the night, and on the following morning Greathouse and two or three others crossed to Logan's camp, and in an apparently friendly manner invited the Indians to come across to Baker's and get some rum. A party of them accepted the invitation and came. Most of Greathouse's men lay concealed in the back part of the cabin. Baker was to deal out rum freely to the Indians, and did so. When they became intoxicated the concealed men rushed out and killed them. In Mayer's "Logan and Cresap" the following account is given of the massacre:

"Early in the morning a party of eight Indians, composed of three squaws, a child, and four unarmed men, one of whom was Logan's brother, crossed the river to Baker's cabin, where all but Logan's brother obtained liquor and became excessively drunk. No whites except Baker and two of his companions appeared in the cabin. After some time Logan's relative took down a coat and hat belonging to Baker's brother-in-law, and putting them on, set his arms akimbo, strutted about the apartment, and at length coming up to one of the men addressed him with the most offensive epithets and attempted to strike him. The white man—Sappington—who was thus assailed by language and gesture for some time kept out of his way, but becoming irritated, seized his gun and shot the Indian as he was rushing to the door, still clad in the coat and hat. The men, who during the whole of this scene had remained hidden, now poured forth, and without parley slaughtered the whole Indian party except the child. Before this tragic event occurred two canoes, one with two and the other with five Indians, all naked, painted, and completely armed for war, were descried stealing from the opposite shore, where Logan's camp was situated. This was considered as confirmation of what the squaw had said the night before, and was afterwards alleged in justification of the murder of the unarmed party which had first arrived.

"No sooner were the unresisting drunkards dead than the infuriated whites rushed to the river-bank, and ranging themselves along the concealing fringe of underwood prepared to receive the canoes. The first that arrived was the one containing two warriors, who were fired upon and killed. The other canoe immediately turned and fled; but after this two others, containing eighteen warriors, painted and prepared for conflict as the first had been, started to assail the Americans. Advancing more cautiously than the former party, they endeavored to land below Baker's cabin, but being met by the rapid movements of the rangers before they could effect their purpose they were put to flight, with the loss of one man, although they returned the fire of the pioneers."

Another account of the Baker's Bottom massacre was given more than half a century afterwards by Judge Jolley, who for many years was a resident of Washington County, Ohio, and who at the time of the occurrence was a youth living on the frontier. His account, as given below, was published in the year 1836 in "Silliman's Journal," viz:

"I was about sixteen years of age, but I very well recollect what I then saw, and the information that I have since obtained was derived from (I believe) good authority. In the spring of the year 1774 a party of Indians encamped on the northwest of the Ohio, near the mouth of the Yellow Creek. A party of whites, called 'Greathouse's party, lay on the opposite side of the river. The Indians came over to the white party, consisting, I think, of five men and one woman with an infant. The whites gave them rum, which three of them drank, and in a short time became very drunk. The other two men and the woman refused to drink. The sober Indians were challenged to shoot at a mark, to which they agreed; and as soon as they emptied their guns the whites shot them down. The woman attempted to escape by flight, but was also shot down; she lived long enough, however, to beg mercy for her babe, telling them that it was akin to themselves. The whites had a man in the cabin prepared with a tomahawk for the purpose of killing the three drunken Indians, which was immediately done. The party of men then moved off for the interior settlements, and came to Catfish Camp (Washington) on the evening of the next day, where they tarried until the day following. I very well remember my mother feeding and dressing the babe, chirruping to the little innocent, and its smiling. However, they took it away, and talked of sending it to its supposed father, Col. John Gibson, of Carlisle, Pa., who had been for some years a trader among the Indians.

"The remainder of the (Indian) party at the mouth of Yellow Creek, finding that their friends on the opposite side of the river were massacred, attempted to escape by descending the Ohio, and in order to prevent being discovered by the whites passed on the west side of Wheeling Island, and landed at Pipe Creek, a small stream that empties into the Ohio a few miles below Grave Creek, where they were overtaken by Cresap with a party of men from Wheeling. They took one Indian scalp, and had one white man (Big Tarrener) badly wounded. They, I believe, carried him in a litter from Wheeling to Redstone. I saw the party on their return from their victorious campaign. . . . It was well known that Michael Cresap had no hand in the massacre at Yellow Creek."

The concluding sentence in Judge Jolley's statement was written in refutation of the calumny which was circulated and for many years believed by a majority of the people of the country, that the murder of Logan's men and relatives was done by Capt. Michael Cresap or by his orders. Such an inference might be drawn from the first part of the statement of William Huston, already given, viz., where he says, "I had previously heard the report of Mr. Cresap having killed some Indians, said to be the relations of Logan, an Indian chief." But his memory was evidently at fault. He could not have previously heard of the killing at Yellow Creek, as it did not occur until after the time to which he refers in the certificate. And in the latter part of the same document he disproves his previous statement by saying, "I further certify that some of the party who afterwards killed some women and other Indians at Baker's Bottom also lay at my cabin on their march to the interior." Another statement that seems to be conclusive proof of Capt. Cresap's innocence of any participation in the atrocity at Baker's Bottom is found in an affidavit of the man who shot Logan's brother on that occasion, viz.: "I, John Sappington, declare myself to be intimately acquainted with all the circumstances respecting the destruction of Logan's family, and do give the following narrative, a true statement of that affair: Logan's family (if it was his family) was not killed by Cresap, nor with his knowledge, nor by his consent, but by the Greathouses and their associates. They were killed thirty miles above Wheeling, near the mouth of Yellow Creek. Logan's camp was on one side of the river Ohio, and the house where the murder was committed was opposite to it on the other side. They had encamped there only four or five days, and during that time had lived peaceably with the whites on the opposite side until the very day the affair happened."

The killing of the Indians at Baker's was on the 30th of April, as before mentioned. Several accounts of the affair, however, have mentioned different dates. Sappington stated many years afterwards that, according to his memory, it happened on the 24th of May; Benjamin Tomlinson placed it on the 3d or 4th of May; but Col. Ebenezer Zane gave the date as the last day of April, which is undoubtedly correct. It seems to be verified by a letter addressed to Col. George Washington by his agent, Valentine Crawford, who then lived on Jacob's Creek, near the Youghiogheny River, in Westmoreland County. In that letter (dated Jacob's Creek, May 6, 1774) he says,—

"I am sorry to inform you the Indians have stopped all the gentlemen from going down the river. In the first place they killed one Murphy, a trader, and wounded another, then robbed their canoes. This alarmed the gentlemen very much, and Maj. Cresap took a party of men and waylaid some Indians in their canoes that were going down the river and shot two of them and scalped them. He also raised a party, took canoes and followed some Indians from Wheeling down to the Little Kanawha, when, coming up with them, he killed three and wounded several. The Indians wounded three of his men, only one of whom is dead; he was shot through, while the other two were but slightly wounded. On Saturday last, about twelve o'clock, one Greathouse and about twenty men fell on a party of Indians at the mouth of Yellow Creek and killed ten of them. They brought away one child a prisoner, which is now at my brother, William Crawford's. . . ."

On the 8th of May, Capt. William Crawford (who lived on the Youghiogheny River nearly opposite the site of the borough of Connellsville) said, in a letter addressed by him to Col. George Washington,—

"The surveyors that went down the Kanawha,[1] as report goes, were stopped by the Shawanese Indians, upon which some of the white people attacked some Indians, and killed several, took thirty horse-loads of skins near the mouth of Scioto; on which news, and expecting an Indian war, Mr. Cresap and some other people fell on some other Indians at the mouth of Pipe Creek, killed three and scalped them. Daniel Greathouse and some others fell on some at the mouth of Yellow Creek, and killed and scalped ten, and took one child about two months old, which is now at my house. I have taken the child from a woman that it had been given to. Our inhabitants are much alarmed, many hundreds having gone over the mountain, and the whole country evacuated as far as the Monongahela, and many on this side of the river are gone over the mountain. In short, a war is every moment expected. We have a council now with the Indians. What the event will be I do not know. I am now setting out for Fort Pitt at the head of one hundred men. Many others are to meet me there and at Wheeling, where we shall wait the motions of the Indians and act accordingly. . . ."

The settlers along the frontiers, and in all the territory that now forms the counties of Washington and Greene, were in a state of the wildest alarm, well knowing that the Indians would surely make war in revenge for the killing of their people at Captina and Yellow Creek, and most of them immediately sought safety, either in block-houses or by abandoning their settlements and flying eastward across the Monongahela, and many across the Allegheny Mountains.[1] Valentine Crawford, in his letter of May 6th to Col. Washington (before quoted from), said, "This alarm has caused the people to move from over the Monongahela, off Chartiers and Raccoon [Creeks], as fast as you ever saw them in the year 1756 or 1757 down in Frederick County, Virginia. There were more than one thousand people crossed the Monongahela in one day at three ferries that are not one mile apart."

The general alarm among the inhabitants was well founded. The Indians, burning to revenge the killing of their people on the Ohio, particularly at Captina and Yellow Creek, at once took the war-path and ranged eastward to and across the Monongahela, burning, plundering, and killing. On the 8th of June Valentine Crawford said in a letter to Col. Washington, "Since I just wrote you an account of several parties of Indians being among the inhabitants has reached us. Yesterday they killed and scalped one man in sight of the fort [Fort Burd, at Brownsville] on the Monongahela,—one of the inmates. . . . There have been several parties of savages seen within these two or three days, and all seem to be making towards the Laurel Hill or mountain. For that reason the people are afraid to travel the road by Gist's, but go a nigh way by Indian Creek, or ride in the night. . . . On Sunday evening, about four miles over Monongahela, the Indians murdered one family, consisting of six, and took two boys prisoners. At another place they killed three, which makes in the whole nine and two prisoners. If we had not had forts built there would not have been ten families left this side of the mountains besides what are at Fort Pitt. We have sent out scouts after the murderers, but we have not heard that they have fallen in with them yet. We have at this time at least three hundred men out after the Indians, some of whom have gone down to Wheeling, and I believe some have gone down as low as the Little Kanawha. I am in hopes they will give the savages a storm, for some of the scouting company say they will go to their towns but they will get scalps." On the same day William Crawford said in a letter to Washington, "Saturday last we had six persons killed on Dunkard's Creek, about ten miles from the mouth of Cheat River, on the west side of the Monongahela, and there are three missing. On Sunday a man who left the party is supposed to be killed, as he went off to hunt horses, and five guns were heard to go off. The horse he rode away returned to the house where the party then was. They set out in search of enemies; found the man's coat and saw a number of tracks, but could not find the man."

It was the Indian chief Logan, he whose former friendship for the whites had been turned into bitterest hatred by the killing of his people, who came in with his band to ravage the settlements on the west side of the Monongahela, throwing all that country into a state of the wildest alarm. The present counties of Washington and Greene were almost entirely deserted by their people. Dr. Joseph Doddridge, in his "Notes," says, "The massacres of the Indians at Captina and Yellow Creek comprehended the whole of the family of the famous but unfortunate Logan, who before these events had been a lover of the whites and a strenuous advocate for peace;[2] but in

[1] Some of them, however, stood their ground and remained at their cabins, braving the danger rather than abandon their homes. James Chambers, in a deposition made at Washington, Pa., April 20, 1798, before Samuel Shannon, Esq., said that after the massacre at Baker's in 1774 all the settlements broke up along the Ohio River, and that he (being then settled on that river) fled with the rest, but stopped at Catfish Camp, where he remained for some time at the cabin of William Huston. Not a few of the settlers in what is now Greene County lost their lives by attempting to hold their homes.

[2] Judge Jolley, who lived on the frontier at the time of the killing of the Indians at Captina Creek and Baker's Bottom, says in his statement (before extracted from) in reference to those occurrences and their results,—

"The Indians had for some time before these events thought themselves intruded upon by the 'Long Knives' (as they at that time called the Virginians) and many of them were for war. However, they called a council, in which the chief Logan acted a conspicuous part. He admitted their grounds of complaint, but at the same time reminded them of some aggressions on the part of the Indians, and that by a war they would but harass and distress the frontier settlements for a short time; that the 'Long Knives' would come like the trees in the woods, and that ultimately they should be driven from the good lands which they now possessed. He therefore strongly recommended peace. To him they all agreed, grounded the hatchet, and everything wore a tranquil appearance, when, behold! the fugitives arrived from Yellow Creek and reported that Logan's mother, brother, and sister were murdered. Three of the nearest and dearest relations of Logan had been massacred by white men. The consequence was that this same Logan, who a few days before was so pacific, raised the hatchet with a declaration that he would not ground it until he had taken ten for one, which I believe he completely fulfilled by taking thirty scalps and prisoners in the summer of 1774. The above has often been related to me by several persons who were at the Indian towns at the time of the council alluded to, and also when the remains of the party came in from Yellow Creek. Thomas Nicholson in particular has told me the above, and much more. Another person, whose name I cannot recollect, informed me that he was at the the conflict which followed them, by way of revenge for the death of his people, he became a brave and sanguinary chief among the warriors."

In the mean time, Capt. Cresap and George Rogers Clarke, upon their retirement from Wheeling by way of Catfish Camp to Redstone Old Fort, had proceeded from the latter place eastward, Clarke going to Winchester, Va., and Cresap to Old Town, Md., where he had left his family, and where his father lived. There he at once commenced raising a company of men for the purpose of taking part in the Indian hostilities which he knew must follow the occurrences on the Ohio. They sent a messenger to Lord Dunmore at Williamsburg, Va., notifying him of the situation of affairs; and an express was also sent to the Governor by Connolly from Pittsburgh, informing him of the events which had occurred upon the frontier, and the necessity of immediate preparations for an Indian war, among which necessary preparations he suggested the propriety of sending a force to Wheeling to erect a fort there. Upon receipt of this communication Dunmore sent messengers to the settlers who had already gone forward to Kentucky, notifying them to return at once for their own safety, and on the 20th of June he wrote Connolly at Pittsburgh, approving his plan of building a fort at Wheeling, and of carrying war into the Indian country; also directing him to keep in communication with Col. Andrew Lewis, who was then in command of Virginia troops on the Kanawha and New Rivers; also advising him to send Capt. William Crawford with what men could be spared to co-operate with Col. Lewis, "or to strike a stroke himself, if he thinks he can do it with safety." "I know him," said Dunmore, "to be prudent, active, and resolute, and therefore very fit to go on such an Expedition; and if anything of that kind can be effected, the sooner 'tis done the better. . . . I would recommend it to all Officers going out on Parties to make as many Prisoners as they can of Women and Children, and should you be so fortunate as to reduce those Savages to sue for Peace, I would not grant it to them on any Terms till they were effectually chastised for their Insolence, and then on no Terms without bringing in six of Their Heads as Hostages for their future good behavior, and these to be relieved annually, and that they Trade with us [Virginians] only for what they want."

But before receiving this authority from the Governor, Connolly had already put some of the militia in the field, with orders to march to Wheeling and commence the construction of the proposed fort. On the 11th of June a party of militia from the Monongahela, moving up the valley of Ten-Mile Creek on their way to Wheeling to join Connolly's other forces there, and also being in pursuit of Logan and his band, who were burning and murdering in that section, were attacked by the Indians, and their captain and lieutenant wounded, the former mortally. Governor Penn was informed of this occurrence, and of the outrages which had been committed in this region by Logan's marauders, in a letter[1] written at Pittsburgh on the 14th of June by Eneas Mackay (afterwards colonel of the Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment in the Revolutionary army), in which letter, after detailing some civil troubles between the Virginia and Pennsylvania partisans at that place, he thus proceeds, in reference to Indian outrages and alarms:

"On the other hand, we don't know what day or hour we will be attacked by our savage and provoked Enemy the Indians, who have already massacred sixteen persons to our Certain knowledge. About and in the neighborhood of Ten-Mile Creek last Saturday, a party of the militia, consisting of one Captn one Lieut and forty privates, were on their march to join Connelly at the mouth of Whaling [Wheeling], where he intended to Erect a stockade Fort, when on a sudden they were attacked by only four Indians, who killed the Capt on the spot & wounded the Lieut and made their Escape without being hurt, and the Party, after Burrying their Capt Returned with their wounded Lieut, so that Connelly's intended Expedition is knocked in the head at this time."

The captain who was mortally wounded by Logan's party on this occasion (and who died almost immediately) was Francis McClure. The lieutenant, who was severely wounded, was Samuel Kincaid, who had then recently been commissioned justice of the peace in Westmoreland County. They were both considerably in advance of the main body of their company, and were not taking proper precautions against surprise when they were fired upon. Arthur St. Clair, of Westmoreland, in a letter of June 16th to Governor Penn, informed the latter of the occurrence, stating that the captain and lieutenant were killed, but afterwards, in the same letter, said, "I was mistaken in saying two people were killed on Ten-Mile Creek. McClure was killed and Kincaid wounded; however, it would have been no great Matter if he had been killed, as he had accepted a Commission in the Service of Virginia so soon after the Notice you had been pleased to take of him at the request of his Father-in-law, Col. Wilson. . . . Before this Accident Mr. Connolly had deter-towns when the Yellow Creek Indians came in, and that there were great lamentations by all the Indians of that place. Some friendly Indians advised him to leave the Indian settlements, which he did.

"Could any rational person believe for a moment that the Indians came to Yellow Creek with hostile intentions, or that they had any suspicion of similar intentions on the part of the whites against them? Would five men have crossed the river, three of them in a short time become dead drunk, while the other two discharged their guns, and thus put themselves entirely at the mercy of the whites, or would they have brought over a squaw with an infant pappoose, if they had not reposed the utmost confidence in the friendship of the whites? Every person who is at all acquainted with Indians knows better, and it was the belief of the inhabitants who were capable of reasoning on the subject that all the depredations committed on the frontiers by Logan and his party in 1774 were as retaliation for the murder of Logan's friends at Yellow Creek."

mined to March from Ft. Pitt (which he now calls Fort Dunmore) with three or four hundred men he had embodied for the purpose of chastising the Shawanese, to erect Forts at Wheeling and Hockhockon to overawe the Indians, and from thence to carry the War into their own Country; of this he was pleased to inform me by letter, and to desire I would act in concert with him."

The general tone of the above letter seems to show that (on the part of the Pennsylvania adherents at least) even the imminent danger which threatened all the inhabitants west of the Laurel Hill could not make the partisans of the two colonies forget their animosities and act in concert for the general welfare. In a letter dated Ligonier, June 16, 1774,[1] St. Clair informed Governor Penn that a very large party of Indians had been discovered crossing the Ohio below Wheeling and moving eastward. He added, "'Tis some satisfaction the Indians seem to discriminate between us and those who attacked them, and their Revenge has fallen hitherto on that side of the Monongahela which they consider as Virginia, but least that should not continue, We are taking all possible care to prevent a heavy stroke falling on the few people that are left in this country." Thus the people east of the Monongahela were congratulating themselves that it was not on them, but on the more exposed (but then almost entirely deserted) settlements west of the Monongahela that the savages were wreaking their vengeance. "It is said," wrote William Thompson, in a letter to Governor Penn, dated June 19th, "that the Indians have fixed a boundary [the Monongahela River] betwixt the Virginians and us, and say they will not kill or touch a Pennsylvanian. But it is not best to trust them, and I am doubtful a short time will show the contrary."

But notwithstanding the supposed immunity of the people east of the Monongahela from Indian inroads, the panic there was nearly as great and as general as on the west side of the river. "Nothing can be more surprising," said St. Clair, in a letter written on the 12th of June[2] to Governor Penn, "than the dread the people are under, and it is truly shameful that so great a Body of People should have been driven from their Possessions without even the appearance of an Enemy, for certain it is as yet no attempt has been made on what is understood to be Pennsylvania, nor any other mischief done than the killing the family on White Lick Creek, which I informed you of before, and which from every circumstance appears rather to have been private revenge than a national stroke. A fresh report of Indians being seen near Hanna's Town, and another party on Braddock's road, Set the People agoing again Yesterday. I immediately took horse and rode up to inquire into, and found it, if not totally groundless, at least very improbable, but it was impossible to persuade the People so, and I am certain I did not meet less than a hundred Families and I think two Thousand head of cattle in twenty miles riding. The People in this Valley will make a stand, but yesterday they all moved into this place [Ligonier], and I perceive are much in doubt what to do. Nothing in my Power to prevent their leaving the Country shall be omitted, but if they will go I suppose I must go with the stream. It is the strangest infatuation ever seized upon men, and if they go off now, as Harvest will soon be on, they must undoubtedly perish by Famine, for spring crop there will be little or none."

When Lord Dunmore, early in May, received intelligence of the hostilities which had been commenced at Yellow Creek and other points on the Ohio, he took measures without delay to carry on a vigorous aggressive campaign against the Indians. It has been mentioned that he sent to Connolly, of Pittsburgh, his approval of the plan of building a fort at Wheeling, and that Connolly gave orders to that effect to the militia. Soon afterwards Col. McDonald was ordered to move west on Braddock's road, with a force of about five hundred men, to proceed from Laurel Hill to Fort Burd, thence across the Monongahela and the present county of Washington to Wheeling, to complete the fort, and afterwards to cross the Ohio and attack the Indians on the Muskingum. Capt. Michael Cresap had raised a company of volunteers in Maryland, and marched them west across the mountains to the Monongahela, which he reached about the 10th of July. On the 13th of that month, while nine men were at work in a cornfield on Dunkard Creek, they were suddenly attacked by a party of Indians, who killed six of them, the three others making their escape. Whether the Indian party was composed of Logan's Mingoes or not is not certainly known. Connolly reported that they were Shawanese, thirty-five in number. Cresap, being in the vicinity with his company, pursued the savages, but they had nearly a day the start of him, and made good their escape. Under these circumstances he gave up the pursuit, and marched with his company to Catfish Camp, where "his advance was stopped by a peremptory and insulting letter from Connolly, in which he was ordered to dismiss his men."[3] Thereupon he turned back, marched to the Monongahela, and thence across the mountains to Maryland, where he met Lord Dunmore, who gave him a commission as captain of Hampshire County, Virginia, militia; and in this capacity he served during the later operations of the campaign. The reason why Connolly had treated Cresap so cavalierly and refused the services of his company is not apparent, as in the preceding April, when George Rogers Clarke and Cresap were encamped with their followers at Wheeling, the latter had received proofs of high consideration from Connolly. That he was regarded with disfavor by the Pennsylvania partisans is shown in a letter from St. Clair to Governor Penn, dated July 4th, in which the former says, "With such officers as Cresap no good can be expected; so that it is very doubtful all attempts to preserve the tranquillity of the country will be fruitless."

It has been already mentioned that Col. McDonald was ordered to march with a force of about five hundred men to Wheeling, and thence into the Indian country west of the Ohio. Under these orders he marched to the Muskingum, where he surprised the Indians and punished them sufficiently to induce them to sue for peace, though it was believed that their request was but a treacherous one, designed only to gain time for the collection of a larger body of warriors to renew the hostilities.

But the main forces mustered by Dunmore for the invasion of the Indian country were a detachment to move down the Ohio from Pittsburgh, under the Governor in person, and another body of troops under Gen. Andrew Lewis,[1] which was rendezvoused at Camp Union, now Lewisburg, Greenbrier Co., Va. These two columns were to meet for co-operation at the mouth of the Great Kanawha River. Under this general plan Governor Dunmore moved from Williamsburg to Winchester and to Fort Cumberland, thence over the Braddock road to Fort Pitt, which in the mean time had been named by his partisans, in his honor, Fort Dunmore. From there he proceeded with his forces down the Ohio River, and arrived at Fort Fincastle (the stockade work which had then recently been built according to his directions at Wheeling) on the 30th of September. Maj. (afterwards colonel) William Crawford, of Stewart's Crossings on the Youghiogheny, was one of Dunmore's principal officers, and stood high in the favor of his lordship.[2]

The force under Gen. Andrew Lewis, eleven hundred strong, proceeded from Camp Union to the headwaters of the Kanawha, and thence down the valley of that river to the appointed rendezvous at its mouth, which was reached on the 6th of October. Gen. Lewis, being disappointed in his expectation of finding Lord Dunmore already there, sent messengers up the Ohio to meet his lordship and inform him of the arrival of the column at the mouth of the Kanawha. On the 9th of October a dispatch was received from Dunmore saying that he (Dunmore) was at the mouth of the Hocking, and that he would proceed thence directly to the Shawanese towns on the Scioto, instead of coming down the Ohio to the mouth of the Kanawha as at first agreed on. At the same time he ordered Lewis to cross the Ohio and march to meet him (Dunmore) before the Indian towns.

But on the following day (October 10th), before Gen. Lewis had commenced his movement across the Ohio, he was attacked by a heavy body of Shawanese warriors under the chief Cornstalk. The fight (known as the battle of Point Pleasant) raged nearly all day, and resulted in the complete rout of the Indians, who sustained a very heavy (though not definitely ascertained) loss, and retreated in disorder across the Ohio. The loss of the Virginians under Lewis was seventy-five killed and one hundred and forty wounded. Dunmore and Lewis advanced from their respective points into Ohio to "Camp Charlotte," on Sippo Creek, where they met Cornstalk and the other Shawanese chiefs, but as the men of Lewis' command were inclined to show great vindictiveness towards the Indians, Dunmore, fearing an outbreak from them, which would defeat the object he had in view (the making of a treaty of peace with the chiefs), ordered Lewis to return immediately with his force to Point Pleasant. After their departure a treaty was finally concluded with the principal chiefs; but as some of the Indians were defiant and disinclined for peace, Maj. William Crawford was sent against one of their villages, called Seekunk, or Salt Lick Town. His force consisted of two hundred and forty men, with which he destroyed the village, killed six Indians, and took fourteen prisoners.

These operations and the submission of the Indians at Camp Charlotte virtually closed the war. Governor Dunmore immediately set out on his return, and proceeded by way of Redstone and the Great Crossings of the Youghiogheny to Fort Cumberland, and thence to the Virginia capital. Maj. William Crawford also returned immediately to his home on the Youghiogheny, where, on the day after his arrival, he wrote Col. George Washington, the friend of his boyhood, as follows:

"STEWART'S CROSSINGS, Nov. 14, 1774.

"SIR,—I yesterday returned from our late expedition against the Shawanese, and I think we may with propriety say we have had great success, as we made them sensible of their villany and weakness, and I hope made peace with them on such a footing as will be lasting, if we can make them adhere to the terms of agreement, which are as follows: First, they have to give up all the prisoners taken ever by them in war with white people, also negroes, and all horses stolen or taken by them since the last war. And, further, no Indian for the future is to hunt on the east side of the Ohio, nor any white man on the west side; as that seems to have been the cause of some of the disturbance between our people and them. As a guarantee that they will perform their part of the agreement, they have given up four chief men, to be kept as hostages, who are to be relieved yearly, or as they may choose. The Shawanese have complied with the terms, but the Mingoes did not like the conditions, and had a mind to deceive us; but Lord Dunmore discovered their intentions, which were to slip off while we were settling matters with the Shawanese. The Mingoes intended to go to the Lakes, and take their prisoners with them, and their horses which they had stolen.

[1] Who had been a captain under Washington in the Fort Necessity campaign of 1754.

[2] Valentine Crawford, brother of William, and agent of Col. George Washington, wrote the latter from Fort Fincastle under date of Oct. 1, 1774, in which letter he said, "His Lordship arrived here yesterday with about twelve hundred men, seven hundred of whom came by water with his L'd'p, and five hundred came with my brother William by land with the bullocks. His L'd'p has sent him with five hundred men, fifty pack-horses, and two hundred bullocks to meet Col. Lewis at the mouth of Hockhocking, below the mouth of Little Kanawha. His Lordship is to go by water with the rest of the troops in a few days." In accordance with the plan mentioned in this letter, Maj. William Crawford proceeded to Hocking, on the Ohio side of the river, and there erected a stockade which was named Fort Gower, Dunmore arriving with the main force in time to assist in the construction of the work.

"Lord Dunmore ordered myself with two hundred and forty men to set out in the night. We were to march to a town about forty miles distant from our camp up the Scioto, where we understood the whole of the Mingoes were to rendezvous upon the following day, in order to pursue their journey. This intelligence came by John Montour, son of Capt. Montour, whom you formerly knew.

"Because of the number of Indians in our camp, we marched out of it under pretense of going to Hockhocking for more provisions. Few knew of our setting off, anyhow, and none knew where we were going to until the next day. Our march was performed with as much speed as possible. We arrived at a town called the Salt Lick Town the ensuing night, and at daybreak we got around it with one-half our force, and the remainder were sent to a small village half a mile distant. Unfortunately one of our men was discovered by an Indian who lay out from the town some distance by a log which the man was creeping up to. This obliged the man to kill the Indian. This happened before daylight, which did us much damage, as the chief part of the Indians made their escape in the dark, but we got fourteen prisoners and killed six of the enemy, wounding several more. We got all their baggage and horses, ten of their guns, and two white prisoners. The plunder sold for four hundred pounds sterling, besides what was returned to a Mohawk Indian who was there. The whole of the Mingoes were ready to start, and were to have set out the morning we attacked them." This assault on the Mingo town by Maj. Crawford was the last act of hostility in the Dunmore war.

The "settlers' forts" and block-houses, of which there were many in the territory that is now Washington County, and which by affording shelter and protection to the inhabitants prevented an entire abandonment of this section of the country in Dunmore's war, were nearly all erected during the terror and panic of the spring and summer of the year 1774. These forts were erected by the associated efforts of settlers in particular neighborhoods upon the land of some one, whose name was thereupon given to the fort, as Vance's fort, Beelor's fort, etc. They consisted of a greater or less space of land, inclosed on all sides by high log parapets or stockades, with cabins adapted to the abode of families. The only external openings were a large puncheon gate and small port-holes among the logs, through which the rifle of the settler could be pointed against the assailants. Sometimes, as at Lindley's, and many of the other forts in the adjacent country west of the Monongahela, additional cabins were erected outside of the fort for temporary abode in times of danger, from which the sojourners could in case of attack retreat within the fort.

Doddridge, in his "Notes on the Early Settlements and Indian Wars," says the "settlers' fort" of those days was "not only a place of defense but the residence of a small number of families belonging to the same neighborhood. As the Indian mode of warfare was an indiscriminate slaughter of all ages and both sexes, it was as requisite to provide for the safety of the women and children as for that of the men. The fort consisted of cabins, block-houses, and stockades. A range of cabins commonly formed one side at least of the fort. Divisions or partitions of logs separated the cabins from each other. The walls on the outside were ten or twelve feet high, the slope of the roof being turned wholly inward. A very few of these cabins had puncheon floors, the greater part were earthen. The block-houses were built at the angles of the fort. They projected about two feet beyond the outer walls of the cabins and stockades. Their upper stories were about eighteen inches every way larger in dimension than the under one, leaving an opening at the commencement of the second story to prevent the enemy from making a lodgment under the walls. In some forts the angles of the fort were furnished with bastions instead of block-houses. A large folding gate, made of thick slabs, nearest the spring, closed the fort. The stockades, bastions, cabins, and block-house walls were furnished with port-holes at proper heights and distances. The whole of the outside was made completely bullet-proof. It may be truly said that necessity is the mother of invention, for the whole of this work was made without the aid of a single nail or spike of iron, and for the reason that such things were not to be had. In some places less exposed a single block-house, with a cabin or two, constituted the whole fort. Such places of refuge may appear very trifling to those who have been in the habit of seeing the formidable military garrisons of Europe and America, but they answered the purpose, as the Indians had no artillery. They seldom attacked, and scarcely ever took one of them."

Among the number of forts of this kind that were erected in what is now Washington County were Vance's fort, on Cross Creek; Lindley's fort, in Morris township; Wells' fort, at Wells' Mills, on Cross Creek; Wolfe's fort, in Buffalo township; Froman's fort, on Chartiers Creek; Beelor's fort, on Raccoon Creek, near the site of the village of Candor; Diflow's fort, on Dillow's Run, in now Hanover township; Cherry's fort, in Mount Pleasant township; Beeman's block-house or fort, on the north fork of Wheeling Creek; Doddridge's fort, in what is now Independence township; Rice's fort, on the Dutch Fork of Buffalo, in Donegal; Miller's fort or block-house, also on the waters of Dutch Fork, in the same township; and there were a number of others of the same class in other parts of the county. Nearly all these were built, as has been mentioned, during the panic of 1774; but they continued to be used as places of security for settlers' families through a long series of Indian wars and alarms, that were most frequent and serious from 1778 to 1783, but which continued to some extent until 1794, when a lasting peace with the savages in the Ohio Valley was gained by Wayne's victory on the Maumee.

CHAPTER VII.

THE REVOLUTION.

Patriotic Meetings—Troops sent to the Field—Military Operations under Gens. Hand and McIntosh and Col. Brodhead—Expeditions under Gen. George Rogers Clarke—Fate of Col. Lochry's Command—The Moravian Expeditions and Massacre.

WASHINGTON COUNTY had no separate and independent organization or existence during the period of the Revolution until near the close of the great struggle for independence; and as for this very good reason the Revolutionary muster-rolls embrace no military organizations distinctively from this county, and no full regiments or companies are known to have been raised here for regular service in the Continental or Pennsylvania line, it might be inferred that the people then living within the territory that is now the county of Washington took very little, if any, part in the patriotic conflict. But such an inference would be wholly erroneous; for, besides the men who went from the then sparsely populated country west of the Monongahela to join the regiments and companies that were raised on the other side of that river, in Westmoreland County, soon after the opening of hostilities, there were also furnished from the settlements of Washington County, both before and immediately after its erection as such, many hundreds of volunteers and militiamen, who took gallant part, and did good service in the numerous expeditions that were sent from the valleys of the Monongahela and Ohio against the Indian tribes in the Northwest. These campaigns and expeditions were necessary for the protection of the frontiers against incursions and massacre by savages, incited by white renegades and the British, and sometimes led by officers of the royal army. They were as much a part of the Revolutionary conflict as were the battles of Trenton and Monmouth; and the men who took part in them were as much entitled to credit for their bravery and patriotism as were those who fought in the army of Washington on the Delaware and Brandywine.

Early in May, 1775, the tidings came across the Alleghenies that on the 19th of the preceding month a detachment of royal troops from Gen. Gage's force at Boston had fired on the Massachusetts provincials at Lexington Common; that the yeomanry had returned the fire and harassed the retreating regulars far on their way towards the city. Thus was announced the opening of the first act in the great drama of the Revolution, and the response which it brought forth from the people west of the mountains was prompt and unmistakably patriotic.

The dispute and feud between Virginia and Pennsylvania was then at its height in this region, both States claiming and both attempting to exercise jurisdiction over the country between Laurel Hill and the Ohio; but the partisans of both provinces unhesitatingly laid aside their animosities, or held them in abeyance, and both, on the same day, held large and patriotic meetings, pledging themselves to aid to the extent of their ability the cause of the colonies against the encroachments of Britain. Prominent in the proceedings of both meetings were men from the section of country which six years later became the county of Washington, then embraced, according to the Virginia claim, in the county of Augusta of that colony, and partly, according to Pennsylvania's claim, in her county of Westmoreland, though there was little attempt on the part of the latter at that time to exercise jurisdiction west of the Monongahela. The meeting called and held under Virginia auspices was reported as follows:

"At a meeting of the inhabitants of that part of Augusta County that lies on the west side of the Laurel Hill, at Pittsburgh, the 16th day of May, 1775, the following gentlemen were chosen a committee for the said district, viz.: George Croghan, John Campbell, Edward Ward, Thomas Smallman, John Canon, John McCullough, William Goe, George Vallandigham, John Gibson, Dorsey Pentecost, Edward Cook, William Crawford, Devereux Smith, John Anderson, David Rogers, Jacob Van Meter, Henry Enoch, James Ennis, George Wilson, William Vance, David Shepherd, William Elliott, Richmond Willis, Samuel Sample, John Ormsby, Richard McMaher, John Nevill, and John Swearingen."

A standing committee was appointed, to have "full power to meet at such times as they shall judge necessary, and in case of any emergency to call the committee of this district together, and shall be vested with the same power and authority as the other standing committee and committees of correspondence are in the other counties within this colony."

It was by the meeting "Resolved, unanimously, That this committee have the highest sense of the spirited behavior of their brethren in New England, and do most cordially approve of their opposing the invaders of American rights and privileges to the utmost extreme, and that each member of this committee respectively will animate and encourage their neighborhood to follow the brave example. . . .

"Resolved, That the recommendation of the Richmond Convention of the 20th of last March, relative to the embodying, arming, and disciplining of the militia, be immediately carried into execution with the greatest diligence in this country by the officers appointed for that end, and that the recommendation of the said convention to the several committees of this colony to collect from their constituents, in such manner as shall be most agreeable to them, so much money as shall be sufficient to purchase half a pound of gunpowder and one pound of lead, flints, and cartridge paper for every tithable person in their county be likewise carried into execution.

"This committee, therefore, out of the deepest sense of the expediency of this measure, most earnestly entreat that every member of this committee do collect from each tithable person in their several districts the sum of two shillings and sixpence, which we deem no more than sufficient for the above purpose, and give proper receipts to all such as pay the same into their hands. . . . And this committee, as your representatives, and who are most ardently laboring for your preservation, call on you, our constituents, our friends, brethren, and fellow-sufferers, in the name of God, of all you hold sacred or valuable, for the sake of your wives, children, and unborn generations, that you will every one of you, in your several stations, to the utmost of your power, assist in levying such sum, by not only paying yourselves, but by assisting those who are not at present in a condition to do so. We heartily lament the case of all such as have not this sum at command in this day of necessity; to all such we recommend to tender security to such as Providence has enabled to lend them so much; and this committee do pledge their faith and fortunes to you, their constituents, that we shall, without fee or reward, use our best endeavors to procure, with the money so collected, the ammunition our present exigencies have made so exceedingly necessary.

"As this committee has reason to believe there is a quantity of ammunition destined for this place for the purpose of government, and as this country on the west side of Laurel Hill is greatly distressed for want of ammunition, and deprived of the means of procuring it, by reason of its situation, as easy as the lower counties of this colony, they do earnestly request the committees of Frederick, Augusta, and Hampshire that they will not suffer the ammunition to pass through their counties for the purposes of government, but will secure it for the use of this destitute country, and immediately inform this committee of their having done so. Ordered, that the standing committee be directed to secure such arms and ammunition as are not employed in actual service or private property, and that they get the same repaired, and deliver them to such captains of independent companies as may make application for the same, and taking such captains' receipt for the arms so delivered.

"Resolved, That this committee do approve of the resolution of the committee of the other part of this county relative to the cultivating a friendship with the Indians, and if any person shall be so depraved as to take the life of any Indian that may come to us in a friendly manner, we will, as one man, use our utmost endeavors to bring such offenders to condign punishment.

"Resolved, That the sum of fifteen pounds, current money, be raised by subscription, and that the same be transmitted to Robert Carter Nicholas, Esq., for the use of the deputies sent from this colony to the General Congress; which sum of money was immediately paid by the committee then present." The delegates referred to in this resolution were John Harvie and George Rootes, who were addressed, in instructions from the committee, as "being chosen to represent the people on the west side of the Laurel Hill in the Colonial Congress for the ensuing year," the committee then instructing them to lay certain specified grievances of the people of this section before the Congress at their first meeting, "as we conceive it highly necessary they should be redressed to put us on a footing with the rest of our brethren in the colony."

The meeting held on the same day at the county-seat of Westmoreland was not so numerously attended by people from west of the Monongahela, the greater part of the prominent men of this section considering themselves as belonging to Virginia and attending the Augusta County meeting at Pittsburgh. The Westmoreland meeting declared themselves to be

"Possessed with the most unshaken loyalty and fidelity to His Majesty King George the Third, whom we acknowledge to be our lawful and rightful king, and who we wish may long be the beloved sovereign of a free and happy people throughout the whole British Empire;" but

"Resolved, unanimously, That the Parliament of Great Britain, by several late acts, have declared the inhabitants of the Massachusetts Bay to be in rebellion, and the ministry, by endeavoring to enforce those acts, have attempted to reduce the said inhabitants to a more wretched state of slavery than ever before existed in any state or country. Not content with violating their constitutional and chartered privileges, they would strip them of the rights of humanity, exposing lives to the wanton and unpunishable sport of a licentious soldiery, and depriving them of the very means of subsistence." They also resolved that they would oppose the oppressions of the ministry with their lives and their fortunes. "And the better to enable us to accomplish it we will immediately form ourselves into a military body, to consist of companies, to be made up out of the several townships, under the following association, which is declared to be the Association of Westmoreland County." The objects of which Association were declared to be:

"First. To arm and form ourselves into a regiment, or regiments, and choose officers to command us, in such proportions as shall be thought necessary.

"Second. We will with alacrity endeavor to make ourselves masters of the manual, exercise, and such evolutions as may be necessary to enable us to act in a body with concert, and to that end we will meet at such times and places as shall be appointed, either for the companies or the regiment, by the officers commanding each when chosen.

"Third. That should our country be invaded by a foreign enemy, or should troops be sent from Great Britain to enforce the late arbitrary acts of its Parliament, we will cheerfully submit to military discipline, and to the utmost of our power resist and oppose them, or either of them, and will coincide with any plan that may be formed for the defense of America in general or Pennsylvania in particular." And the meeting further resolved that when the Parliament should show a willingness to do justice to the colonies, then, and not till then, should the Association of Westmoreland County be dissolved.

About a month after the events above narrated, a small body of men who had volunteered from the frontier settlements crossed the Monongahela River and marched eastward over the mountains to join a Maryland company which was being formed under Capt. Michael Cresap for service in the provincial army. The nominal home of Capt. Cresap was at Old Town, Md., but his base of operations at that time, and for a few previous years, was at Redstone Old Fort, now Brownsville, on the Monongahela, opposite the eastern border of Washington County. Here he had a good house[1] and a store, from which he traded at points below on the river. He had been engaged, and somewhat prominent, in the Indian fighting of 1774, known as Dunmore's war, being the same Capt. Cresap to whom was (wrongfully, it now seems almost certain) charged the crime of killing the family of the Indian chief Logan. The men who now marched to join his company in Maryland are mentioned as "his old companions in arms," and although none of their names have been preserved, there is little doubt that most, if not all of them, were from the settlements on the Monongahela, and between that river and the Ohio.

Cresap had been in Kentucky in the spring of 1775, but being taken ill there had set out by way of the Ohio and across the mountains for his home in Maryland, where he hoped to recover his health. "On his way across the Allegheny Mountains[2] he was met by a faithful friend with a message stating that he had been appointed by the Committee of Safety at Frederick a captain to command one of the two rifle companies required from Maryland by a resolution of Congress. Experienced officers and the very best men that could be procured were demanded. 'When I communicated my business,' says the messenger in his artless narrative, 'and announced his appointment, instead of becoming elated he became pensive and solemn, as if his spirits were really depressed, or as if he had a presentiment that this was his death-warrant. He said he was in bad health, and his affairs in a deranged state, but that nevertheless, as the committee had selected him, and as he understood from me his father had pledged himself that he should accept of this appointment, he would go, let the consequences be what they might. He then directed me to proceed to the west side of the mountains and publish to his old companions in arms this his intention; this I did, and in a very short time collected and brought to him at his residence in Old Town [Maryland] about twenty-two as fine fellows as ever handled rifle, and most, if not all of them, completely equipped.'"

It was in June that these men were raised and moved across the mountains to Frederick, Md., to join Cresap's company. A letter written from that place on the 1st of the following August to a gentleman in Philadelphia said, "Notwithstanding the urgency of my business, I have been detained three days in this place by an occurrence truly agreeable. I have had the happiness of seeing Capt. Michael Cresap marching at the head of a formidable company of upwards of one hundred and thirty men from the mountains and backwoods, painted like Indians, armed with tomahawks and rifles, dressed in hunting-shirts and moccasins, and though some of them had traveled near eight hundred [?] miles from the banks of the Ohio, they seemed to walk light and easy, and not with less spirit than on the first hour of their march." . . . They marched in August, and joined Washington's army near Boston, where and in later campaigns they did good service. Their captain's health growing worse he resigned and started for Maryland, but died on his way in New York in the following October. The names of the men who were recruited west of the mountains for Cresap's company cannot be given, but there can be little doubt that most of them were his old comrades of the Dunmore war, and from the settlements between the Monongahela and Ohio Rivers.

In the fall of 1775 the Seventh Virginia Regiment was recruited and organized by Col. William Crawford. This was the first considerable body of men raised in the Monongahela country for the Revolutionary service. Col. Crawford's home was on the [2] Extract from "Logan and Cresap," by Col. Brantz Mayer.

Youghiogheny at Stewart's Crossings (now the borough of New Haven, Fayette Co.), but being an active Virginia partisan, and very popular among the Virginians west of the Monongahela,[1] many of his men were recruited in what afterwards became Washington County, the remainder being largely obtained in that part of Westmoreland County which became Fayette. Crawford did not at once receive the colonelcy of the Seventh, but became its commanding officer in 1776. It was afterwards commanded by Col. John Gibson. The regiment entered the service with the Continental army in the East, and remained there for some time, but during the later years of the war served in the Western Department, with headquarters at Fort Pitt.

The Thirteenth Virginia (known as the "West Augusta Regiment") was afterwards raised, chiefly by Crawford's efforts, in the same region of country in which the Seventh had been recruited. The Thirteenth (of which Crawford was made colonel) performed its service in the West, being stationed in detachments at Fort Pitt and other points on the Ohio and Allegheny Rivers. An extract from a letter written by Crawford to Gen. Washington,[2] dated "Fredericktown, Md., February 12, 1777," is given below because of its reference to the two regiments raised in the Monongahela country, viz.:

"Many reasons have we to expect a war [with the Indians] this spring. The chief of the lower settlements upon the Ohio has moved off; and should both the regiments be moved away, it will greatly distress the people, as the last raised by myself [the West Augusta Regiment] was expected to be a guard for them if there was an Indian war. By the Governor of Virginia I was appointed to command that regiment at the request of the people. The conditions were that the soldiers were enlisted during the war, and if an Indian war should come on this spring they were to be continued there, as their interest was on the spot; but if there should be no Indian war in that quarter, then they were to go wherever called. On these conditions many cheerfully enlisted. The regiment, I believe, by this time is nearly made up, as five hundred and odd were made up before I came away, and the officers were recruiting very fast; but should they be ordered away before they get blankets and other necessaries, I do not see how they are to be moved; besides, the inhabitants will be in great fear under the present circumstances. Many men have already been taken from that region, so that if that regiment should march away, it will leave few or none to defend the country. There are no arms, as the chief part of the first men were armed there, which has left the place very bare; but let me be ordered anywhere, and I will go if possible. . . . ."

[1] It was the almost universal opinion among the people west of the Monongahela at that time that they were within the jurisdiction of Augusta Co., Va.

[2] Washington–Crawford Letters, p. 62.

It seems remarkable that the sparsely-settled country west of Laurel Hill (and principally the Monongahela Valley) should have been able to furnish two full regiments[3] (furnishing almost all the arms for one regiment) and put them into the field by the spring of 1777. But there had also been raised under Pennsylvania authority in what was then Westmoreland County (then including the present county of Washington) a company under Capt. Joseph Erwin. It marched to Marcus Hook, where it was incorporated with Col. Samuel Miles' "Pennsylvania Rifle Regiment." It was subsequently included in the Thirteenth Pennsylvania, then in the Second Pennsylvania Regiment, and was finally discharged from service at Valley Forge Jan. 1, 1778, by reason of expiration of its term of enlistment. During its period of service the company fought at Long Island, White Plains, Trenton, Princeton, Quibbletown (N. J.), Brandywine, and Germantown. On the roll of this company are found the names of Joseph Brownlee, John Brownlee, Andrew Bryson, Robert Heslet, Leech, Orr, and others, who either were then or afterwards became residents of Washington County.

Under authority of a resolution of Congress dated July 15, 1776,[4] was raised the Eighth Regiment of the Pennsylvania line, for the defense of the western frontier, to garrison the posts of Presque Isle, Le Bœuf, and Kittaning. One company of this regiment was raised in Bedford County, and all the remaining seven companies were recruited in the territory then comprised in Westmoreland County. On the 29th of July, 1776, Congress appointed as field-officers of this regiment Col. Eneas McKay, Lieut.-Col. George Wilson, and Maj. Richard Butler. September 22d, David McClure was elected chaplain, and Ephraim Douglass, quartermaster. Among the names of company commanders are found those of Capt. Van Swearingen and Capt. Samuel Brady, both of Washington County. Among the private soldiers Washington County family names are numerous.

On the 23d of November Congress directed the Board of War to order the regiment to march with all possible expedition by the nearest route "to Brunswick, N. J., or to join Gen. Washington wherever he may be." On the 4th of November the regiment received orders to march to Amboy, N. J., whereupon Lieut.-Col. George Wilson wrote from the regimental rendezvous to Col. James Wilson as follows:

"Ketanian, Dec. 5th, 1776.

"Dr Colonall: Last Evening We Recd Marching orders, Which I must say is not Disagreeable to me under ye Sircumstances of y times, for when I entr'd into y Service I Judged that if a necessity appeared [3] In February, 1777, Congress appropriated the sum of $20,080, "to be paid to Col. William Crawford for raising and equiping his regiment, which is a part of the Virginia new levies." It is not certain as to which of the regiments raised by Crawford this had reference, but it appears to have been the last one, the "West Augusta Regiment."

"G. Wilson.

"To Col. James Wilson, of the Honorable the Cont. Congress, Phila."

Until the 5th of December, 1776, the regiment was styled in the quartermaster's receipts "the Battalion commanded by Col. Eneas Mackay," but at that date it is first styled "The Eighth Battalion of Penn'a troops in the Continental service," showing that it had then been assigned to duty in the Continental line. The regiment marched from Kittaning on the 6th of January, 1777, and it and the Twelfth Pennsylvania were the first regiments of the line in the field. The next notice of it is found in the "Life of Timothy Pickering" (volume i., page 122), in the following reference to the Eighth Pennsylvania:

"March 1, 1777, Saturday.

"Dr. Putnam brought me a billet, of which the following is a copy:

"'Dear Sir: Our Battalion is so unfortunate as not to have a Doctor, and, in my opinion, dying for want of medicine. I beg you will come down to-morrow morning and visit the sick of my company. For that favor you shall have sufficient satisfaction from your humble servant,

"'James Pigott,

"'Capt. of 8 Batt. of Pa.

"'Quibbletown, Feb. 28, 1777.'

"I desired the Dr. by all means to visit them. They were raised about the Ohio, and had traveled near five hundred miles, as one of the soldiers who came for the Dr. informed me. For 150 miles over mountains, never entering a house, but building fires and encamping in the Snow. Considerable numbers, unused to such hardships, have since died. The Colonel and Lieutenant-Colonel among the dead. The Dr. informed he found them quartered in cold shattered houses."

Cols. Mackay and Wilson having died, Daniel Brodhead became colonel, Richard Butler lieutenant-colonel, and Stephen Bayard major. When Morgan's rifle command was organized, Lieut.-Col. Butler was made lieutenant-colonel of it, and Maj. James Ross, of the First Pennsylvania, became lieutenant-colonel. According to a return signed by the latter, dated "Mount Pleasant, June 9, 1777," the number of men enlisted between the 9th of August and the 16th of December, 1776, was six hundred and thirty; enlisted since the 16th of December, thirty-four; making a total of six hundred and eighty-four. The strength of the respective companies was:

	Sergeants.	Rank and File.
Capt. David Kilgore's Company	3	55
Capt. Samuel Miller's "	4	82
Capt. Van Swearingen's "	3	71
Capt. James Pigott's "	4	55
Capt. Wendel Ourry's "	4	54
Capt. Andrew Mann's "	4	58
Capt. James Montgomery's Company	2	57
Capt. Michael Huffnagle's "	4	70
Capt. Lieut. John Finley's "	2	77
Capt. Lieut. Basil Prather's "	3	69

From the total thirty-six were deducted as prisoners of war, fourteen missing, fifty-one dead, fifteen discharged, one hundred and twenty-six deserted. Lieut. Matthew Jack, absent from April 13th, wounded. Ensign Gabriel Peterson, absent from April 17th, wounded. Capt. Moses Carson, deserted April 21st. First Lieut. Richard Carson, deserted. Aquila White, ensign, deserted February 23d. Joseph McDolo, first lieutenant, deserted. Thomas Forthay, ensign, deserted. Alexander Simrall, second lieutenant, cashiered. David McKee, ensign, dismissed the service. Ephraim Douglass, quartermaster, taken by the enemy, March 13th.

Capt. Van Swearingen, First Lieut. Basil Prather, and Second Lieut. John Hardin with their commands were detailed on duty with Col. Morgan, and greatly distinguished themselves in the series of actions that resulted in the surrender of Gen. Burgoyne at Saratoga. These commands consisted of picked riflemen out of all of the companies of the Eighth Pennsylvania.

A return dated Nov. 1, 1777, shows the strength of the regiment present: colonel, major, two captains, six lieutenants, adjutant, paymaster and surgeon, sergeant-major, quartermaster-sergeant and drum-major, twenty-nine sergeants, nine drums and fifes, one hundred and twelve rank and file fit for duty; twenty-eight sick present, seventy-seven sick absent, one hundred and thirty-nine on command; total, three hundred and fifty-one. Prisoners of war, one sergeant and fifty-eight privates. Capt. Van Swearingen, Lieut. Basil Prather, and Lieut. John Hardin on command with Col. Morgan. Vacant offices: lieutenant-colonel, four captains, three lieutenants, eight ensigns, chaplain, and surgeon's mate. Lieut.-Col. Ross resigned after the battles of Brandywine and Germantown.

On the 5th of March, 1777, the regiment was ordered to Pittsburgh for the defense of the western frontiers, and by direction of Gen. McIntosh, Col. Brodhead made, about the 12th of July, a détour up the West Branch to check the savages who were ravaging Wyoming and the West Branch Valley. He was at Muncy on the 24th of July, and had ordered Capt. Finley's company into Penn's Valley, where two of the latter's soldiers, Thomas Van Doren and Jacob Shedacre, who had participated in the campaign against Burgoyne, were killed on the 24th, in sight of Potter's fort, by the Indians. (Pennsylvania Archives, O. S., vol. vi. page 666.) Soon after, Col. Hartley with his regiment relieved Col. Brodhead, and he proceeded with the Eighth to Pittsburgh.

A monthly return of the troops commanded by Col. Brodhead in the Western Department, dated July 30, 1780, gives the strength of the Eighth Pennsylvania: colonel, lieutenant-colonel, major, two captains, three lieutenants, four ensigns, adjutant, paymaster, quartermaster, surgeon, surgeon's mate, sergeant-major, quartermaster-sergeant, one drum and fife major, ten sergeants, ten drums and fifes, one hundred and twenty rank and file fit for duty, four sick, two furloughed, eight on command, three deserted, six joined the Invalid Company.

In a letter from Gen. William Irvine to Gen. Washington, soon after he took command at Fort Pitt, dated Dec. 2, 1781, he says, "I have reformed the remains of the late Eighth Pennsylvania into two companies, and call them a detachment from the Pennsylvania line, to be commanded by Lieut.-Col. Bayard." [The first company, Capt. Clark, Lieuts. Peterson and Reed; second company, Capt. Brady, Lieuts. Ward and Morrison.]

Capt. Matthew Jack, in a statement on file, says, "In the year 1778 the Eighth was sent to Pittsburgh to guard the frontier, and placed under the command of Gen. McIntosh; that they went down to the mouth of the Beaver, and there built Fort McIntosh, and from that went, upon McIntosh's command, to the head of the Muskingum, and there built Fort Laurens. In the year 1779 went up the Allegheny, on Gen. Brodhead's expedition, attacked the Indians and defeated them, and burned their towns. On the return of the regiment, its time having expired, it was discharged at Pittsburgh." For a full account of the services of this regiment in the West the reader is referred to "Brodhead's Letter-Book," published in the twelfth volume, first series, of Pennsylvania Archives.

Van Swearingen was probably the most noted captain in the Eighth Pennsylvania. On the 19th of September he and a lieutenant and twenty privates were captured in a sudden dash that scattered Morgan's men. He fell into the hands of the Indians, but was rescued by Gen. Fraser's batman (one who takes care of his officer's horse), who took him before the general. The latter interrogated him concerning the number of the American army, but got no answer, except that it was commanded by Gens. Gates and Arnold. He then threatened to hang him. "You may, if you please," said Van Swearingen. Fraser then rode off, leaving him in care of Sergt. Dunbar, who consigned him to Lieut. Auburey, who ordered him to be placed among the other prisoners, with directions not to be ill treated. Swearingen, after Burgoyne's army was removed to Virginia, made especial exertions to have Dunbar and Auburey exchanged. Swearingen was the first sheriff of Washington County in 1781. His daughter became the wife of the celebrated Capt. Samuel Brady (also of the Eighth Pennsylvania), so conspicuous in the annals of Western Pennsylvania.

[1] "This roll of the Pennsylvania line of course falls far short of doing justice to the patriotism of Pennsylvania. It is in fact a mere roll of the line as discharged in January, 1781. The hundreds who fell in all the battles of the Revolution, from Quebec to Charleston, are not here; the wounded who dragged their torn limbs home to die in their native valleys are not here. The heaths of New Jersey, from Paramus to Freehold, by a line encircling Morristown and Bound Brook, were, in the summer of 1777, dotted with the graves of the Eighth and Twelfth Pennsylvania. These regiments from the frontier counties of the State —Westmoreland and Northumberland—were the first of the line in the field, though they had come from the banks of the Monongahela and the head-waters of the Susquehanna. At Brandywine the Pennsylvania troops lost heavily, the Eighth and Twelfth and Col. Hartley's additional regiment in particular, in officers and men; and Col. Patton's additional regiment, after the battle of Germantown, could not maintain its regimental organization."—The Pennsylvania Line, from July 1, 1776, to Nov. 3, 1783.

Immediately after the departure of the Eighth Pennsylvania from Kittaning to join the army in the East, a detachment of Westmoreland militia marched from that county for Philadelphia, as appears from the following letter,[1] addressed by John Proctor to the Council of Safety:

"Carlisle, January y[e] 27[th] 1777.

"Dear Sir,—I am on my Martch with a party of Melisha from the county of Westmoreland, of the first Batallion of about 240; we are like to be Scarse of Cash, and will not be able to Retch Philadelphia with a Suplay, and hauve Dispatched the Bairor Leut[n] Coll[n] Archibald Lochry to your Honourabble Bord, and I hope you will Send by Him the Sum whitch you may think Nesery. Vitlin is very high and Hard to be got.

"I am Sir,
"youre Very Humble Ser't,
"John Proctor."

Directed:

"On the Service of the United States
To the President of Council in Philadelphia.
by favour sent Coll[n] Lochry."

No roll of this detachment has been found, nor anything further ascertained with regard to its movements or services.

[1] Penn. Archives, 1776-77, p. 202.

Other than the military organizations which have already been mentioned, viz.: the Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment, the company which joined Miles' Rifles, the Seventh and Thirteenth Virginia Battalions, and the detachment of Westmoreland militia, no other troops were raised in the Monongahela country for regular service in the Revolutionary armies, though many were afterwards raised for the various Indian campaigns and expeditions. From that time forward to the close of the war the able-bodied men west of the Monongahela were kept constantly on guard, if not on actual duty, against Indian incursions and massacre along the frontier; and it could not be expected that they would leave their families and homes defenseless to serve in the armies operating hundreds of miles away across the mountains.

At the beginning of the war Col. John Neville had taken possession of Fort Pitt with a body of Virginia militia from the Monongahela and Ohio River settlements, and held the old and dilapidated work until superseded in the command by Brig.-Gen. Edward Hand, an officer in the Continental establishment in 1777. During Neville's occupancy he pursued a peaceful policy towards the Indians, and in this course he was supported and aided by Col. George Morgan, congressional agent of Indian affairs in the West, who soon afterwards became a resident on Chartiers Creek at the place now known as Morganza, in Washington County. By their combined efforts, however, they failed to repress the hostility of the tribes, except the Delawares, who then, and for a considerable time afterwards, remained peaceable.

In 1777 several incursions were made by the Indians, among which was an attack at Wheeling Creek near Fort Henry (Wheeling), which is mentioned in the following letter from Capt. Samuel Meason to Gen. Edward Hand,[2] viz.:

"Fort Henry, June 8, 1777.

"Sir,—Yesterday, between the hours of five and six o'clock, as a few of Capt. Van Meter's Company were fishing about half a mile from this fort up Wheeling Creek, a certain Thomas McCleary and one Lanimore, being some distance from the others, were fired on by a party of Indians to the number of six, seven, or eight guns, of which the several persons near do not agree, as some say eight or upwards. Lanimore and others gave the alarm. I went to the place and found Tracks, but difficult to ascertain the number of Indians. McCleary's shoe being found which he wore when he received the wound, we presently found him killed and scalped. He had run about three hundred yards from the creek. Night coming on by the time that we were satisfied of its being Indians, I proposed to set out this morning by daylight in pursuit, and have drawn out of Capt. Virgin's company eight men, so that we amount to thirty men well equipt, and do cross the river at this place, as they seemed by their Tracks to bend their direction down the river, and purpose to pursue them to the last extremity and hazard. I sett off at eight this morning, and flatter myself that you will not disapprove our Proceeding but call on me if any occasion should require, and as I may not return to the ensuing council at Catfish, I take this opportunity to return your Honour the strength of my company, which consists of fifty men, of which forty-five are in good order and furnished for going on any emergency and expedition that may be necessary."

From this letter it appears probable that at that time the fort was garrisoned by men from the vicinity of the Monongahela,—the company of Capt. Brice Virgin, who resided near the present borough of Washington, and that of Capt. Van Meter, from what is now Greene County. At about the same time that the above-mentioned attack was made at Wheeling Creek, a small party of Indians was prowling on the head-waters of Buffalo Creek, but they committed no murders in the vicinity at that time.

On the 1st of September a force of two hundred and ten Indians laid siege to Fort Henry, but failed to capture the place. They withdrew across the Ohio with but trifling loss to themselves, after having killed fifteen, and wounded five more of the whites. On the 27th of the same month a Wyandot party of forty warriors attacked a body of forty-six white men eight miles below Wheeling on the Virginia side of the Ohio. In this action twenty-one of the white men were killed, a considerable number wounded, and one taken prisoner by the savages. This last-named attack had the effect to create a general panic through all the country from the Ohio to the Monongahela.

In the spring of 1778 the hostility of the Indians became far more active, the result of the instigations of the British on the lake frontier, and still more by Simon Girty and other white renegades who had deserted from Fort Pitt and gone to the Indians to incite them on in their work of massacre and devastation. In January of that year Gen. George Rogers Clarke, a Virginia officer, whose career in the Dunmore war of 1774 has already been noticed, raised about one hundred and fifty Virginians, chiefly on the upper Monongahela, for a campaign against the British posts in the far West. He embarked this force in boats built and launched on the Monongahela at and near the site of West Brownsville.[1] Passing down the Monongahela and Ohio in May, he received reinforcements at points below on the Ohio, proceeded to the lower river, disembarked his forces, and marching thence through a wilderness country partly submerged in many places, effected the reduction and capture of Vincennes, Kaskaskia, and other British posts west of the Wabash, achieving a success that at once made his name famous.

In February, 1778, Gen. Hand made an expedition into the Indian country west of the Ohio, the first which entered that region in any considerable force in the Revolution. About five hundred men marched from Fort Pitt and proceeded to the Cuyahoga River for the purpose of destroying some British stores reported to be there. The result of this movement was one Indian warrior and one squaw killed, and one squaw taken prisoner; and of the white troops, one captain wounded and one man drowned. From the insignificance of its achievements this was called in derision the "Squaw Campaign."

In May, 1778, Gen. Hand was succeeded in the command of the Western Department by another Continental officer, Brig.-Gen. Lachlin McIntosh, who brought with him a small force from the regular Continental line. In the mean time Pennsylvania and Virginia had become aroused to the danger menacing their western frontiers, and had taken measures to raise a force for their protection. The Congress too had become aware of the increased hostility of the Indians and its cause, and had awakened to the pressing necessity of more active measures for the protection of the almost defenseless borders. This resulted in the determination to send an expedition for the reduction of the British post of Detroit, as the surest means of overawing the savages and so insuring the safety of the frontier.

Orders were therefore issued to Gen. McIntosh to organize the proposed expedition and march against Detroit. In obedience to these orders he moved down the Ohio River with his little force of Continentals, a battalion of Virginians, and several companies of Pennsylvanians (raised by the State for the emergency as before mentioned), and halting at the mouth of Beaver, the site of the present town of that name, erected there a small fort, which was named Fort McIntosh. This, the first military work ever erected by the United States on the Indian side of the Ohio, was a stockade, but bastioned, and on each bastion was mounted a six-pounder gun. It was scarcely more than worthless as against even light artillery, but for the purpose for which it was built was considered formidable.

By the time Fort McIntosh was completed it was found that the proposed expedition against Detroit would be too expensive an undertaking for the slender resources of the Congress. It was therefore abandoned. Gen. McIntosh, having received orders to proceed instead at his discretion against some of the Indian settlements, and having decided on an expedition against the Wyandot towns on the upper waters of the Sandusky, leaving a garrison at the fort, marched with about one thousand men into the western wilderness towards his objective-point. But for some cause which is not perfectly clear, on reaching the Muskingum River he decided to proceed no farther until spring, and therefore halted there and erected a defensive work, which he named, in honor of the president of the Continental Congress, Fort Laurens. It was a weak stockade, located on the west bank of the river, near the site of the present town of Bolivar, Tuscarawas Co., Ohio. Having decided on a suspension of operations for the season, he left in the fort a garrison of one hundred and fifty men, under command of Col. John Gibson, and returned with the main body of his force to Fort Pitt.

[1] Another expedition that started from the same vicinity in that year was that of David Rogers, who had been authorized by the Virginia government to purchase supplies in New Orleans. He, like Clarke, built keel-boats, and in these, with about thirty men, went down the Monongahela in June. On arriving at New Orleans he found that he must go up the river to St. Louis to receive his goods. This he did, but more than a year was consumed in the voyage, and when on his way back, up the Ohio, in October, 1779, the Indians attacked his party, killed nearly all (including Rogers), took the rest prisoners, and captured the entire cargoes of goods, consisting of provisions, clothing, rum, and other articles, besides a considerable amount of silver money.

In January following Gen. McIntosh's return to Fort Pitt, Col. Gibson at Fort Laurens suddenly found himself besieged by a body of about eight hundred and fifty Indians, who reached the vicinity of the fort in the evening after dark. During the first night of the presence of the savages they caught the horses which were outside the fort, took off their bells, and led them some distance into the woods, then concealing themselves in the grass that bordered the path to the woods, and at about daybreak a party of them commenced rattling the bells at a point beyond the ambush. The people in the fort supposed the horses were there, and sixteen men were sent to bring them in. When they had been drawn sufficiently into the ambushment the concealed Indians fired on them in front and rear, killing all but two, who were taken prisoners. In the afternoon of the same day the whole Indian force marched within full view of the garrison to an elevated piece of ground on the opposite side of the river, where they made their encampment. The siege of the fort continued for six weeks, at the end of which time the garrison became greatly straitened for provisions, but it proved that the savages were still more so. During the time of their stay frequent conversations were held between the besiegers and besieged, the former telling Col. Gibson that they did not want war, but they were determined that the white man should not come and occupy their country and build forts within it. With Col. Gibson's garrison there was a Delaware Indian called John Thompson, who during the investment had been permitted by both parties to go to and fro between the Indian camp and the fort at will. Finally the savages sent word by this Thompson to the white commandant that they wanted peace, and would make a treaty and leave the place if he would send them a barrel of flour and some tobacco. The garrison were terribly reduced for provisions, but Col. Gibson acceded to the request of the Indians, and sent them the articles demanded, whereupon the savages raised the siege and marched away through the woods, but did not keep their promise to make a treaty of peace.

Col. Gibson had a large number of sick men in his garrison, and soon after the Indians had apparently left the vicinity, he detached Col. Clarke with fifteen men to escort these invalids to Fort McIntosh, but they had not proceeded far from the fort when they fell into an ambush of the treacherous Indians, and all were killed or taken prisoners except Col. Clarke and three others who succeeded in making their escape to the fort. This act of perfidy so incensed Col. Gibson that he at once sallied out with the main part of his force, determined to attack and punish the Indians for their treachery, but the savage forces had disappeared and were not again seen.

During the continuance of the siege, Col. Gibson had managed to send a friendly Delaware with a message to Gen. McIntosh at Fort Pitt, notifying him that unless men and provisions were promptly sent him he would be compelled to surrender. The general sent messengers in haste to the settlers up the Monongahela, acquainting them of the situation of affairs at Fort Laurens, and asking instant aid in men and provisions. The settlers promptly responded, many volunteering for the expedition of relief, and others furnishing pack-horses, with an abundant supply of provisions. With these and a part of the garrison of Fort Pitt (making an entire force of about seven hundred men), Gen. McIntosh set out without delay, and marched rapidly to Fort Laurens, which was reached a few days after the departure of the besieging force of Indians. When the relief force appeared in sight at the fort the joy of the garrison was great, and found expression in the firing of a salute of musketry, which, however, cost them dear, for it frightened the pack-horses and caused them to break loose and run into the woods with their loads, by which accident a great part of the flour was lost, the sacks being broken open, and their contents scattered among the trees and bushes so that it could not be recovered. The meats of course were not injured.

A new garrison under Maj. Frederick Vernon was left at Fort Laurens, and Gibson's command, with the main force under Gen. McIntosh, returned to Fort Pitt. During the stay of Maj. Vernon at Fort Laurens the garrison under his command was reduced to the verge of starvation, and finally, in the spring of 1779, the fort was evacuated and abandoned. The evacuation of Fort McIntosh followed soon afterwards. The withdrawal of the troops from these forts was the final abandonment of the proposed expeditions of Gen. McIntosh against the British post of Detroit and the Wyandot towns on the Sandusky. The troops with which he had prosecuted his operations at Forts McIntosh and Laurens in 1778 and the early part of 1779 were, with the exception of the small Continental force which he brought with him from the East, made up almost exclusively of men from the country between the Laurel Hill and the Ohio River, the territory which afterwards became Washington County furnishing its full share.

Through all the Monongahela country and westward to the Ohio River there was great consternation and alarm and no little indignation at the withdrawal of the garrisons of the frontier forts, McIntosh and Laurens, and public meetings were held to memorialize Congress and pray for the re-occupation of the posts. But Congress could do nothing, for the operations of the armies in the East called for all, and more than all, the men and means at command. So the borders were of necessity left for the time to take care of themselves and protect their exposed frontiers from savages, white outlaws, and the British.

Gen. McIntosh had retired from the command of the Western Department in 1779, and was succeeded by Col. Daniel Brodhead, who, as it appears, was invested with power to order out the militia of the western counties through the several county lieutenants. Early in 1780 the Indians commenced their work of devastation in the frontier settlements. On the 18th of March, Col. Brodhead, in a communication to the president of the Council,[1] said, "I am sorry to inform you that the Savages have already begun their hostilities. Last Sunday morning at a Sugar Camp upon Raccoon Creek five Men were killed & three lads & three girls taken prisoners. It is generally conjectured that the Delawares[2] have struck this blow, and it is probable enough, but it is possible it may have been done by other Indians. If the Delawares are set against us, with their numerous alliances, they will greatly distress the frontier, as my Force is quite too small to repell their invasions. I have wrote to the Commander-in-Chief for a reinforcement from the main army, but I fear it will not be in his power to detach any of the troops. . . You may rely on my giving every possible protection & countenance to our settlements, but I have very little in my power without calling out the Militia, and for them I have no provisions. What Col. Geo. Morgan [congressional Indian agent] has been doing this two years past I know not, but I conceive that if he had been where his employment required we should have been much better provided."

On the 27th of April the commandant said, in a letter to the president of the Council, "I am glad to hear of the four Companies voted to be raised by the authority of the State for the Defense of the frontier, and as I flatter myself the Eastern parts of the State are at present freed from apprehensions of Danger, so I hope these Companies, when raised, will be ordered to this District, where the Enemy are remarkably hostile. Between forty and fifty men, women, & Children have been killed & taken from what are now called the Counties of Yoghogania, Monongalia, & Ohio since the first of March [meaning the country west of the Monongahela River], but no damage has yet been done in the County of Westmoreland. It is to be lamented that our treasury is low, but as I always avoid an anticipation of evil, so I hope for better accounts from thence." On the 13th of May he again wrote the president,[3] saying, "The Mingoes are again prevailed on by English Goods & address to disturb our repose. They have lately killed and wounded several people in Westmoreland County, & the Tracks of four parties have been discovered on that frontier within the last four Days, and two parties of Indians have crossed the Ohio between Logstown and this place [Fort Pitt] since Morning. I have only the Cullings of the last year's men left, and can do but very little to prevent their incursions, but do all I can.

"The Delaware Indians continue their professions of Friendship, and some of them are now with my Scouts; but having nothing but fair words to give them, I expect they will soon be tired of this Service. For heaven's sake hurry up the Companies voted by the Hon'ble Assembly, or Westmoreland County will soon be a wilderness."

In view of this alarming situation of affairs, Col. Brodhead conceived that offensive operations against the Indians west of the Ohio would be the surest means of securing peace and safety for the frontier settlements, and accordingly he at once commenced the fitting out and organizing of such an expedition, to be composed chiefly of troops drafted from the militia of the western counties. Reference to this proposed expedition is made in the following letter, addressed by Brodhead to Col. Joseph Beelor,[4] county lieutenant of Yohogania County, Va., it being a circular letter addressed also to the lieutenants of the Virginia counties of Monongalia and Ohio, viz.:

"Head-Quarters, Fort Pitt, May 9th, 1780.

"Dear Sir,—I find it will not be in my power to provide for the number of men I have ordered to be called into service so soon as I expected. Besides, I have heard that a number of Artillery and Stores and two Regiments of Infantry are now on their march to reinforce my command. The account of Artillery and Stores I have received officially, and I believe the other may be credited.

"It will be essentially necessary for the leading officers of your County to excite the greatest industry in planting and sowing the Summer crop, and to have your troops at Fort Henry (Wheeling, Va.) by the 4th day of next month. The Militia should be drafted for two months, although the expedition will probably end in one, and let them be well armed and accoutred as circumstances will admit. Encourage them to bring two weeks' allowance of provisions lest there should be a deficiency.

[1] Penn. Arch., 1779–81, p. 140.

[2] It was afterwards proved that the Delawares had no hand in or knowledge of this bloody business, and it was so announced by Col. Brodhead.

[3] Pa. Arch., 1779–81, p. 246.

[4] Col. Beelor was a resident on Chartiers Creek, in what is now Peters township, Washington Co. Therefore the letter has reference to the drafting of troops from the militia in the region now Washington County.

"I have no doubt but you and all the good People of your County are convinced of the necessity there is for prosecuting some offensive operations against the Savages, and I trust that by a well-timed movement from the new settlements down the river to favour our Expedition we shall be enabled to strike a general panic amongst the hostile tribes. I am averse to putting too much to hazard, as a defeat would prove fatal to the settlements, and therefore I expect the full quota of men will be furnished, which with the blessing of Divine Providence will insure success. Indeed, I expect besides the Militia many will turn out volunteers to secure to themselves the blessings of peace.

"I have the honor to be with great respect,

"Yours,

"DANIEL BRODHEAD,

"Col. Com'd'g W. D."

In reference to the same matter the following circular letters were addressed to Cols. Joseph Beelor, lieutenant of Yohogania, John Evans, of Monongalia, Archibald Lochry, of Westmoreland, and David Shepherd, of Ohio County, Va., viz.:

"HEAD-Q'R'S, FORT PITT, May 20, 1780.

"DEAR SIR,—I find it impossible to procure a sufficient quantity of provisions to subsist the Troops which were intended to be employed on an expedition against the Indians in alliance with Great Britain; therefore you will be pleased to give immediate notice to such as are warned not to march until you receive further notice from me. In the mean time I shall endeavor to give every possible protection to the settlements and amuse the Indians by speeches. I am sorry for having given you the trouble of drafting the militia, but the disappointments with regard to the means of getting supplies are very embarrassing, and must apologize for the alteration in our measures."

Another addressed by Col. Brodhead to the county lieutenants was as follows:

"HEADQUARTERS, FORT PITT, July 31, 1780

"DEAR SIR,—I am informed by Col'nl Beeler that he has had a meeting of his Officers, and that it is the general opinion fifteen days' allowance of salt provisions cannot be furnished by the Volunteers who were expected to aid the Regular Troops in the proposed Expedition against the hostile Indians, and that fresh provisions cannot be preserved for so many days at this warm season of the year. I believe the generality of the inhabitants in these new settlements have not meat of their own at this season of the year sufficient to spare for their subsistence on the expedition. And I have the mortification to assure you that the public magazines are quite empty, and that I cannot yet see a prospect of obtaining a sufficient supply for the sustenance of the Troops already in service. Under these circumstances I find it indispensably necessary to postpone the rendezvousing the troops until our affairs wear a more favorable aspect. And as I wish, in matters of such great Publick weight and concern, to have the advice and concurrence of the principal Officers, I must request you to meet your Brother Lieutenants of the other Counties at my quarters on the 16th day of next month, in order that measures to be adopted for the annoyance of the enemy and the defense of the Frontier Settlements may be well weighed and understood; at which time, too, it will be in my power to inform you what Publick Supplies can be procured for the numbers that may be deemed necessary to employ."

These letters from the commandant at Fort Pitt show the principal cause (lack of supplies) that compelled him to postpone from time to time his proposed expedition into the Indian country, a cause which, more than any other, delayed the execution of the project until the following year. At the time in question the officers commanding the few American troops west of the Alleghenies had great difficulty in obtaining the supplies necessary for the subsistence of their men. On the 7th of December, 1780, Gen. Brodhead said in a letter of that date addressed to Richard Peters,[1] "For a long time past I have had two parties, commanded by field-officers, in the country to impress cattle, but their success has been so small that the troops have frequently been without meat for several days together, and as those commands are very expensive, I have now ordered them in." He also said that the inhabitants on the west side of the mountains could not furnish one-half enough meat to supply the troops, and that he had sent a party of hunters to the Little Kanawha River to kill buffaloes, "and to lay in the meat until I can detach a party to bring it in, which cannot be done before spring."

The two parties mentioned by Col. Brodhead as having been sent out by him, and kept for a long time in the country for the purpose of impressing cattle, were undoubtedly the commands of Capts. Samuel Brady[2] and Uriah Springer, of Westmore-

[1] In the same letter to Peters, Brodhead made allusion to the furnishing of spirits for the use of the troops, and indicated pretty plainly his preference for imported liquor over the whiskey of Monongahela, viz.: "In one of your former letters you did me the honor to inform me that his Excellency the commander-in-chief had demanded of our State seven thousand gallons of rum, and now the commissioner of Westmoreland informs me that he has verbal instructions to purchase that quantity of whiskey on this side of the mountains. I hope we shall be furnished with a few hundred gallons of liquor fit to be drank."

[2] Capt. Brady had then recently returned from an expedition to the Indian towns in the Northwest. In a letter written by Col. Brodhead, at Fort Pitt, to President Reed, in the first part of the preceding June, he said, "Capts Brady, with five men & two Delaware Indians, set out for Sandusky, with a view to bring off a british Prisoner or some Indian Scalps. One of his Indians left him and returned to this place, sick or cowardly. He has been out ten days, and in as many more I expect him back again, if he is fortunate. I beg leave to recommend Capt Brady to the notice of the Hon'ble Executive Council as an excellent officer, and I sincerely wish he may not leave the service for want of the promotion he has merited and is justly entitled to, ever since the resignation of Captain Moore."

Capt. Lieut. Brady's return from his expedition was noticed by Col. Brodhead in a letter addressed to President Reed, dated Fort Pitt, June land, the former a resident of that part which afterwards became Washington County, and the latter of that which became Fayette. Brady's party was sent up the west side of the Monongahela, and Springer's to the east side of that river and up the valley of the Redstone. The following letters, addressed by the commandant to those officers, show something of the nature of the service in which they were engaged, and the difficulties they encountered in performing it, viz.:[1]

"Head Qrs., Fort Pitt, Sept. 21, 1780.

"Sir—As Money is not yet sent to this Department to pay for the Provisions necessary to subsist the Troops, & they have already suffered; And as our endeavors to obtain a temporary supply from the Inhabitants upon the credit of the United States have not proved effectual, I am Instructed by the hon'ble Board of War prudently to avail myself of a license given by the hon'ble Executive Council of the State of Pen[a] in the words following, viz.: [words not given] in the mean time we can have no objection to the using necessary Compulsion, rather than the Troops should suffer; I sincerely lament the necessity of using this mode of supplying the Troops under my command, & wish it could be avoided, but I hope the virtuous Inhabitants will judge rightly of the measure and chearfully submit to a temporary compulsion, for to gain an everlasting Right to dispose of their property, not only by their own consent in the Legislature, but by Inclination as Individuals. And I desire you will assure them that I have just reason to expect they will be generously & speedily paid the full value of such articles of Provisions as may be taken for supplying the Troops.

"An As't Purchasing Commissary is to attend you, and previous to your making use of Compulsory means you are to make the Inhabitants acquainted with your Instructions; after which, if they are of ability to spare Cattle or sheep to the Commissary upon public Credit, agreeable to the terms mentioned in his Instructions, & shall refuse to do so, then, & not otherwise, you will proceed to take from such of them refusing as aforesaid as many Cattle & sheep as they can spare without Injury to their Families & further encrease; and all such Cattle & Sheep are to be immediately marked for the Public & drove to some Field, to be taken in a convenient part of the Settlement for Collecting & herding them until a sufficient number be collected for the present exigency. For all which you are to pass Receipts agreeable to the valuation or appraisement of the Commissary & one reputable Inhabitant, which you will cause to be made. You are to acquaint me frequently by letter of your success, inclosing returns of the Cattle and Sheep taken and procured by consent.

"You are upon no pretence to take Cattle or Sheep from the poorer sort of Inhabitants, or from such as have been great sufferers by the Enemy; but you are to take them from such as have lived more secure. The good Inhabitants are to be treated with the utmost Civility, & you shall inflict immediate punishment on Soldiers guilty of Marauding or insulting the Inhabitants who conduct themselves inoffensively towards them.

"You are to consider these Instructions as confined to those Inhabitants only who have uniformly considered themselves as Cityzens of Pen[a], as the license of the Hon'ble Executive Council cannot at present be understood to extend to such as in the unsettled state of the boundaries have acknowledged another jurisdiction.

"I wish you great success and hope you will be enabled to obtain the necessary supplies for immediate Consumption by agreement & Consent.

"I have the honor to be, &c.,

"Daniel Brodhead,

"Colo. Command'g W. D.

"Head Quarters, Pitt, Oct. 11, 1780.

"Dear Sir,—I am favored with yours of the 9th inst., and am much distressed on account of the apparent aversion of the people to afford us supplies, and the more so as I see no alternative between using force and suffering. . . . Under our present circumstances, we cannot admit a modest thought about using force as the ultimate expedient; and in case you are likely to meet with opposition, you must send notice to Captain Springer, near Little Redstone, who will doubtless detach a party to your assistance. The commander-in-chief's thanks to you are now in my pocket, and will publish them when you return. At present it will not suit to relieve you.

"I am, &c.,

"Capt. Samuel Brady."

"Head Quarters, Fort Pitt, Oct. 20, 1780.

"Dear Sir,—I have this moment received your favor of yesterday, and am sorry to find the people above Redstone [vicinity of Brownsville, Fayette County] have intentions to raise in arms against you. I believe with you that there are amongst them many Disaffected, and conceive that their past and present conduct will justify you in defending yourself by every means in your power. It may yet be doubtful

30, 1780, as follows: ". . . Captain Brady is just returned from Sandusky. He took Prisoners two young Squaws within a mile of their principal Village; one of them effected her escape after six Days' march, the other he brought to Cuskusky, where he met seven warriors who had taken a woman & Child off Chartiers Creek. He fired at the Captain and killed him, and have brought in the woman & the Indian's Scalp, but the Squaw made her escape at the same time. When Captain Brady fired at the Indians, he had only three men with him & but two rounds of powder. He was out thirty-two Days, six of which he was quite destitute of Provisions of any kind, but he has brought his party safe to this place. Capt. Lieut. Brady's zeal, perseverance, & good Conduct certainly entitles him to promotion; there has been a vacancy for him since the Death of Captain Dawson, which happened in last September, and I must beg leave to recommend him to the Hon'ble Executive Council as an officer of merit."—*Pa. whether these Fellows attempt anything against you; but if you find they are Determined, you will avoid, as much as your safety will admit, in coming to action until you give me a further account, and you may depend upon your receiving succour of Infantry and Artillery. I have signed your order for ammunition and have the honor to be, &c.

"Daniel Brodhead.

"Capt. Uriah Springer."

The tenor of these instructions to his subordinate officers clearly indicates that in the opinion of Col. Brodhead at least the sentiment of patriotism, which at the commencement of the war was almost universal among the people west of the Laurel Hill, had now become greatly diminished if not extinct with regard to a large proportion of the inhabitants of this frontier region. This belief on his part was emphasized by him in a letter written at Fort Pitt on the 7th of December following, in which he said, "I learn more and more of the disaffection of the inhabitants on this side of the mountains. The king of England's health is often drank in company." And he gave as his opinion, gathered from the observation of many of his officers, including Col. John Gibson, that "Should the enemy approach this frontier and offer protection, half the inhabitants would join them." Afterwards Gen. Irvine (who succeeded Brodhead as commandant at the fort) wrote, "I am confident that if this post was evacuated the bounds of Canada would be extended to the Laurel Hill in a few weeks."

Col. Brodhead, although he did not abandon the project of an expedition against the Indian towns west of the Ohio, found it impossible to carry it out during the year 1780, not only for lack of provisions but from the difficulty (particularly in the latter part of the year) of procuring men from the settlements willing to volunteer for the campaign. This unwillingness was, perhaps, caused by the fact that the Indians had made several incursions into the Monongahela country, which alarmed the inhabitants and made them particularly unwilling to absent themselves, leaving their homes unprotected. One of these incursions was announced by Brodhead to President Reed in a letter of September 16th, in which he said, "Intelligence is just received of Seven persons being killed and taken on Ten-Mile Creek by the Savages; but under our present circumstances I have not provisions to furnish a party for pursuit." Afterwards the Indians made another attack on the Ten-Mile settlers, but with less bloody results.

On the 17th of October, Col. Brodhead wrote the president of the Council,[1] narrating the obstacles which he had encountered in his attempts to organize and carry out the Indian campaign, as follows:

"In full confidence that a sufficient supply of Provisions would sooner or later be furnished for the Troops in this District, as well as for such number of Militia as policy or the exigencies of affairs might render it necessary to call into action, I, with view to cut off the Wyandotts, and other Indian Towns that were very troublesome to our Settlements, called for a Draught from the Militia at three different times, and was as often disappointed in obtaining Provisions, which, with the unsettled state of the boundary between Pennsylvania and Virginia, has greatly discouraged the Inhabitants, and I apprehend given a handle to the disaffected. I take the liberty to inclose copies of letters lately received from Cols. Beeler[2] and McCleery, purporting some of the above facts.

[2] The letter here referred to was from Col. Joseph Beeler, lieutenant of Yohogania County, Va., resident on Chartiers Creek, in what is now Washington County), and ran as follows:

"October 10th, 1780.

"Dear Sir,—I received yours of the 7th Inst. this morning, but it is not in my power to give you a just return, as you request, until the last of this week, for I have been obliged to issue orders to press horses and draught men, as I could not get Volunteers enough, of which I have not got a return as yet. I am sorry to inform you that I am afraid we shall come but little speed; I find that the Government of Virg[a] will not protect me in any thing I do by vertue of the laws of Virg[a] since their last Resolution & the laws of Pensl[a] have not as yet taken us under their protection; all this the Country is acquainted with, so that every thing I do is at the Risque of my Fortune, unless protected by the States. If it had not been to forward an Expedition, I should have declined acting a good while ago; as no man ever had a more disagreeable time of it than I have at present, having no law to defend me. We are assured of your good intentions for the safety of the Countrey, and are very sorry that we cannot act with that spirit that we ought to. But hope the laws of Pen[a] will either be extended in a few Days from this time, or the laws of Virg[a] be kept in force. It is very unhappy for this Countrey that the two contending States has not provided a better way for the defence of this Countrey than to let it fall between them both until matters are settled between them.

"I have the honor to be, with the greatest "Respect, Dear Sir, your most obed[t] Hble Servt,
"Joseph Beeler,
"without Law to protect me."

The letter which Col. Brodhead refers to as from William McCleery was written by that gentleman as acting in place of Col. John Evans, lieutenant of Monongalia County, Va., and a resident in what is now Greene County. After stating that he writes for Col. Evans, who was absent, McCleery continues: "I went to the Officers of the Second Battalion of our County Militia, who happened to be then assembled in General Muster, & made the matter known to them, at the same time call'd upon them for a Copy of their Returns made to Col[o] Evans, that I might as near as possible comply with your request, & they (after some consultation held on the matter) gave it me for answer, That as they found all their hopes of Relief from a Campaign being this fall carried out against their Indian Enemies abortive, and knowing that their frontiers were at 60 to 70 Mile in Length, were infested with the savages killing their People, have at last obliged them to say they can't spare any men; further adding that they are heartily sorry that there should be the least seeming Jarr or descenting Voice from the orders of Col. Brodhead as a Commanding Officer for the defence of this Countrey; but from his never having it in his power for want (as we conceive) of the necessary Supplies to put his Schemes in execution during the whole course of last Summer & Fall, & our unhappy People daily falling an easy pray to the Enemy, obliges them to throw off all dependence on any natural aid on this side of the Mountains this Fall but that of themselves for their relief, and therefore they mean to embody and take the most plausible methods for their defense, and under these circumstances they think their numbers already too small without any division. Notwithstanding they were ready twice last summer, both with Men, Horses, and Provisions, to have comply'd with your requisition fully had you put your plan

"The Troops are again without Provisions; my parties in the Country [meaning his foraging parties under Capts. Brady and Springer] are as Industrious as Circumstances will admit, but the Inhabitants disappoint them by driving their Cattle into the Mountains; and they now threaten to rise in arms against them whilst others threaten with Writs and Passes, I do not however despair of obtaining a quantity of Flour; But conceive it will be next to an impossibility to procure any considerable quantity of Beef or Pork on this side the mountains to lay up for the Winter Season, and it is but too likely that the prosecution of compulsory means will be productive of Bloodshed amongst our own citizens.

"The Delaware chiefs with upwards of thirty warriors are come to aid me upon an Expedition, but as I have neither Bread nor Meat to give them, they will discover that it is not in my power to act offensively. They appear much dejected on account of the total want of goods, which they were promised in exchange for their peltry."

Each one of the commandants at Fort Pitt from the time of the commencement of the war—Neville, Hand, McIntosh, and Brodhead—had been especially desirous of retaining for the American cause the friendship of the Delaware tribe of Indians, and had used all available means to accomplish that end. The reason for these efforts to conciliate the Delawares in particular was thus explained by Col. Brodhead:[1] "I am not ignorant," he said, in a letter to President Reed, "of the influence of the Delaware Councils over near twenty different Nations, and it is for that reason only why so much notice has been taken of them. There are villains amongst them as well as other People, but it must be confest that their Councils have been steady, and their young men serviceable." He was very desirous, and often urged upon the Supreme Executive Council, that the principal Delaware chiefs should receive commissions in the American forces, just as it was reported the higher chiefs of the Wyandots and other hostile tribes had been commissioned to grades below field-officers in the British army. He also recommended, frequently and earnestly, that liberal amounts of Indian goods, trinkets, paints, strouds, gay blankets, and watch-coats be promptly sent out to be distributed as presents among the Delawares as the surest way of retaining their friendship and alliance."[2]

Col. Brodhead was (as is made apparent by his letter of October 17th, already quoted) much encouraged by the accession of the Delaware war party, embracing nearly forty chiefs and warriors, to his forces, believing that it only needed the distribution of presents among them to insure a continuance of their friendliness to the Americans. But the desired goods were not forthcoming, and this fact had a very depressing influence on the enthusiasm of the Delaware chiefs and warriors. Still worse than this was the effect produced by a base attempt on the part of some of the officers and men of the Westmoreland County militia to murder these same Delawares, an outrage which Brodhead reported to President Reed in a letter dated Nov. 2, 1780, as follows:

"In my last I informed you that near forty of the friendly Delaware Indians had come to aid me against the Hostile Tribes. Their number has since exceeded forty, and I believe I could have called out near an hundred. But as upwards of forty men from the neighborhood of Hannah's Town have attempted to destroy them whilst they consider themselves under our Protection, it may not be an easy matter to call them out again, notwithstanding they were prevented from executing their unmanly intention by a guard of regular Soldiers posted for the Indians' protection. I was not a little surprised to find the late Captains Irwin & Jack, Lieu[t] Brownlee & Ensign Guthrey concern[d] in this base attempt. I suppose the women & children were to suffer an equal Carnage with the men." In other communications Brodhead intimated that a proclamation which had been issued by the authorities offering a reward or bounty on Indian scalps[3] and prisoners had much to do with the barbarous attempt against the lives of the friendly Delawares, though he had himself advocated the adoption of this measure of retaliation as against the hostile Indians.

Soon after the occurrences above narrated the Delawares began to give evidence of decided disaffection, a symptom that was more especially manifest when in execution. I have (as I look upon it my duty, lest any deception should take place) stated the matter truly as I took it from the Officers' Mouths. And now permit me to observe to you that the state of our frontiers is really deplorable, to see helpless Women and Children flying before the ravages of the Savage, and that even while part of us is engaged in burying of our Neighbors [referring to the then recent Indian massacre on Ten-Mile Creek] that have been butchered by them. Others of us falling a sacrifice to their Hellish inventions, those and many other matters that have come under your Cognizance, I hope you will (as a Friend to human nature) state in a proper light to the Board, from the which proper relief can be had. I have the Honor to be, with due respect,

"Dr Sir, Y[r] most Obed[t]. Hble Serv[t].

"WM. MCCLEERY."

[2] "The Indian captains appointed by the British commandant at Detroit," said Brodhead, in a letter to the Council, "are clothed in the most elegant manner, and have many valuable presents made to them. The Captains I have Commissioned by authority of Congress are naked, and receive nothing but a little whiskey, for which they are reviled by the Indians in general. So that, unless a change of System is introduced, I must expect to see all Indians in favor of Britain, in spite of every address in my power."

[3] The president of the Supreme Executive Council, in a letter to Brodhead, dated Philadelphia, April 29, 1780, says,—

"After many Consultations & much Deliberation we have concluded to offer a Reward for Scalps, & hope it will serve as an Inducement to the young Fellows of the County & others to turn out against the Indians. I herewith send you several of them. We are sensible it may be attended with Inconveniences, but it occurred to us as a Measure of Necessity & the only effectual Weapon against the Savages; we hope it is so guarded that many abuses will not happen."—Penn. Archives, 1779–81, p. 218.

they were under the influence of the liquor which was dealt out to them at the fort. "Two Delaware Indians who in their cups spoke contemptuously of our service," said Brodhead in a letter to Gen. Washington, "I have them confined in irons, but am at a loss what further to do with them until I see what number join us, and hear what their general conduct has been." His allusion to the number of Delawares who might join him had reference to an order which had been sent to their towns west of the Ohio requiring all Delawares disposed to continue friendly to remove without loss of time to the vicinity of Fort Pitt, where they could be kept under the eye of the commandant.[1] This order brought the matter to a conclusion, and, together with the other causes which have been noticed, resulted soon after in an open espousal of the British cause by the Delawares, though a few of them still continued friendly to the Americans.

On learning of the final defection of the Delawares, Col. Brodhead determined to push forward his expedition into the Indian country immediately and at all hazards. Being unable to obtain any troops by draft from the militia of Westmoreland County,[2] he called for volunteers, and the call was responded to, principally by men from the territory of the newly-erected (though not organized) county of Washington. The force amounted to a little over three hundred men, of whom about one-half were volunteers. From the place of rendezvous at Wheeling (Fort Henry) they crossed the Ohio, and marched as rapidly as possible and by the most direct route to the principal village of the hostile Delawares, which was located on the Muskingum River, on the lower part of the site of the present town of Coshocton, Ohio.

When the expedition reached a point near to Salem, which was one of the three principal villages of the peaceful Moravian Indians, some of the undiscriminating volunteers manifested the same murderous spirit which afterwards accomplished its bloody purpose in the campaign of Col. Williamson. They seemed determined to move upon the town and destroy it, but were finally prevented from doing so by the efforts of the officers, chiefly by Col. Brodhead. The commander sent forward a message to the Rev. John Heckewelder (a Moravian missionary who resided with the Indians in the town), informing him of the object of the expedition, and requesting him to send a small supply of provisions, and also to accompany the messenger on his return to the camp. The old missionary complied with the request, sent the provisions, and reported in person to Col. Brodhead at the camp. The colonel inquired of him if any of his Christian Indians were away from the village, engaged in hunting or other business in the country lying on his line of march, as in that case the troops might do them injury, not being able to distinguish between them and hostile Indians, a result which he was most anxious to prevent. Heckewelder assured him that none of his people were out, and thereupon the force was again put in motion, and the missionary returned to his village after receiving the thanks of the commander.

Brodhead's expedition reached its first objective point, the Delaware village of "Coochocking," in the evening of the 19th of April, and effected a complete surprise of the place, as the Indians had not heard of the march of any white force against them. The town was destroyed, fifteen warriors killed, about twenty prisoners taken, and all the crops planted by the Indians in the vicinity devastated. Another town, called Indaochaie, was also destroyed, its site being about two and a half miles below that of the other villages and on the east bank of the Muskingum River. After accomplishing these results the expeditionary force marched up the valley to a half-deserted village called Newcomers' Town (at or near the site of the present village of that name in Ohio), where there were a few Delawares who still remained friendly. These placed themselves under protection of Col. Brodhead, and the force then took up its line of march on the return to Fort Pitt. The official report of the campaign, made by Col. Brodhead in a communication to the president of the Council, was as follows:[3]

"PHILA., May 22d, 1781.

"SIR,—In the last letter I had the Honor to address to your Excellency I mentioned my intention

[1] "A number of Delaware Indians from Coochocking have been here since my last, and appear to be as friendly as ever. I am persuaded that a few are well affected, but they are now put to the trial by being ordered to remove hither without loss of time and remain under our protection, where their daily transactions will be seen and known."—Letter of Col. Brodhead to Gen. Washington, dated Fort Pitt, March 27, 1781; Pa. Arch., 1781–83, p. 39.

[2] The county lieutenant of Westmoreland, Col. Archibald Lochry, in a letter to Col. Brodhead, dated Twelve-Mile Run, April 2, 1781, said, "I collected the principal officers of the county together to send the answer you requested of me. I was not able to attend their meeting, but requested Col. Cook to send an express to you, with what encouragement you might depend on, which I hope you have received by this time. I am just returned from burying a man killed and scalped by the Indians at Col. Pomeroy's house; one other man is missing and all Pomeroy's effects carried off. I have been attempting to get some Militia to cover our Frontier until some other succour arrives, which I hope will be soon. I am afraid from the Disposition of the people you have little to expect from us. If the Cumberland Militia arrive in time for our intended Expedition they shall go with you, and your humble servant to Boot."

On the same date James Perry, sub-lieutenant of Westmoreland, wrote to Brodhead, saying, "We sent instructions to the Second and Third Battalions of Westmoreland Militia, agreeable to your orders, to raise volunteers for the Expedition. The Major of the Third Battalion came to me on Saturday last and informed me that he could not raise one volunteer for the Expedition. The Second has made no return yet, but I am doubtful they have done nothing.

"I have not yet heard what Col. Lochry has done in the First Battalion; but, upon the whole, I believe you need not depend on any men from this county, as the people in the interior part of the county live in a state of indifferent security, and the frontiers dare not well leave their families."—Pa. Arch., 1781, pp. 51–52.

The failure of Brodhead to obtain any troops from the militia of Westmoreland County appears to have been the result of ill feeling (amounting to a quarrel) between him and County Lieutenant Lochry, as is evident from an examination of the correspondence between them, and between each and the president of the Council, in 1780–81.

to carry an expedition against the revolted Delaware Towns. I have now the pleasure to inform you that with about three hundred men (nearly half the number Volunteers from the country) I surprised the Towns of Cooshasking and Indaochaie, killed fifteen Warriors, and took upwards of twenty old men, women, and children. About four miles above the Town I detached a party to cross the river Muskingum and destroy a party of about forty warriors who had just before (as I learnt by an Indian whom the advanced Guard took prisoner) crossed over with some prisoners and Scalps and were drunk, but excessive hard rains having swell'd the river bank high it was found impracticable. After destroying the Towns with great quantities of poultry and other stores, and killing about forty head of Cattle, I marched up the River about seven miles with a view to send for some craft from the Moravian Towns and cross the river to pursue the Indians. But when I proposed my plan to the Volunteers I found they conceived they had done enough, and were determined to return, wherefore I marched to Newcomers' Town, where a few Indians who remained in our Interest had withdrawn themselves not exceeding thirty men. The Troops experienced great kindness from the Moravian Indians and those at Newcomers' Town, and obtained a sufficient supply of meat and Corn to subsist the men and Horses to the Ohio River. Captain Killbuck and Captain Luzerne, upon hearing of our Troops being on the Muskingum, immediately pursued the Warriors, killed one of the greatest Villains and brought his scalp to me. The plunder brought in by the Troops sold for about eighty Thousand pounds[1] at Fort Henry. I had upon this Expedition Captains Mantour [Montour] and Wilson and three other faithful Indians, who contributed greatly to the success. The troops behaved with great Spirit, and although there was considerable firing between them and the Indians, I had not a man killed or wounded, and only one horse shot." [2]

While Brodhead's campaign against the Delaware towns on the Muskingum was in progress, another and a more formidable expedition was being raised and organized, having for its object the capture of the British post of Detroit and the destruction of the Wyandot towns on the Sandusky River. The expedition was to be composed of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, and to be led by Gen. George Rogers Clarke, who had achieved considerable renown by his successful campaign against the British posts in the Illinois country in 1778, as has been mentioned. The expedition which he was now to command against Detroit was to be organized principally at Fort Pitt, to rendezvous at Fort Henry (Wheeling), and to proceed thence down the Ohio River to the Great Falls (at Louisville, Ky.), and from there to march northwardly through the wilderness to its objective-points.

The project seems to have been originated by the government of Virginia, although it afterwards received the sanction of Gen. Washington for the United States, and was also promoted by the Executive Council of Pennsylvania. As early as Jan. 22, 1781, Col. Brodhead, in a letter written at Fort Pitt and addressed to President Reed, of the Pennsylvania Council,[3] said, "I sincerely wish there was no occasion to trouble you with a further tale of misfortune. But as the United States in general, and our State in particular, are immediately interested in retaining in this District all the Grain that has been raised in it, it might appear criminal in me were I to remain silent respecting certain Instructions lately sent by Governor Jefferson (of Virginia) for the purchase of 200,000 Rations on this side the mountains, for the use of the Troops under Col. Clark; for which purpose he has already advanced 300,000 pounds, and promises to furnish, upon the first notice, any further Sum that may be necessary to compleat the payment of that purchase. Because this contract, together with the Consumption of multitudes of emigrants arrived and expected in this District (chiefly to avoid militia Duty and Taxes), will scarcely leave a pound of flour for the Regular or other Troops which it may be necessary to employ, either offensively or defensively, against the Enemy for the Defence of this part of the Frontier Settlements.

"It seems the State of Virginia is now preparing to acquire more extensive territory by sending a great body of men under Col. (whom they intend to raise to the rank of Brigadier) Clark to attempt the reduction of Detroit. I have hitherto been encouraged to flatter myself that I should sooner or

[1] Of course Col. Brodhead here has reference to Continental money, which at that time was nearly at its lowest point of depreciation.

[2] Withers, in his "Chronicles of Border Warfare," pp. 220–21, relates as follows in reference to the alleged slaughter of prisoners by Brodhead's men after the destruction of the town. In his narrative (which by comparison with Col. Brodhead's report seems to be purely a fabrication) he says, "It remained then to dispose of the prisoners. Sixteen warriors particularly obnoxious for their diabolical deeds were pointed out by Pekillon [a friendly Delaware chief who accompanied Col. Brodhead] as fit subjects of retributive justice and taken into close custody. A council of war was then held to determine their fate, and which doomed them to death. They were taken some distance from town, dispatched with tomahawks and spears and then scalped. The other captives were committed to the care of the militia to be conducted to Fort Pitt.

"On the morning after the taking of Coshocton, an Indian making his appearance on the opposite bank of the river called out for the 'Big Captain.' Col. Brodhead demanded what he wished. 'I want peace,' replied the savage. 'Then send over some of your chiefs,' said the colonel. 'May be you kill,' responded the Indian. 'No,' said Brodhead; 'they shall not be killed.' One of the chiefs, a fine-looking fellow, then came over, and while he and Col. Brodhead were engaged in conversation a militiaman came up, and with a tomahawk which he had concealed in the bosom of his hunting-shirt struck him a severe blow on the hinder part of his head. The poor Indian fell and immediately expired.

"This savage deed was the precursor of other and equally atrocious enormities. The army on its return had not proceeded more than half a mile from Coshocton when the militia guarding the prisoners commenced murdering them. In a short space of time a few women and children alone remained alive. These were taken to Fort Pitt, and after awhile exchanged for an equal number of white captives."

later be enabled to reduce that place. But it seems the United States cannot furnish either Troops or resources for the purpose, but the State of Virginia can."

In February following, Gen. Washington issued orders to Gen. Clarke to proceed in the raising and organizing of his force for the purpose mentioned; and on the 25th of that month Gen. Brodhead reported to President Reed:[1] "I have just received instructions from his Excellency the commander-in-chief directing me to detach all the field-pieces, Howitzers, and train, also a part of my small force, under Col. Clark, who I am told is to drive all before him by a supposed unbounded influence he has amongst the inhabitants of the Western country. I sincerely wish his Excellency's expectations may be fully answered...." Again, on the 10th of March, he wrote the president of the Council:[2] "I have likewise received instructions from his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief to order the Maryland Corps to Richmond in Virginia, and to detach with the artillery and field-pieces under Brig.-Gen. Clark a major or Capt's Command from my small remaining number of Troops. . . . Gen^{l}. Clark is come over the mountain, and his commissaries are purchasing great quantities of flour and Indian corn; but he appears to be doubtful of carrying his grand object, and I shall not be surprised to see his Expedition fall through, for it is clear to me that wise men at a great distance view things in the Western country very differently from those who are more immediately acquainted with circumstances and situations."

Although Clarke was a Virginian officer and had entirely favored the claims of that State in its territorial controversy with Pennsylvania, he was not averse to enlisting men from the latter State to make up the force necessary for his expedition, and accordingly he at once entered into correspondence with the Executive Council to obtain its consent to the project. The letter which he addressed to President Reed[3] on the subject was as follows:

"D. Sir,—Though unacquainted, I take the liberty of writing to your Excellency on a subject I hope will Consern you so much as to Honour my proposition. I make no doubt but that you are fully acquainted with the design of the enterprise. I am order'd to Com^{d} of the greatest consequence to the Frontiers of Pennsylvania and Virginia, if our Resources should not be such as to Inable us to Remain in the Indian Country during the fair season, I am in hopes they will be sufficient to Visit the Shawanees, Delawares, and Sandusky Town, defeating the Enemy and laying those Cuntrees waste, would give great Ease to the Frontiers of both States, whom I think equally Interested. But Sir nothing great can be expected without the assistance of numbers of men from the Country on this side of the Lawrell Hill, many living within the boundary of Pennsylvania are willing to go on the Expedition, many more would go if it was not for a timid, simple disposition, fearing it would disoblige y^{r} Excellency & Council, at least they make use of such arguments as an Excuse, others alternately shifting from one state to the other, to screen themselves from any Military Duty that might be Required of them, but as I am Confident from the nature of the intended Expedition you would wish to give it every aid in your power, I hope sir that you will inform the Inhabitants on this side of the M^{t} that such is your sentiments. They are fully able to spare five hun^{d} men, I don't think they could be better imployed to the advantage of themselves or Country, I should have solicited y^{e} governor of Virg^{a} to have made this Request of you, but the want of time for it to go through that Channel, and Confident of its meeting with your approbation Induced me to do it myself. I hope S^{r} that you will Honour me with an immediate answer P^{r} Express, as it is of the greatest Consequence to us & that the fate of the Indians at present appears to depend on the Resolutions you may take.

"With esteem I beg leave to subscribe myself,
Y^{r} very Ob. Serv^{t},
"G. Clark, Brig. G."

To this communication of Gen. Clarke President Reed replied under date of May 15th as follows:[4]

"Sir,—I received your Letter of the 23d March a considerable Time after its Date. The Enterprise you refer to has never been officially communicated to us, but from common Report we learn that an Expedition under your Command is destined ag^{t} Detroit. We are very sensible of its Importance to this State as well as Virginia, & there is no Gentleman in whose Abilities & good Conduct we have more Confidence on such an occasion. After this it seems unnecessary to add that it will give us great Satisfaction if the Inhabitants of this State cheerfully concur in it; & we authorize you to declare that so far from giving Offence to their Government, we shall consider their Service with you as highly meritorious. At the same Time we must add that from the exhausted State of our Treasury—from the great Demands made upon us by the Congress & Gen. Washington and other Contingencies, we are in no condition to answer any Demands of a pecuniary kind, and therefore do not mean, by any Thing we have said, to raise an Expectation which we cannot answer. We have above two Months ago wrote to Col. Brodhead, most earnestly requesting him to forward your Views, informing him that they are highly approved by us—we shall be most concerned if we should be disappointed in this respect. We have had a correspondence with Gov^{r} Jefferson on the Subject & explained our Sentiments to him very fully. We have also sent forward by our member from Westmoreland, Encouragement to the People there to co-operate with you in all Respects, & hope it will be attended with good effect. Wishing you Success equal to your Merit and good Intentions I remain," etc.

The member of the Council from Westmoreland referred to in the above communication was Christopher Hays, and it was understood to have been largely through his influence that the Council decided favorably to Clarke's views. Under the authority conferred by the President's communication, Gen. Clarke, on the 3d of June, addressed the "Council of Officers" of Westmoreland to secure their concurrence and assistance. The result was that the matter was laid before the people of that county at a public meeting held for that purpose on the 18th of June, at which meeting it was:

"1st. Resolved, That a Campaign be carried on with Genl Clark.

"2d. Resolved, That Genl Clark be furnished with 300 men out of Pomroy's, Beard's, and Davises Battalion.

"3dly. Resolved, That Coll. Archd Lochry gives orders to sd Colls. to raise their quota by Volunteers or Draught.

"4thly. Resolved, That £6 be advanced to every volunteer that marches under the command of Genl Clark on the propos^d Campaign.

"5th. And for the further Incouragement of Voluntiers, that grain be raised by subscription by the Different Companies.

"6thly. That Coll. Lochry concil with the Officers of Virginia respecting the manner of Draughting those that associate in that State and others.

"7th. Resolved, That Coll. Lochry meet Genl Clark and other officers and Coll. Crawford on the 23d Inst., to confer with them the day of Rendezvouse.

"Sign^d by ord^r of Committee,
"JOHN PROCTOR, Prest."

It was not Clarke's purpose or desire to recognize the Pennsylvania county of Washington (which had then recently been erected but not organized) or its officers, so he applied to the officers in command of the militia of the so-called Virginia counties of Yohogania, Monongalia, and Ohio to aid him in securing men for the expedition. The result in Yohogania was a meeting of the officers[1] of that county, June 5th, at the old court-house, near Andrew Heath's, on the west side of the Monongahela, above and in sight of the present town of Elizabeth, at which meeting a draft of one-fifth of the militia of said county (which, according to the Virginia claim, included the north half of Washington County, Pa., and all of Westmoreland as far south as the centre of the present county of Fayette) was made for the expedition. The people, however, believing that the territory claimed by Virginia as Yohogania County was really in the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania, denied the authority of the Virginia officers, and refused to submit to the draft until the question of jurisdiction was definitely settled. But the public notice given by Christopher Hays to the people of Westmoreland and Washington that he held in his hands money from the Executive Council to be expended for the protection of the frontier had the effect to quiet to a great extent, though not entirely to allay, the dissatisfaction, and the work of raising men in the two Pennsylvania counties (or, as Gen. Clarke expressed it, in Yohogania, Monongalia, and Ohio Counties, Va.) was allowed to proceed, though not without strong and bitter protest.

The main part of the force destined for Gen. Clarke's expedition (that is to say, nearly all except about one hundred and fifty men furnished by Westmoreland, under Col. Lochry and Capt. Benjamin Whaley, as will be mentioned hereafter) was raised in Washington County, but it appears evident from certain correspondence of that time that this was accomplished, not by the action of the Washington County military authorities, but by the officers of the so-called Virginia counties which covered the territory of Washington. That there was a bitter quarrel at that time between James Marshel, lieutenant of the newly-erected (but unorganized) county of Washington, and Dorsey Pentecost (successor of Col. Joseph Beeler in the office of county lieutenant of Yohogania, Va.) is evident from the recriminating letters written by both these gentlemen to the president of the Supreme Executive Council. Pentecost declared (and no denial of the assertion is found in Marshel's correspondence) that it was chiefly through his energy and efforts that Gen. Clarke's main force was raised. And that the force was raised by some means, and placed in camp in a short space of time after the meeting of officers at the Yohogania court-house and subsequent refusal of the people to submit to the draft there ordered, is made apparent in a letter written by Col. Pentecost to President Reed, dated "Washington County, July 27, 1781."[2] In that letter he says,—

"While Mr. Marshel was at Philadelphia, Gen'l Clark came here with an Intent to carry an Expedition against the Savages, which was principally intended to have been aided by Volunteers from this County. He consulted myself with many others on the most probable Plan for Success. Every Effort was tried, but to no effect; the Frontiers were murdered every Day & the Militia could not be got out. The Field Officers for Yohogania County called on me & requested that I would take the Command of the same, & endeavor to save it from utter Destruction. I accordingly swore into a Commission for that Purpose which had been in the County upwards of a Year, & which I had neglected to qualify to, on ac-

[1] This meeting and its proceedings were mentioned in a letter from James Marshel (county lieutenant of Washington) to President Reed, as follows:

"WASHINGTON COUNTY, June 27, 1781.

"Sr,—Since I had the honour of Addressing your Excellency last, the old Enemies of this government and their adherents have exerted themselves to the Utmost to prevent this County being organized. On the 5th Inst. a Council of the Militia officers of Yohagena County was held at their Court-house, and in Consequence of sd Council, the fifth part of the Militia of sd County was drafted for General Clark's Expedition, but the people did not Conceive they were Under the Jurisdiction of Virginia, therefore they denied their Authority, and almost Universally Refused doing duty under any government whatever untill the line between the States is actually run."—Pa. Arch., 1781–83, p. 233.

count of the apparent Probability there was for a Change of Government. Soon after this, Gen'l Clark had a meeting of the Principal People to consult on the most Plausible Plan to raise the Militia for his Expedition. They, after long Deliberation, Resolved that nothing could effect so desirable a Plan save my Exertions as County Lieu[t] of Yohogania, and in the most pointed Terms (in an address to me) requested that I would put my Command in Force, and use every Exertion to facilitate the Expedition. The Day following, I was furnished with a Demand from Gen'l Clark for the Quota of the County. I went into the Business with Resolution, conducted myself with a steady Firmness, and with a great Deal of Fatigue, Trouble, & Perplexity, have accomplished that Business, and the Militia are now encampt." In another part of the same communication he says, "I am now in General Clarke's Camp, about three miles below Fort Pitt, and am about to leave this Country on the Expedition under that Gentleman's Command." And he further says, with regard to the course which had been pursued by Col. Marshel with reference to the raising of men for Clarke's expedition: "And he accordingly did all he could to perplex the People, and advised them to pay no obedience to Draughts that I had ordered for Gen'l Clark's assistance, & has actually offered Protection to some of 'em, though he before, on a Request of Gen'l Clark's, declared he could do nothing as an officer, wish'd well to the Expedition, & as a Private Person would give every assistance to promote it."

There is no doubt that in the enforcement of the draft ordered from the militia by the lieutenants of Yohogania and Monongalia Counties Gen. Clarke pursued the business with great vigor, and showed very little leniency toward those (and they were many) who were inclined to deny the jurisdiction of Virginia.[1] Many bitter complaints were made against him for his stern methods of enforcing the draft, among which complaints in that particular are the charges made against him (as also against Dorsey Pentecost) in the following letter, addressed by Col. James Marshel to the president of the Council,[2] viz.:

"Washington County, 8th August, 1781.

"S[r],—When I began to organize the Militia of this County, I expected the line between the States would have been run (at least by the Commissioners of this State) in May last; but Finding they did not arrive at neither of the periods given us to expect them, I thought it my duty to take the most favourable Opportunity that would Offer to form the Militia. About the fifteenth of June last, I apprehended Appearances favourable and accordingly advertised two Battalion Elections, but soon found that General Clark's preparations for his Expedition and the Extraordinary Freedom with which he and his party of the old Virginia Officers used with the people of this County stood greatly in the way; they were Indefatigable in propagating reports of the General being a Continental Officer, having extraordinary Countenance and Authority from the State of Pennsylvania, in pulling down my Advertisements, dissuading the people from attending the Elections, crying out that I was everything that was bad, and was doing all this to hurt the Expedition, &c.; all which, however false, produced a Visible Indisposition in the people towards attending the Elections; and altho' I was not attempting anything with design to Injure his Expedition, I could not do anything to fill up the General's troops out of the Militia of this frontier County, not having Council's orders for that purpose. . . . I can only say at present I have acted such a part as I thought a faithful Officer ought to do in similar cases; and that I Ever Conceived I had no right so much as to say any of the people of this County had a right to go with general Clark without your Excellency's Orders for that purpose; much less that I should ly still on purpose that the Virginia Officers should draft the Militia of this County for that service. If any complaint of what kind soever should be lodged against me, I hope your Excellency will favour me with a Coppy thereof, that I may have an Opportunity of doing myself Justice; and as the Manner in which the Genl and his Underlings have treated the people of this and Westmoreland Counties has been so arbitrary and unprecedented, I think it my duty to inform your Excellency the particulars of a few facts. The first instance was with one John Harden, in Westmoreland, who, with a number of others, refused to be drafted under the government of Virginia, alleging they were undoubtedly in Pennsylvania, and declared if that government ordered a draft they would obey cheerfully, and accordingly elected their officers and made returns thereof to Col. Cook. After this the general, with a party of forty or fifty horsemen, came to Harden's in quest of him to hang him, as the general himself declared; but not finding the old gentleman took and tied his son, broke open his mill, fed away and destroyed upwards of one hundred and fifty bushels of wheat, rye, and corn, killed his sheep and hogs, and lived away at Mr. Harden's expense in that manner for two or three days; declared his estate forfeited, but graciously gave it to his wife; formed an article in which he bound all the inhabitants he could lay hands on or by any means prevail upon to come in to him; under the penalty of ten months in the regular army, not to oppose the draft. Another man in Westmoreland, being in Company with Clark's troops, happened to say the draft was Illegal, upon which he was Immediately Confined, and Ordered to be hanged by the General. Col. Penticost, being willing to assist the General, Issued Orders to the Commanding officers of the old Militia Companys, to Raise an armed force and Collect the Delinq[ts]; and altho these orders were Chiefly disobeyed, yet there has been several armed Banditties in this County under command of a certain Col. Cox and others, who have acted nearly in the same manner as the general himself has done.

[1] Many of those people who had been willing and anxious for the establishment of Virginia's claim, so that they might purchase their lands from her at one-tenth part of the price demanded by the Pennsylvania Land-Office, were now quite as ready to deny her right to demand military service from them.

"They being in Quest of John Douglas (a Gent. Elected one of our Justices for this County) and not finding him the first attempt, broke open his house in the night time, Fed away and destroyed such a part of Rye and Corn (his property) as they thought proper; Drew their swords upon his wife and Children in order to make them Discover where he was; the s[d] Cox and his party have taken and confined a Considerable number of the Inhabitants of this County, amongst which were Hugh Scott (one of the acting trustees of the County), altho' he was not drafted; in a word the Instances of high treason against the State are too many to be Enumerated, therefore shall not trouble your Excellency any more on the subject at present."

President Reed, in his reply[1] (dated Aug. 25, 1781) to Col. Marshel's letter, said, " . . . As General Clark's proceedings have been the Occasion of so much Dissatisfaction in the Country, & it is given out that he has extraordinary Countenance from us, we think it necessary to state our Sentiments & the Facts respecting his Command. We were informed early last Spring that a Plan of an Expedition under Gen. Clark against the Western Indians was approved by Gen. Washington. Our Opinion of the Gentleman, from his former Successes and acknowledged Abilities, as well as our Belief that his Expedition would be beneficial to our Frontier, led us to give it our Countenance so far as to write to the Gentlemen of Westmoreland County, with a View that it should be communicated to you, that it was our Wish that Gen. Clark might be assisted so far as to encourage Volunteers to go with him & to supply him with Provisions, if he should have Occasion to apply for them, he paying their Value. We also wrote to Gen. Clark himself, a Copy whereof is inclosed, by which you will see the Extent of the Countenance & Support he has derived from us. But while we utterly disprove the irregularities and hardships which have been exercised by him [Gen. Clarke] towards the inhabitants, we cannot help fearing that too many, in consequence of the unsettled state of boundaries, avail themselves of a pretense to withhold their services from the publick at a time when they are most wanted, and when an exertion would not only serve the country, but promote their own security. We cannot help also observing that, by letters received from the principal gentlemen in Westmoreland, it seems evident they approve of Gen. Clark's expedition, and that the lieutenants of both States united in the plan of raising three hundred men for that service. As the state of publick affairs had not admitted your forming the militia sufficiently to concur in these measures, we concluded that these resolutions would also include your county, and even now are at a loss to account for the different opinions entertained on the point by the people of Westmoreland and Washington Counties."

In a letter by Christopher Hays, of Westmoreland, and Thomas Scott, of Washington County, to President Reed, dated "Westmoreland, August 15, 1781," they said, " . . . The truth of the matter is, the General's Expedition has been wished well, and volunteers to the service have been Incouraged by all with whom we corispond; but we have heartily reprobated the General's Standing over these two counties with armed force, in order to dragoon the Inhabitants into obedience to a draft under the laws of Virginia, or rather under the arbitrary orders of the officers of that Government, without any orders from Virginia for that purpose, and this is really the part the General hath acted, or rather the use which has been made of him in this country."

"With respect to Gen. Clarke's Proceedings," said President Reed, in his reply to the above, "we can only say that he has no authority from us to draft Militia, much less to exercise those acts of Distress which you have hinted at, and which other letters more particularly enumerate. His Expedition appears to us favorable for the Frontiers, as carrying Hostilities into the Indian Country, rather than resting totally on the defensive. We find the Gentlemen of Westmoreland, however different in other Things, to have agreed in Opinion that his Expedition deserved encouragement. . . ."

Gen. Clarke on his part accused several officials of Washington and Westmoreland Counties of using every means in their power, fair and unfair, to prevent the raising of men for the expedition and ruin its chances of success. In a communication dated at Wheeling, August 4th,[2] and addressed to the president of the Council, he said, "I thank you for the favorable sentiments and the Requisition to this country to give all possible aid to the Enterprise I am ordered on. Had they have done so, as their Interest loudly call'd for, I believe there would have been no Reason to doubt but our most Sanguine Expectations would have been answered. But so far from compleating your wishes, that part of them have taken every step in their power to frustrate the design (at a time when their neighbours were daily massacred) by confusing the Inhabitants and every other device their abilities would admit of, though small, are too apt to effect the minds of such persons as Inhabit this frontier. What put it more in their power was the unsettled Territory, and no orders of yours appearing you mention you had sent by one of your members (meaning Christopher Hays, of Westmoreland) with Encouragement for the people to co-operate with me in all respects. But he appears to have taken every step to disappoint the good Intentions of Col. Lochry[1] and many other Gentlemen of Westmoreland County who have used every Effort to Raise men. But disappointed by those alluded to, I have Endeavored to make myself acquainted with the different persons who appeared to be busy in Ruining the sentiments of the Inhabitants and think it my duty as a citizen and officer to acquaint you with the principals, Believing that you are Imposed on as those bodies gain their Influence by opposing Every measure proposed for the publick good in the Military Department, strange that such Conduct should have those Effects among any class of People in This Dep^{t}. Every commanding officer has Experienced, and I think I can Venture to say you never will be able to have anything of Importance done in this Quarter until many of them are removed from their respective offices. The Inhabitants on my arrival was so Buoyed up at the thought of my carrying out an Expedition that promised them peace that it has Required all their little artifices to disappoint, which is too likely to be the case at present. Mr. M. [Col. Marshel], of Washington County, Lt.-Colos. C and D, I believe to be the perpetrators of these Evils. I fear this country will feel, after giving you my honor that I am not influenced by prejudice to point out those Gentlemen. I can assure you they are persons that will for Ever disgrace this part of the country while in power. As for Mr. M., he has, I learn, lived in Obscurity until lately; his promotion has so confused him that his Conduct is Contradictory in his own publick writing, and as wavering as the minds of that class of mortals he has had the Honour to Influence . . . I learn that it is generally believed that the Inhabitants of the western country are disaffected. I do not think it to be the case, and was the line between the two states Established, and the whole well officered, they might in a short time be made Valuable Citizens, and any necessary force call'd to the field on the shortest notice. But at present scarcely a week passes but you hear of some massacre. Sufficient stores of necessaries provided to Enable them to Reduce the Indians, and yet those Inducements are not sufficient to draw them to action, owing to those principles before Recited."

The troops of Gen. Clarke's expedition, embracing infantry, mounted men, and several pieces of light artillery (but not including the Westmoreland County men under Col. Lochry, who were not ready to move with the main force), were gathered in camp on the Ohio River, most of them at Fort Henry (Wheeling), but a part encamped about three miles below Fort Pitt, where they lay on the 27th of July, as is shown by the letter of Col. Dorsey Pentecost of that date, before quoted. From that point they moved down the river and joined the main body at the rendezvous at Fort Henry, where they were in camp on the 4th of August. It was the purpose of the commander to remain at that point until the arrival of the Westmoreland detachment, but this was found to be impracticable on account of the desertion of his men. Accordingly he broke camp at Fort Henry and proceeded down the river about the 10th of August.

At the mouth of the Kanawha River the forces were landed, with the intention, on the part of Gen. Clarke, to wait there for the arrival of the rear detachment. But here, although so far away from their homes, the men evinced even more determination to desert than they had at Fort Henry, having begun to realize more fully than before the dangerous nature of the service in which they were engaged. Thereupon Gen. Clarke, finding that if he should remain there any considerable time he would find himself without a following, ordered an immediate reembarkation of the troops, and went on down the river, but even while on the passage the desertions continued, though they were of course less numerous than from the encampments.

The passage from Fort Henry to the point of destination consumed about three weeks. The banks of the river down which the expedition passed were occupied at various points by hostile Indians, but these dared not offer any attack on the forces because of the cannon which Clarke had with him, artillery being always greatly dreaded by savages of all tribes. After a journey which was especially tedious on account of the low water in the river, the troops reached their destination at the Falls of the Ohio about the end of the month of August. There they waited for reinforcements from Kentucky, which never came, and for the arrival of the detachment under Col Lochry, but the waiting was in vain (for reasons hereafter given), and the commander, having now no hope of reinforcement, and finding his force so much weakened by desertion that it would be madness for him to march with it in any expectation of being able to reduce the post of Detroit, or even of the Indian towns on the Sandusky, he reluctantly abandoned the enterprise. This disastrous ending of the expedition was the result of the desertion of the men, not only by reducing the strength of the main force, but by compelling the commander to move on from Fort Henry, and again from the mouth of the Kanawha, without waiting, as he wished and intended to do, for the arrival of the detachment under Col. Lochry, thereby leaving that brave officer and his command to proceed on their way alone and unsupported to meet the terrible fate which overtook them, and which is now to be narrated.

The force raised in Westmoreland County (including men from Washington County) for Clarke's expedition, about one hundred and ten strong, as before mentioned, and under the command of Col. Archibald Lochry, proceeded to the rendezvous at Fort Henry, where the commanding officer expected to join the main body under Gen. Clarke. But on arriving there he found that the general had gone down the river the day before, leaving a Maj. Craycroft with a few men and a boat for the transportation of the horses, but without either provisions or ammunition, of which they had but a very insufficient supply. Clarke had, however, promised to await their arrival at the mouth of the Kanawha; but on reaching that point they found that he had been obliged, in order to prevent desertion (which his men were more than ever determined on), to proceed down the river, leaving only a letter affixed to a pole directing them to follow. Their provisions and forage were nearly exhausted; there was no source of supply but the stores conveyed by Clarke; the river was very low, and as they were unacquainted with the channel, they could not hope to overtake the main body. Under these embarrassing circumstances Col. Lochry dispatched Capt. Shearer with four men in a small boat, with the hope of overtaking Gen. Clarke and of securing supplies, leaving his (Shearer's) company under command of Lieut. Isaac Anderson. Before Shearer's party had proceeded far they were taken prisoners by Indians, who also took from them a letter to Gen. Clarke, informing him of the condition of Lochry's party.

About the same time Lochry captured a party of nineteen deserters from Clarke's force. These he afterwards released, and they immediately joined the Indians. The savages had before been apprised of the expedition, but they had supposed that the forces of Clarke and Lochry were together, and as they knew that Clarke had artillery, they had not attempted an attack. But now, by the capture of Shearer's party, with the letters, and by the intelligence brought to them by the deserters, they for the first time learned of the weakness and exposed situation of Lochry's command, and they at once determined on its destruction.

Collecting in force some miles below the mouth of the Great Miami River, they placed their prisoners (Shearer's party) in a conspicuous position on the north shore of the Ohio, near the head of Lochry's Island, with the promise to them that their lives should be spared if they would hail Lochry's men as they came down and induce them to land. But in the mean time, Col. Lochry, wearied by the slow progress made, and in despair of overtaking Clarke, landed on the 24th of August, at about ten o'clock in the morning, on the same shore, at an inlet which has since borne the name of Lochry's Creek,[1] a short distance above the place where the Indians were awaiting them. At this point the horses were taken on shore and turned loose to feed. One of the men had killed a buffalo, and all, except a few set to guard the horses, were engaged around the fires which they had kindled in preparing a meal from it. Suddenly a volley blazed forth on them from a wooded bluff, and simultaneously a large force of Indians appeared and rushed to attack them. The men, thus surprised, seized their arms and bravely defended themselves as long as their ammunition lasted. Then they attempted to escape by their boats, but these were unwieldy, the water was very low, and the party, too much weakened to avail themselves of this method of escape, and being wholly unable to make further resistance, surrendered to the savages, who at once proceeded to the work of massacre. They killed Col. Lochry and several others of the prisoners, but were restrained from further butchery by the timely arrival of their chief,[2] who declared that he disapproved of their conduct, but said he was unable wholly to control his men, who were eager to revenge the acts of Col. Brodhead against the Indians on the Muskingum a few months before.

The party which Col. Lochry surrendered to the Indians consisted of but sixty-four men, forty-two having been killed. The Indians engaged numbered over three hundred of various tribes, but principally those of the Six Nations. They divided the plunder among them in proportion to the numbers of each tribe engaged.

On the next day the prisoners were marched to the Delaware towns, where they were met by a party of British and Indians, who said they were on their way to the Falls of the Ohio to attack Gen. Clarke. The prisoners were separated and taken to different places of captivity at the Indian towns, and there they remained (excepting a few who escaped) until the close of the Revolutionary struggle. After the preliminary articles of peace had been signed (Nov. 30, 1782) they were ransomed by the British officers in command of the Northern posts and were sent to Canada, to be exchanged for British prisoners in the hands of the Americans.[3] In the [2] It has been stated that the chief in command of this Indian party was the famous Capt. Brant, and that he afterwards professed much regret for the massacre of Lochry and his men.

[3] The following memorial of escaped prisoners belonging to Col. Lochry's command was presented to the Supreme Executive Council, addressed to President Moore, and indorsed July 3, 1782, viz.:

"Sir,—We, the subscribers, inhabitants of the County of Westmoreland, beg leave to represent to your Excellency and Council that we had the misfortune to be made prisoners of by the Indians on the 24th of August last and carried to Montreal, and there kept in close confinement till the 26th of May last, when we were so fortunate as to make our escape, and after a long and fatigueing march through the Wilderness we got to this city yesterday at three o'Clock. As we are at present destitute of both Money and Cloathes, without which we cannot go home, We pray your Exc'y and Council to take our case into Consideration, and order us our pay from the time we were made prisoners to this. We were under the command of Colo. Loughery when taken, and have a list of all those, both officers and privates, who are now prisoners spring of 1783 they sailed from Quebec to New York, and from there returned home by way of Philadelphia, having been absent twenty-two months. But more than one-half of those who went down the Ohio with Col. Lochry never again saw their homes.

Upon the abandonment of the expedition by Gen. Clarke at the Falls of the Ohio, the men composing the force made their way as best they could through the wilderness to their homes, encountering many perils and hardships, and being more than two months on the weary homeward journey. The arrival of a part of them, as also the terrible disaster to Col. Lochry's command, was announced by Gen. Irvine (who had in the mean time succeeded Col. Brodhead in the command of the Western Department) in a letter to Gen. Washington, dated Fort Pitt, Dec. 2, 1781, as follows:

"... Capt. Craig, with the detachment of artillery, returned here on the 26th inst. [ult?] ... A Col. Lochry, of Westmoreland County, Pa., with about one hundred men in all, composed of volunteers and a company raised by Pennsylvania for the defense of that county, started to join Gen. Clarke, who, it is said, ordered him to unite with him (Clarke) at the mouth of the Miami, up which river it was previously designed to proceed; but the general, having changed his plan, left a small party at the Miami, with directions to Lochry to follow him to the mouth of the Falls. Sundry accounts agree that this party, and all of Lochry's troops to a man, were waylaid by the Indians and British (for it is said they had artillery), and all killed or taken, not a man escaping, either to join Gen. Clarke or to return home. When Capt. Craig left the general he would not be persuaded but that Lochry with his party had returned home. These misfortunes throw the people of this county into the greatest consternation, and almost despair, particularly Westmoreland County, Lochry's party being all the best men of their frontier. At the present they talk of flying early in the spring to the eastern side of the mountains, and are daily flocking to me to inquire what support they may expect."

While Gen. Clarke's expedition was in progress, and long before the intelligence had been received of its disastrous termination, another expedition was projected, its object being identical with a part of Clarke's plan, viz., the capture and destruction of the Indian towns on the Sandusky River. The enterprise was conceived and fostered by Cols. Brodhead and Gibson at Fort Pitt, and by Hays, Marshel, and other officials of the Pennsylvania counties on both sides of the Monongahela. Undoubtedly military jealousy had much to do with the advocacy of the plan by Col. Brodhead and other officers at Fort Pitt, but they, as well as Marshel, Hays, and other Pennsylvania officials, also believed, or affected to believe, that Clarke's campaign was prosecuted wholly in the interest of Virginia, and with the ulterior object of establishing the claims of that State to territory in the West.

As early as the 23d of August, Col. Brodhead mentioned the proposed enterprise in a letter of that date addressed to the president of the Council, viz.: "An Expedition against the Sanduskies is in Contemplation, and I wish to promote it, but what can be done with naked and starved men, unless the Country will afford a generous supply, you will easily Determine." The expedition was to be under the command of Col. Gibson, of the Seventh Virginia Regiment, and the rendezvous was ordered at Fort McIntosh on the 5th of September. A considerable number of volunteers were recruited, including many of the leading citizens of Washington County. But the same difficulties were encountered in the raising of supplies which Brodhead had previously met in the prosecution of his campaign against the Delaware towns, and he made little if any progress towards the desired result during the short time that he afterwards remained as commandant at Fort Pitt.

On the 24th of September, 1781, Brig.-Gen. William Irvine received orders to supersede Col. Brodhead in the command of Fort Pitt and the Western Department. He at once repaired to his post of duty, and began the arduous task of having the work put in a tolerable condition for defense, and of bringing the troops under his command there up to as near a state of efficiency as was practicable. The Eighth Pennsylvania and Seventh Virginia Regiments at Fort Pitt had been reduced to a mere remnant, sufficient men remaining in each to form two full companies, but no more, and they were reorganized in that way, and the supernumerary officers sent elsewhere. Of the condition of the soldiers at the fort Irvine wrote Gen. Washington: "I never saw troops cut so truly deplorable a figure. No man would believe from their appearance that they were soldiers; nay, it was difficult to determine whether they were white men."

A similar petition was presented to Council Jan. 6, 1783, by prisoners from Lochry's command, then returning (not escaped) from Canada, as follows:

Under such circumstances and in view of the almost impossibility of obtaining supplies, Gen. Irvine did not encourage the projected expedition to the Sandusky towns, and it was accordingly abandoned for that year. He ascertained that the post at Wheeling (Fort Henry) was occupied by a garrison of one Continental officer and fifteen privates, but he could not spare any of the soldiers from Fort Pitt for their relief, and he found some difficulty in obtaining elsewhere even the small number of men necessary. On the 14th of November he wrote James Marshel, county lieutenant of Washington, asking him to furnish volunteers for the relieving party. Marshel replied, two days later, "I cannot comply with your requisition of engaging a number of men for the defense of Fort Wheeling, as I am heartily tired out with volunteer plans;" but he added, "I shall order out, according to class, the number of militia you have demanded, and order the officer to wait on you for instructions." He did so, sending Lieut. John Hay in command of one sergeant and fifteen privates of the Washington County militia. The officer waited on Gen. Irvine as ordered, and on the 28th of November received his instructions "to proceed to Wheeling with the detachment under his command, there to relieve the garrison of Continental troops, taking upon himself the charge of the post." Lieut. Hay and his detachment occupied Fort Henry until the 2d of February following, when the officer and garrison were relieved by another lieutenant and a detachment of equal numbers from the Washington County militia, and these remained garrisoning the post until about the 1st of April following.

Williamson's Expeditions.—In November, 1781, after the proposed campaign against Sandusky had been given up for that year, a small expedition was sent against the Moravian towns on the Muskingum River. The reason for this movement against the peaceful Moravians was that many of the borderers believed, or professed to believe, that they (the Christian Indians) were secretly in league with the warlike savages who lived farther to the northwest, that even if they did not take active part in the frequent raids and butcheries, they did at least at their isolated towns—situated midway between the Ohio River frontier and the hostile villages on the Sandusky—give shelter, subsistence, and information to the Shawanese and Wyandot warriors when engaged in their bloody forays; and some even believed that the Moravians themselves mingled with the war parties and wielded the knife and tomahawk. It was not intended, however, in this expedition to use fire and sword against the Indians of the Moravians towns, but to induce them, if possible, to remove farther away from the Ohio, or, failing in this, to take them as prisoners to Fort Pitt.

The expedition numbered between seventy-five and one hundred men, and was made up of volunteers from the country west of the Monongahela River, principally from Washington County. The commanding officer (Col. David Williamson) was of the same county and one of its prominent citizens.

The organization of the expedition was effected with but little delay, for the enterprise was one involving little danger to deter volunteers, and it was not necessary for its probably short term of service to accumulate a large amount of provisions. Having no artillery, camp equipage, or supply trains to impede his progress, Col. Williamson moved his force rapidly to the Ohio, and thence to the towns on the Muskingum; but in the mean time he had been forestalled in his projected work by a large force of hostile savages,[1] who charged the Moravians with being in league with the whites, and on this plea had visited their towns, broken them up, driven the people away to Sandusky, and carried the white Moravian missionaries residing among them prisoners to Detroit.

On his arrival at the towns, Williamson found them deserted, except by a small party of the Moravians, who had been driven away, but who had been allowed by their captors to return for the purpose of gathering some corn which had been left standing in the fields near the villages. This party he took prisoners and marched them to Fort Pitt, where, however, they were soon after set at liberty by Gen. Irvine, the commandant.

During the winter of 1781–82 the people of the frontier settlements looked forward with dread and painful foreboding to the time of melting snows and springing grass, the time when the lifting of winter's embargo would permit the Western savages to come out from the shelter of their towns and carry devastation across the border from the Ohio to the Monongahela. The months of December and January were exceedingly and continuously cold, but at the beginning of February the weather became unusually mild; and this sudden and remarkable change proved to be the opening of spring. In a few days the snow had disappeared, and the season seemed like April rather than February. The savages on the Sandusky at once availed themselves of the unusual circumstance, and took the war-path. A party of them en-

[1] The hostile Indians and British, being suspicious that the Moravians had been secretely working in the interests of the Americans, resolved to drive them from their towns on the Muskingum. An Indian force was therefore gathered for this purpose, composed of Wyandots, Delawares, and Shawanese, in all amounting to more than three hundred warriors. The first of the Indian parties—a body of one hundred and forty Wyandots under their Half-King, and accompanied by Matthew Elliot, a Tory, holding a captain's commission in the British service—reached the Muskingum on the 10th of August, 1781. The Upper Sandusky Delawares, under Capt. Pipe and Wingenund, came in soon after, and by the 14th the whole force was gathered at the Moravian towns, where they remained for nearly a month. On the 11th of September they left on their return to Sandusky, forcing the Moravian Indians to accompany them, abandoning their villages, cattle, and crops. The war parties also made prisoners of Heckewelder, Zeisberger, and other missionaries found at the villages, and sent them to the British at Detroit, where they were tried as spies, charged with holding correspondence with the Americans. They were soon afterwards acquitted by the British court-martial at Detroit, and allowed to rejoin their Indian converts in the vicinity of Sandusky.

tered Virginia as early as the 8th of the month, and murdered a young man named John Fink at the Buchanan settlement. This was the opening act of the Indian hostilities of the memorable year 1782.

On the 10th[1] of February a war party of Shawanese attacked the house of Robert Wallace, on the waters of Raccoon Creek, in the present township of Hanover, Washington County. The husband and father was away from home at the time of the attack, and the Indians having killed his cattle and hogs, and committed all the depredations possible except that of burning the house, took Mrs. Wallace and her three children prisoners, and moved as rapidly as possible with them towards the Ohio, evidently anticipating a prompt pursuit. When Wallace returned in the evening and saw the desolation of his home he at once understood the cause, and during the night roused the neighboring settlers, and formed a party to start at dawn on the trail of the savages, and rescue the prisoners from their hands if possible. The party, determined on revenge, set out as proposed, but there came a light fall of snow which concealed the trail, and compelled them to return without having accomplished their object.

Within a few days of the time when the Shawanese attacked Wallace's house,[2] another party of Indians appeared in the west part of Washington County, and captured a man named John Carpenter, who lived on the waters of the Dutch Fork of Buffalo Creek.[3] They also took his two horses, and with these and their prisoners they made their way to and across the Ohio, swimming the somewhat swollen river, and nearly losing the horses in doing so, and proceeded rapidly to the Muskingum. At the end of the first day's journey beyond that river the horses were hobbled and turned loose to feed. In the morning Carpenter was sent to bring them in, and finding them attempting to make their way back over the trail of the previous day, he suddenly resolved that he too would make the attempt, though he well knew that his fate would be a terrible one if he should fail. Freeing the horses from their hobbles he mounted one of them, and made his way as rapidly as possible to the Ohio, which he reached in safety near Fort McIntosh. Thence he went to Fort Pitt, reported the events of his captivity to Col. Gibson, and came back to his home in Washington County.

Upon his return Carpenter reported in the settlement that his savage captors were six in number, and that among them were two who called themselves Moravian Indians and spoke in good Dutch. These two, he said, had appeared particularly vindictive towards the whites, and treated him much more severely than did the others. The settlers had already become aroused, and were preparing to form an expedition to invade the Indian country as their only means of safety and peace. But when they received the intelligence brought by Carpenter, they at once concluded that the atrocities then recently committed were the work of the Moravians. Even before this they had been strongly inclined to hold the so-called Christian Indians responsible for the atrocities which had been committed, for it was known that some of the Moravians had returned from their enforced exile and were reoccupying their former homes;[4] and, as the frontiersmen said, it was not likely that the hostile savages from far-off Sandusky would have reached the border settlements so early in the season; or if in fact they were the perpetrators of the outrages, they must have made the Muskingum villages the base of their operations, and in such case the blame was chargeable on the Moravians. There were some who dissented from this view of the case, but when the story of Carpenter's capture and captivity was told, it was agreed by nearly all that the Moravians had at least given aid to the murdering savages by furnishing them with a refuge and subsistence, if indeed they had not also actually accompanied the war parties and taken active part in their work of massacre and devastation. It was therefore the general sentiment of the people that an expedition should be sent at once to the Moravian towns to compel their final and permanent evacuation by the Moravians, to burn the houses so that the place could no longer be used as a shelter and base of operations for war parties, and to take bloody vengeance on all hostile savages who might be found there; but it does not appear that in the inception of the enterprise there was any intention (at least among the leading men) to kill any of the really peaceable Moravians, or to do them any violence beyond compelling them (by force if need be) to vacate the villages and remove either to a remote part of the Indian country or to the vicinity of Fort Pitt, where they could be kept under the surveillance of the military authorities.

So unanimous among the settlers was the sentiment in favor of such an expedition that its ranks could have been easily and quickly filled with volunteers, but Col. James Marshel, who as county lieutenant of Washington had entire control of the military of the county, was entirely opposed to that method of raising men, being—as he had previously expressed himself in an official letter to Gen. Irvine—"heartily tired out with volunteer plans." He had received authority from the Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania (in circular instructions to lieutenants of the western counties, dated Jan. 8, 1782) to [1] Butterfield's and some other accounts erroneously give the 17th as the date of the attack on Wallace's house.

[2] It was about the 15th of February that Carpenter was captured. Some accounts have it "early in March," but this is a mistake. He had escaped and returned to the settlements before the 25th of February.

[3] Doddridge in his "Notes" says Carpenter lived in Virginia, not far from Wellsburg.

[4] "Having received intelligence that the Indian towns on the Muskingum had not moved, as was supposed, a number of men, properly provided, collected and rendezvoused on the Ohio opposite the Mingo Bottom, with a design to surprise the above [Moravian] towns."—Pennsylvania Gazette, April 17, 1782.

call out the militia of his county at will on any emergency which in his opinion rendered it necessary, and he now promptly exercised that authority by calling out from the militia of the county the number of men which he thought necessary for the successful accomplishment of the object in view. The force, which consisted of about one hundred and sixty men,[1] all of Washington County, and all, or very nearly all, of whom were mounted, was placed under command of Col. David Williamson. It left the county on the 3d of March, and in the morning of the 4th crossed the Ohio River to the Mingo Bottom, which was on the western bank of the stream, about two and a half miles below the present town of Steubenville.

When the Shawanese war party who destroyed the home of Robert Wallace, on Raccoon Creek, made their rapid retreat to the Ohio with their prisoners, in the night of the 10th of February, they found Mrs. Wallace and her infant child to be serious impediments to the rapidity of their march, and so, soon after crossing the river, these two helpless ones were ruthlessly murdered,[2] the mother scalped, and her body impaled on the sharpened trunk of a sapling standing directly on the path which led from the Mingo Bottom to the villages on the Muskingum. On their arrival at the Moravian town of Gnadenhütten they announced the bloody work on which they had been engaged and exhibited the plunder they had secured. The Christian Indians at once saw how their own safety might be endangered by this visit of the hostile party. They reproached the Shawanese for having compromised them by stopping at their town, and begged them to proceed on their homeward journey without delay. The warriors complied with this request, but not until they had cunningly induced the simple Moravians to purchase from them some of the household utensils they had brought from the ravaged home on Raccoon Creek, and had disposed of the blood-stained dress of Mrs. Wallace to some of the foolish young squaws of Gnadenhütten. These were dear purchases to the unsuspecting Moravians, for they soon after paid for them with their lives. It has been the opinion of many that the scheme was preconcerted on the part of the hostile Indians, who knew of the preparations which were being made in the white settlements for an expedition against the Muskingum towns,[3] and left these articles at Gnadenhütten, expecting that the white men would find them there, and regarding the fact as positive proof that the Moravians had committed the outrages on Raccoon and Buffalo Creeks, would murder them and destroy their towns in retaliation. The hostile Indians suspected that the Moravians were in secret alliance with the Americans,[4] and therefore might have wished to have them destroyed, or at least permanently driven from their towns, so that the war parties might pass to and fro between [1] Butterfield, in his "Historical Account of the Expedition Against Sandusky under Col. William Crawford in 1782," gives the strength of this force as ninety men only; and Doddridge (page 248) places it at "between eighty and ninety men;" but this is undoubtedly an error. Most of the accounts which bear the appearance of authenticity state the number to have been one hundred and sixty. One of the apparently most reliable of these accounts is the "Relation of Frederick Linebach," which is found in the Pennsylvania Archives of 1781–83, page 524, and is given farther on in this narrative. It embraces the account given of the expedition by two persons living near Easton, Pa., but who were present on the frontier at the time Williamson's party returned from the campaign. In a few days thereafter they left the frontier and returned to Eastern Pennsylvania, where they related the facts as given. The number of Williamson's men was stated by them as one hundred and sixty. The statement of men who were on the border at the time, who heard all the facts related, and very likely saw the forces of the expedition, is of more value than any account written years afterward from recollection or tradition. It is true that Dr. Doddridge was also living on the frontier at the time, but as he was then only about twelve years old, it is not to be supposed that he would of his own knowledge have any definite information as to the number of men composing the expedition.

Stone, in his "Life of Brant," ii. 220, says, "A band of between one and two hundred men from the settlements of the Monongahela turned out in quest of the marauders [those who had committed atrocities on the frontier east of the Ohio, and part of whom were supposed to be the Moravians], thirsting for vengeance, under the command of Col. David Williamson."

On page 143 of "Contributions to American History," published by the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, is found the following: "In March, 1782, one hundred and sixty militiamen living upon the Monongahela set off on horseback to the Muskingum, in order to destroy three Moravian Indian settlements."

Col. Whittlesey, in the "American Pioneer," vol. ii. p. 428, says, "They were principally from the Monongahela region, and appointed Williamson to the command."

Gen. Irvine, who was in the East at the time the expedition set out, and who arrived back at Fort Pitt a few days after the forces came back from their bloody work on the Muskingum, wrote to Gen. Washington on the 20th of April following, in which letter he said that upon his arrival at Fort Pitt he found that "about three hundred men had just returned from the Moravian towns."

[2] The two other Wallace children—Robert, aged two and a half years, and his brother, ten years of age—were taken to Sandusky, where the elder one died. Robert was sold to the Wyandots, and remained with that tribe nearly three years. His father heard of his being there, and after the close of the Revolution sent for him, and having succeeded in obtaining his release from captivity brought him back to his home in Washington County.

[3] The story was afterwards current among the inhabitants that the infamous renegade, Simon Girty, was present in the settlements in disguise when the expedition was being formed, and that he did all in his power to promote it. That the Indians wished to have the blame of their outrages thrown on the Christian Indians is evident from the fact that two of the most savage of the captors of John Carpenter pretended to be Moravians, though they were but warriors in that disguise.

[4] "The peaceable Indians [Moravians] first fell under suspicion with the Indian warriors and the English commandant at Detroit, to whom it was reported that their teachers [the missionaries] were in close confederacy with the American Congress for preventing not only their own people but also the Delawares and some other nations from associating their arms with those of the British for carrying on the war against the American colonies. The frequent failures of the war expeditions of the Indians was attributed to the Moravians, who often sent runners to Fort Pitt to give notice of their approach. This charge against them was certainly not without foundation. In the spring of 1781 the war chief of the Delawares fully apprised the missionaries and their followers of their danger both from the whites and Indians, and requested them to remove to a place of safety from both. This request was not complied with. The almost prophetic predictions of this chief were literally fulfilled."—Doddridge's Early Settlement and Indian Wars, page 257.

The same advice which was given to the Moravian Indians by the Delaware chief, as mentioned by Doddridge, was also pressed on them by Col. Brodhead at the time he was marching with his expedition to the Delaware towns in April, 1781, but they persisted in their determination to remain, seeming to court their own destruction.

the Sandusky and the Ohio without having their movements watched and reported to the frontiersmen. If such was their wish and intention it was natural that rather than do the bloody work themselves they should prefer to have it done by the whites, because in that event it would be sure to rouse a universal spirit of revenge among the Northwestern savages, and to unite all the tribes and bands (some of which were still wavering and neutral) in a general Indian league against the Pennsylvania and Virginia settlers. If such was their plan it was a deep-laid one, which was adroitly executed, and only too successful in its results.

Col. Williamson's forces moved from the Mingo Bottom[1] and passed up the valley of Cross Creek, on the direct trail to the Moravian towns. Before they had advanced far from the river they passed the spot where the Indian murderers of Mrs. Robert Wallace had impaled her mutilated body. Naturally the rage of the volunteers was raised to the highest pitch by the ghastly sight, and many and deep were the imprecations launched against the Moravians as the perpetrators of the bloody deed. If they had reasoned more coolly they must have regarded the presence of the corpse at that place as evidence in favor of the innocence of the Christian Indians, for if they had done the murder, they would hardly have advertised the fact by placing the body in that position on the direct path to their settlements; but the men were too highly excited and incensed to reason in this way, and so they marched on, full of wrath and vengeful feelings against the peaceful inhabitants of the villages on the Muskingum.

Late in the evening of the 6th of March the expedition arrived within less than a mile of Gnadenhütten, and the men bivouacked so near the village that their advanced scouts could faintly hear the shouting of the Indian children, yet none of the doomed people in the town knew of their approach. The place had not been permanently reoccupied by the Moravians since their expulsion by the hostile Indians in the preceding September; but a body of about one hundred and fifty of the exiles (including many women and children) had come back from the place to which they had been driven, and were then engaged at their old settlement, gathering corn of the previous year's crop to carry to their suffering brethren on the Sandusky. A part of them were at Gnadenhütten and the remainder at the two other villages, engaged in the same work.

Early in the morning of the 7th the forces moved from their bivouac of the previous night, and advanced towards the town in two divisions. The left division was divided into three parties, one to move through the woods to the river-bank below the town, one to march in the same way to the stream at the upper end of the town, and the third to move at the proper time directly on the village. The right division was to move under cover to the river at a point about a mile above the town, and there to cross to the other shore for the purpose of capturing a body of the Indians who, as the commander had learned from his scouts, were on the west side of the river.

When the right division reached the river above the town they found the stream filled with floating ice and too much swollen to ford. They had neither the time nor the means necessary to build rafts for crossing, and no canoes or other craft were to be seen along the east bank. On the west, however, they saw what appeared to be a canoe, and a young man named Sloughter volunteered to swim across and bring it over. This was done, but it proved to be, not a canoe, but a trough intended for holding sugar-water. Though large for that use, it would only carry two men at a time, and in that manner they crossed the river, some of the men, however, stripping off their clothes, placing them in the trough, and then swimming by its side across the stream. When some fifteen or twenty of the party had gained the west bank of the river, one of the scouts, who had been posted a short distance in advance, discovered an Indian. Two shots were instantly fired at him, breaking his arm. He proved to be a young half-breed, named Joseph Shabosh, who had been sent out to catch a horse. After breaking his arm the scouts rushed upon him, killed[2] and scalped him, he the while begging piteously for his life, telling them that he was a Christian, and that his father was a white man and a minister. The firing of the shots at young Shabosh of course put an end to all hopes of further concealment, and word was at once sent to the parties of the left division to move instantly on Gnadenhütten, while the men of the right division who had gained the west bank of the river—that is to say the party who had killed Shabosh—marched as rapidly as possible to the capture of the Moravians who were on that side of the stream. These were found in a field, gathering corn to take to Sandusky. The white men told them they had come to take them all to Fort Pitt for safety.

[1] "Mingo Bottom is a rich plateau on the immediate bank of the Ohio, in the south half of section 27 of township two, range one, of the government survey, extending south to a small affluent of the Ohio known as Cross Creek. Opposite the upper portion of Mingo Bottom is Mingo Island, containing about ten acres, although much larger in 1782. It supports a scanty growth of willow bushes only, but within the recollection of many now living it was studded with trees of large size, particularly the soft maple. Cross Creek, on the Virginia side, flows into the Ohio about three-fourths of a mile below. Before the great flood of 1832 the island contained not less than twenty acres. The usual place of crossing was directly from shore to shore, across the head of the island. At the landing on the west bank the vagrant Mingoes had once a village, deserted, however, as early as 1772. Their town gave name to the locality. The Ohio has been forded at this crossing in very low water. The bluffs of the river are below the island on the Virginia side, above on the Ohio side. Mingo Bottom contains about two hundred and fifty acres."—Butterfield's Expedition against Sandusky, p. 63.

[2] The name of Charles Bilderback has been preserved as that of the man who killed and scalped young Shabosh, and who seven years afterwards was captured by an Indian party, taken to the very place where Shabosh was murdered, and there killed and scalped. This is the tradition. The most that can be said of it is that it may be true.

"The Indians surrendered,[1] delivered up their arms, and appeared highly delighted with the prospect of their removal, and began with all speed to prepare victuals for the white men, and Indians were immediately dispatched to Salem, a short distance from Gnadenhütten, where the Indians were gathering in their corn, to bring them into Gnadenhütten. The party soon arrived with the whole number of Indians from Salem. In the mean time the Indians at Gnadenhütten were confined in two houses some distance apart and placed under guards, and when those from Salem arrived they were divided and placed in the same houses with their brethren from Gnadenhütten."

While these scenes were being enacted Williamson's men in Gnadenhütten ransacked the village, and found there what they considered damning proof of the treachery and guilt of the Moravians. They seized the Indian horses and pointed to the brands on them as proof that they had been stolen from the settlements. The Indians in reply said they were in the habit of branding their horses for identification, and offered to produce the branding irons they used for the purpose. Tea-kettles, pots, basins, pewter plates, and a variety of other articles were found which the white men alleged to have been taken from the houses of settlers east of the Ohio. The Indians replied that nearly all these things had been brought by the missionaries from the missions on the Susquehanna, though some had been purchased by them from traders. But then came the fatal evidence that there were among these articles some household utensils which had been taken from the house of Robert Wallace, and that the dress which his wife wore when she received the death-blow was found upon the person of one of the young Moravian women, and these were fully identified by Wallace himself, who was present with the expedition. In the face of these facts all protestations of innocence on the part of the Indians were unavailing. Their doom was already fixed in the minds of the incensed borderers, who at once demanded of Col. Williamson that they should be put to death.

Under the pressure of these demands the commander called a council of war to decide what should be done, but the officers composing it evaded the responsibility of making a decision, and in fact they knew they would be powerless to enforce it if made against the wishes of the men. Williamson thereupon ordered that the question be referred to a vote of the volunteers, which vote should be final. The men were then formed in line and the question formally put to them, "Shall the Moravian Indians be taken as prisoners to Fort Pitt, or put to death here?" All those in favor of sparing their lives were directed to advance three paces to the front. At the order all stood fast in the line save eighteen brave men who advanced to the front, and stood there in hopeless minority until the commander announced the result, then withdrew, and, as tradition says, called on God to witness that they were guiltless of participation in the awful tragedy about to be enacted.

It was evening on the 7th of March when the dread decision was communicated to the unhappy Moravian prisoners. They had already abandoned all hope of mercy from man, and when asked if they were prepared to die answered that they were Christians, and had no fear of death. They were then told that they must make all preparations during the night, and die on the following morning.

The work of butchery was done in the forenoon of the 8th of March.[2] The victims were dragged by ropes placed about their necks, some singly and others in pairs, to the place of slaughter, where they were knocked down like beasts with a cooper's mallet, and then tomahawked and scalped. The particulars are too dreadful to dwell upon. The tale of Wyoming's massacre is less soul-sickening than the record of that day's work done by Christian white men.

"The prisoners," says the Rev. Dr. Doddridge, "from the time they were placed in the guard-house foresaw their fate, and began their devotions of singing hymns, praying, and exhorting each other to place a firm reliance in the mercy of the Saviour of men. When their fate was announced to them these devoted people embraced, kissed, and bedewing each others' faces and bosoms with their mutual tears, asked pardon of the brothers and sisters for any offense they might have given them through life. Thus at peace with God and with each other, on being asked by those who were impatient for the slaughter whether they were ready to die, they answered that they had commended their souls to God and were ready to die. The particulars of the dreadful catastrophe are too horrid to relate. Suffice it to say that in a few minutes these two slaughter-houses, as they were then called, exhibited in their ghastly interior the mangled, bleeding remains of these poor unfortunate people of all ages and sexes, from the aged, gray-headed parents down to the helpless infant at its mother's breast, dishonored by the fatal wounds of the tomahawk, mallet, war-club, spear, and scalping-knife."

[2] The manner in which Dr. Doddridge and some others tell the story of the massacre would lead to the inference that the Moravian prisoners were slaughtered on the 7th of March, commencing immediately after their doom was decided by the vote of the volunteers. That such was not the case, but that the killing was postponed until the morning of the 8th, is shown by the Rev. David Zeisberger's narrative of the transaction, as also by the "Relation of Frederick Linebach," which is given in these pages. Gen. Irvine, however, in a letter to Gen. Washington, dated April 20, 1782, said the report there was that Williamson's men had killed the Moravians "after cool deliberation and considering the matter for three days."

the slaughter of the Moravians, is found in the Pennsylvania Archives of 1781–83, page 524, as follows:

"That some time in February one hundred & sixty Men, living upon Monaungahela set off on Horseback to the Muskingum, in order to destroy Three Indian Settlements, of which they seemed to be sure of being the Touns of some Enemy Indians. After coming nigh to one of the Touns they discovered some Indians on both sides of the River Muskingum. They then concluded to divide themselves in Two parties, the one to cross the River and the other to attack those Indians on this side. When the party got over the River they saw one of the Indians coming up towards them. They laid themselves flat on the ground waiting till the Indian was nigh enough, then one of them shot the Indian and broke his arm; then three of the Militia ran towards him with Tomahawks; when they were yet a little distance from him he ask'd them why they had fired at him; he was Minister Sheboshch's [John Bull's] Son, but they took no notice of what he said, but killed him on the Spot. They then surrounded the field, and took all the other Indians Prisoners. The Indians told them that they were Christians and made no resistance, when the Militia gave them to understand that they must bring them as Prisoners to Fort Pitt they seemed to be very glad. They were ordered to prepare themselves for the Journey, and to take all their Effects along with them. Accordingly they did so. They were asked how it came they had no Cattle? They answered that the small Stock that was left them had been sent to Sandusky.

"In the Evening the Militia held a Council, when the Commander of the Militia told his men that he would leave it to their choice either to carry the Indians as Prisoners to Fort Pitt or to kill them; when they agreed that they should be killed. Of this Resolution of the Council they gave notice to the Indians by two Messengers, who told them that as they had said they were Christians they would give them time this night to prepare themselves accordingly. Hereupon the Women met together and sung Hymns & Psalms all Night, and so likewise did the Men, and kept on singing as long as there were three left. In the morning the Militia chose Two houses, which they called the Slaughter Houses, and then fetched the Indians two or three at a time with Ropes about their Necks and dragged them into the Slaughter houses, where they knocked them down; then they set these Two houses on Fire, as likewise all the other houses. This done they went to the other Towns and set fire to the Houses, took their plunder, and returned to the Monaungahela, where they held a Vendue among themselves. Before these Informants came away it was agreed that 600 men should meet on the 18th of March to go to Sandusky, which is about 100 Miles from the Muskingum."[1]

[1] Linebach (or Leimbach) was an inhabitant of Northampton County, Pa., living not far from the Moravian headquarters at Bethlehem, in that county. On receipt of the intelligence of the massacre, he communicated it to the Moravian Bishop Seidel, who requested that he would make the statement to Congress, which he did, carrying with him a letter from L. Weiss to Charles Thomson, secretary of Congress, as follows (see Penn. Archives of 1781–83, p. 523):

"Sir,—I received this afternoon a letter of the Reverend Nathaniel [Seidel], Bishop of the United Churches of the Brethren, residing at Bethlehem, dated the 5th instant. He informs me that the same day a melancholy report was brought to him by one Mr. Leimbach, relative to a murder committed by white Men upon a number of Christian Indians at a place called Muskingum. He continues in his Letter that the same Mr. Leimbach is to proceed the next day to Philad[a] in order to give Congress information how he came to the knowledge of that Event, so that Congress, unless it had already a better account of the affair than he can give, might, upon his Report, take some measures, as well of the mischief already done, as more which might be done, and thus prevent the total extirpation of a Congregation of Indians converted to the Faith of Jesus Christ, and the Judgments of Almighty God against our dear Country, which stands much in need of his divine Protection. The Bishop desires me to give attention to Mr. Leimbach's Report (I have done it), and to direct him where he should make his addresses. I make bold, Sir, to address him to you, and to begg the Favour that you introduce him, if possible this night, with the Delegates of the State of Virginia, from whence it is said the mischief originated, and to-morrow morning with Congress. Your Humanity, Sir, gives me Confidence to use the Freedom to trouble you this day, the day set apart for the Service of Men to their God, about a Cause which is most properly his own The Tragic scenes of erecting two Butcher-Houses or Sheds, and killing in cold blood 95 browne or tawny sheep of Jesus Christ, one by one, is certainly taken notice of by the Shepherd, their Creator and Redeemer.

"I am, with particular respect, Sir,

"Your most obed. humble Servant,

"Sunday, 7 April, 1782."

It appears by the letter of Weiss that he supposed the outrage to have been committed by Virginians, and every effort was made at the time to encourage that belief and make it general. It is not strange that the Moravian bishop at Bethlehem should have readily accepted this idea, for he knew that the feeling of enmity was particularly bitter between the Virginians and Indians, and he knew of the kindness which had been shown by Gen. Irvine, a Pennsylvanian, to the Christian Indians on the Muskingum, and of the services which the latter had rendered to the general in notifying him in advance of proposed irruptions by the hostile tribes. An attempt was also made to fasten the odium of the crime distinctively upon the Scotch settlers. Among the papers transmitted by Secretary Thomson to the Executive Council of Pennsylvania with a copy of Linebach's statement was a letter from George Niser, dated York Town, April 4, 1782, in which he said, "I have seen a Letter wrote by a Woman at Pittsburgh, dated the 21st March, which contains these particulars: 'The Militia have killed 99 of the Moravian Indians, Viz., 33 Men and 66 Women and Children.' In another Letter from the same of the 5th April, 'The Moravian Indian Congregation is butchered, as it is reported, by the Scotch. They came and told them they must prepare directly for Death. The Indians requested but an hour's Time for this Purpose, which was granted. They went to their Meeting-house to join in Prayers to the Lord. After an hour had passed they fell upon them and butchered all of them in cold Blood in the meeting-house, and then set fire to the House.'"—Pa. Archives, 1781–83, p. 525.

Of the whole party of about one hundred and fifty Indians of all ages who were present at the three villages when Williamson's forces made their appearance, about one-third the number were at work at the upper village. These heard the shots that were fired at Young Shabosh, and one or two of them cautiously advancing down the river to ascertain the cause soon found the body scalped and mutilated. No further warning was necessary. The alarm was instantly given to the people at the upper town, who fled in terror to the woods, and thus made their escape, leaving their corn and implements behind them. Soon after their flight a party of Williamson's men came to the village, but finding it deserted made no attempt to pursue, though the horsemen could easily have overtaken the fugitives. The white men having set fire to the village, then returned to Guadenhütten. After the massacre that town was also set on fire and entirely consumed, including the two slaughter-houses and the bodies of the slain Moravians.

The number of Indians slaughtered was reported as eighty-eight, but Heckewelder, the white Moravian missionary, in his account gave the number of the murdered ones as ninety-six,—sixty-two adults, male and female, and thirty-four children. All these, he says, were killed in the two slaughter-houses except four, who being supposed to be warriors were taken some distance away on the open ground, there to be tomahawked and scalped. One of them in being taken to the fatal spot escaped from his captors by cutting the rope which bound him and then dashing away towards the woods. He was, however, soon overtaken by the horsemen, who cut him down and scalped him.

Only two of all those taken in the lower towns escaped the slaughter. These were two Indian boys of about fifteen years of age. One of them, who was called Thomas, was knocked down with a tomahawk and scalped, but being only stunned recovered after a time, and on looking round him saw another boy named Abel lying near, wounded and scalped but still alive. Thomas had the presence of mind to lie down again, feigning death, and it was well for him that he did so, for in a few minutes a white man came near, and seeing Abel still living dispatched him with his tomahawk. After a while Thomas crept slowly and painfully along over the dead bodies, succeeded in getting out of the house unobserved, and gained the shelter of the woods, afterwards making his way in safety to Sandusky. The other boy who escaped had managed to hide himself away in the cellar of the house where the women were imprisoned, and just before the building was fired crept out through a narrow window or hole in the foundation. Another boy had been concealed with him in the cellar, and attempted to follow his companion through the window, but being of larger size found it impossible to get through, and so was compelled to remain and perish in the flames. It is stated in some accounts that another Indian boy, eight years of age, was brought away by one of the volunteers, who took him to his home in the settlements, where he remained until nearly grown to manhood, when he left his white master and rejoined the Delawares in the West.

When the work of massacre was finished, and the destruction of the Moravian towns made complete, the forces of Col. Williamson started on their return, taking with them more than eighty Indian horses, partly laden with plunder from the devastated villages on the Muskingum. On the 10th of March they reached and crossed the Ohio and marched thence to their homes, but they did not immediately disband. It does not appear that they had yet begun to feel any shame or compunction for the frightful crimes they had committed; on the contrary, they were exultant, and (as is shown by Linebach's account) at once set on foot a plan for a new expedition to number six hundred men to invade the Indian country. If their only object was to proceed against the hostile savages, it was a legitimate and praiseworthy enterprise; but it seems as if they had resolved on nothing less than the extermination of all Indians.

On a little island in the Allegheny, known as Smoky or Killbuck's Island, lying opposite Fort Pitt, there were encamped a small band of friendly Delawares, among whom were several who actually held commissions in the service of the United States. The name of the island—Killbuck's—was derived from Captain Killbuck,[1] who had more than once received commendation from Gen. Brodhead in his official communications for bravery, efficiency, and steadfast fidelity to the American cause. This little island was visited with fire and sword on the 24th of March by a body of the men from Chartiers Creek, some of whom had accompanied Williamson on the Moravian expedition, though the colonel was not with them in this new raid, nor is it probable that he approved or knew of their intentions. They killed several of these friendly Indians, including two who held commissions in the service of the government, and would have killed all if they had been able to accomplish it; but the remainder succeeded in making their escape to the fort, except two, who swam to the other shore and took to the woods. One of the latter was a chief called the Big Cat, who narrowly escaped death at the hands of the assailants. He had always been found among the most steadfast of the Indian allies of the United States, but from this time his friendship ceased, and he never again trusted the Americans.

The marauding party, after killing all who came within their reach upon the island, crossed over with their plunder to the fort. They were enraged that the fugitives from the island had eluded their vengeance and found shelter within the work, and they were particularly incensed against Col. Gibson (the temporary commandant) for his known friendship for the murdered Moravians and his outspoken condemnation of their own villany. They sent a message to him saying that they would scalp him if he came in their way, but they could not gain admittance to the fort, and were compelled to return to their homes without the opportunity of committing any further outrages against the friendly Delawares or of scalping the commandant.

In some accounts of the Gnadenhütten massacre it is stated that Col. Gibson, being apprised in advance of the murderous intentions of Williamson's men, had sent a runner to the Moravian villages to inform the people of their danger, but that the runner did not reach the towns in time to make the information of any avail. Col. Gibson would undoubtedly have done this if he had had the opportunity, but the statement that he did actually send such a messenger is rendered improbable by a letter written by him to the Moravian bishop at Bethlehem, Pa., dated May 9, 1781,[2] a copy of the material parts of which is here given, viz.:

"To the Right Rev. Nathaniel Seidel:

"Sir,—Your letter by Mr. Shebosh,[3] of the 11th ult., came safe to hand. I am happy to find that the few small services I rendered to the gentlemen of your Society in this quarter meets with the approbation of you and every other worthy character. Mr. Shebosh will be able to give you a particular account of the late horrid massacre perpetrated at the towns on Muskingum by a set of men, the most savage miscreants that ever degraded human nature. Had I have known of their intentions before it was too late I should have prevented it by informing the poor sufferers of it. I am in hopes in a few days to be able to send you a more particular account than any that has yet transpired, as I hope to obtain the deposition of a person who was an eye-witness of the whole transaction and disapproved of it. Should any accounts come to hand from Mr. Zeisberger, or other gentlemen of your Society, you may depend on my transmitting them to you. . . . Believe me, with esteem, your most obedient Servant,

"JOHN GIBSON,
"Col. 7th Virginia Regt."

Gen. Irvine, who had been for some time at Philadelphia and Carlisle, returned to Fort Pitt and resumed command on the day following the attack on the Delawares at Killbuck's Island. He found affairs in the department in a bad condition, the troops at the fort demoralized, and the country in general in a state bordering on anarchy. Some of the people applauded the dark deeds done on the Muskingum, while many were loud in their condemnation. The Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania having received from Congress Linebach's account of the massacre, addressed to Gen. Irvine the following letter of inquiry,[1] viz.:

"PHILADA., April 13, 1782.

"SIR,—The Council having received information thro' various channels that a party of Militia have killed a number of Indians at or near Muskingham, and that a certain Mr. Bull [young Shebosh] was killed at the same time, the Council, being desirous of receiving full information on a subject of so much importance, request you will obtain and transmit to them the facts relative thereto, authenticated in the clearest manner."

Though Gen. Irvine had always been the fast friend of the Moravian Indian congregation, and of the white missionaries who had them in charge, it is evident that he was induced by considerations of policy to prevent a thorough investigation and exposition of the facts connected with the massacre.[2] On the 9th of May, 1782, he wrote from Fort Pitt to the president of the Council, saying,—

"SIR,—Since my letter of the 3d instant to your Excellency, Mr. Penticost and Mr. Canon have been with me; they and every intelligent person whom I have conversed with on the subject are of the opinion that it will be almost impossible ever to obtain a just account of the conduct of the Militia at Muskingum. No man can give any account except some of the party themselves. If, therefore, an inquiry should appear serious, they are not obliged, nor will they give evidence. For this and other reasons I am of opinion further inquiry into the matter will not only be fruitless, but in the end may be attended with disagreeable consequences."

On the 8th of May Dorsey Pentecost, of Washington County, wrote from Pittsburgh to William Moore, president of the Executive Council, on the same subject, as follows:

"Dr Sir,—I arrived home last Thursday without any particular accident; yesterday I came to this place, have had a long conference with Gen. Irwin and Col. Gibson on the subject of public matters, Perticularly respecting the late excurtion to Kushacton,[3] that affair is a subject of great speculation here, some condemning, others applauding the measure; but the accounts are so various that it is not only Difficult but almost Indeed Intirely Impossible to learn the real truth; no person can give Intelligence but those that were along, and notwithstanding there seems to have been some difference amongst themselves about that business yet they will say nothing, but this far I believe may be depended on, that they killed the Innocent with the guilty, and its likely the majority was the former. I have heard it Insinuated that about thirty or forty only of the party gave their Consent or assisted in the Catastrofy. . . . It's said here, and I believe with truth, that Sundry articles were found amongst the Indians that was taken from the Inhabitants of Washington County, and that the Indians Confessed themselves that when they set out from St Duskie, Ten warriors came with them who had went into the Settlements, and that four of them were then in the Towns who had returned. If those Indians that were killed were really friends, they must have been very Imprudent to return & settle at a place they knew the white peop e had been at and would go to again, without giving notice & besides to bring warriors with them who had come into the Settlements & after murdering would return to their Towns and of course draw people after them filled with revenge, Indignation & Sorrow for the loss of their friends their wives & their Children. . . ."

On the following day, May 9th, Pentecost again wrote the president of the Council, viz.:

"Dr Sir,—Since writing the letter that accompanys this, I have had another and more particular conversation with Gen. Irwin on the subject of the late excurtion to Kushacton, and upon the whole I find that it will be Impossible to git an Impartial and fare account of that affair, for although sundry persons

[2] In a letter which Gen. Irvine wrote to his wife about that time concerning the Moravian butchery he said, "Whatever your private opinion of these matters may be, I conjure you, by all the ties of affection, and as you value my reputation, that you will keep your mind to yourself, and that you will not express any sentiment for or against these deeds."—Contributions to American History, p. 148.

that were in Compy may disapprove of the whole or every part of the Conduct, yet from their Connection they will not be willing, nor can they be forced to give Testimony, as it effects themselves, and the people here are greatly divided in Sentiment about it, and an Investigation may produce serious effects, and at least leave us as Ignorant as when we began, and instead of rendering a service may produce a Confusion and Ilwill amongst the people, yet I think it necessary that Council should take some Cognizance or notice of the matter, and in such a Time as may demonstrate their disapprobation of such parts of their conduct as are Censurable, otherwise it may be alleged that Governt (Tacitly at least) have Incouraged the killing of women and children; and in a proclamation of this kind it might be well not only to recommend but to forbid that in future Excursions that women, children, and Infirm persons should not be killed, so contrary to the Law of arms as well as Christianity. I hope a mode of proceeding something like this would produce some good effects, and perhaps soften the minds of the people, for it is really no wonder that those who have lost all that is near and Dear to them, go out with determined revenge and Exterpation of all Indians."

These letters disclose a determination on the part of Pentecost (though he was in no way implicated in the affair) and others to suppress the facts connected with the massacre and to prevent investigation; and they were enabled to accomplish this result through the concurrence of Gen. Irvine, who, as is evident, took that course for policy's sake, though he was deeply mortified and grieved at the result of Williamson's expedition. By those who were engaged in the bloody work, and by their friends, it was vehemently asserted that their action was generally approved by the people of the frontier settlements, but it is certain that this assertion was unfounded. Col. Edward Cook, the county lieutenant of Westmoreland (who had succeeded the unfortunate Col. Lochry in that office in December, 1781), in a letter addressed by him to President Moore, dated Sept. 2, 1782, thus expressed his detestation of the murderous deeds of the Washington militiamen: " . . . I am informed that you have it Reported that the massacre of the Moravian Indians Obtains the Approbation of Every man on this side of the Mountains, which I assure your Excellency is false; that the better part of the Community are of Opinion the Perpetrators of that wicked Deed ought to be Brought to Condein Punishment; that without something is Done by Government in the Matter it will Disgrace the Annals of the United States, and be an Everlasting Plea and Cover for British Cruelty." And the testimony of a man of the character and standing of Col. Edward Cook is above and beyond the possibility of impeachment.

As the expedition of Col. Williamson was hastily made up, and held together but a few days, it is not probable that there were ever any muster-rolls of its organization, if, indeed, it could have been termed an organization at all. It is known, however, that there is in existence a list (called a roll) of the names of the men who composed the expedition, made up, no doubt, soon after their return from the Muskingum, when the affair began to be one of wide-spread public notoriety. But this list is in hands from which it cannot be obtained, nor can any access be had to it, for obvious reasons. Probably there is no person now living, other than the custodian of this list, who knows the names of a dozen persons who were with Col. Williamson at Gnadenhütten on the memorable 8th of March, 1782. Various accounts have been given, naming the person who first used the fatal mallet,[1] and of fiendish remarks said to have been made by the butchers while doing their work, but these accounts have not about them sufficient of proof or strong probability to entitle them to perpetuation. Nor does any one at the present day know the names of any of the humane eighteen who advanced to the front from the long line that stood fast for murder.

Whether Col. Williamson voted or not is not known. It is not likely that he did, knowing that his vote could not affect the dread result. It would be gratifying to be able to say with certainty that he did give his voice for mercy; and it is a pleasant task to record the favorable opinion of him which is expressed by one who knew him, the Rev. Dr. Doddridge, who says,[2] " In justice to the memory of Col. Williamson I have to say that, although at that time very young, I was personally acquainted with him, and, from my recollection of his conversation, I saw with confidence that he was a brave man, but not cruel. He would meet an enemy in battle and fight like a soldier, but not murder a prisoner. Had he possessed the authority of a superior officer in a regular army, I do not believe that a single Moravian Indian would have lost his life, but he possessed no such authority. He was only a militia officer, who could advise but not command. His only fault was that of too easy a compliance with popular opinion and popular prejudice. On this account his memory has been loaded with unmerited reproach."

It has already been mentioned that even before Col. Williamson's forces disbanded themselves, after their return from the Moravian campaign, a project had been formed to raise a new and more formidable expedition to march against the Indian towns at Sandusky, the headquarters of the hostile tribes that were so constantly and persistently depredating the frontier settlements east of the Ohio. Notice of such a project is found in the "Relation of Frederick Linebach" (before quoted), where he says, "It was agreed that six hundred men should meet on the 18th of March to go to Sandusky. . . ." The plan was not carried out at the time, nor in the manner then contemplated, but it was not abandoned, and it is certain that from the first the project against the hostile towns on the Sandusky found favor among the people of the settlements. It was only as to the manner in which it should be executed that they disagreed, the majority being of the opinion that it should be carried on under the direction of the commandant at Fort Pitt, and, if practicable, led by him in person.

The first step to be taken, then, was to secure the countenance and approbation of Gen. Irvine, and to that end, James Marshel, lieutenant of Washington County, wrote the commandant, advising him of the existence of the project, intimating a desire for his approval of it, and introducing as the bearer of the communication Col. David Williamson as a proper commanding officer of the expedition, unless the general should see fit to assume the command in person. In this letter, which was dated April 4, 1782, Col. Marshel said,—

"The bearer hereof, Colonel Williamson, is now prepared for a voyage down the river with about thirty thousand weight of flour. But from a real love to his country, he proposes not only to carry an expedition against Sandusky with the militia of this county, together with what volunteers might be raised in Westmoreland, but offers to advance such part of the flour as might be necessary for the occasion. . . . The people in general on the frontiers are waiting with anxious expectation to know whether an expedition can be carried against Sandusky early this spring or not. I could therefore wish that Colonel Williamson would be countenanced in this plan if with propriety it can be done." By this letter from the proper authority, the county lieutenant, the project of the Sandusky expedition was first brought officially to the notice of the commander of the Western Department. The general was disinclined (as will hereafter be seen) to place Col. Williamson in command of such an expedition, for he abhorred the work done under command of that officer at Gnadenhütten, but he was favorably disposed towards the carrying on of an offensive campaign against the hostile Indians at Sandusky, and although he did not give an immediate answer to the proposition, he took the matter under consideration.

One week prior to the date of Marshel's letter Gen. Irvine had written to him and also to Col. Edward Cook, county lieutenant of Westmoreland, asking them to meet him at Fort Pitt for general consultation on the military matters of the department. In his letter to Col. Cook (which was in effect identical with that addressed to Col. Marshel) the general said, "You are already acquainted with the resolution of Congress and orders of the President and Council of Pennsylvania respecting my command in this quarter, in addition to which I have received instructions from his Excellency General Washington. As making arrangements to cover and protect the country is the main object, and as it is to be done by a combination of Regulars and Militia, the business will be complicated. And, further, as there will be a diversity of interests, I think it of the utmost Importance that, whatever plan may be adopted, it should be as generally understood as the nature of the Service will admit. . . . You will conceive that I shall stand in need of the Counsels and assistance on this occasion of some of the principal people of the country. . . . I wish, therefore, to see you and at least one field-officer of every Battalion in your County; for which purpose I request you will be pleased to warn such as you may think proper to attend at this post on Friday, the 5th of April next. Punctuality to the Day will be necessary, as I have written to Col° Marshal and others in Washington county also to attend on that day. . ." Similar requests to attend were sent to the lieutenants of the Virginia counties, which under the previous claims of that State covered the territory of Westmoreland and Washington.

The conference was held at Fort Pitt, agreeably to Irvine's appointment. Col. Marshel, of Washington County, was obliged to be absent, but in the letter which he wrote to the general, informing him of his probable non-attendance, he said, "I shall most heartily concur in any plan that may be adopted for the good of the country." In his place he sent Col. Vallandigham, sub-lieutenant, and there were also present from Washington County Judge James Edgar, Col. Williamson, Col. Thomas Crook, and Maj. John Carmichael, the last three being officers of the county militia. From Westmoreland there were Cols. Cook and Campbell, respectively lieutenant and sub-lieutenant of the county; and Ohio County, Va., was represented by Col. David Shepherd and Maj. McCulloch.

When Gen. Irvine was appointed by Congress to the command of the Western Department, in September, 1781, he was empowered to call on the county lieutenants to furnish him from time to time, from the militia of their respective counties, such numbers of troops as he might consider necessary for the defense of the post of Fort Pitt, and for the general protection of the country, and at the same time the president of the Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania and the Governor of Virginia were requested by Congress to direct the county lieutenants and militia officers of the counties in their respective States within the Western Department to obey orders given by Gen. Irvine for that purpose. President Moore, of Pennsylvania, thereupon promptly gave the necessary directions to the lieutenants of Washington and Westmoreland Counties to furnish troops from the militia of their counties upon the requisition of Gen. Irvine. But Governor Harrison, of Virginia, had not complied[1] with the request of Congress in that particular, and so that department commander could only depend on the troops under his immediate command, and such as could be furnished by Westmoreland and Washington Counties. But, after all, it made little difference that the lieutenants of the Virginia counties were not empowered to honor his requisition, for Col. David Shepherd, lieutenant of Ohio County, reported to the general at the conference that nearly all the men in his district liable to military duty were enrolled in Pennsylvania, and Col. John Evans, lieutenant of Monongalia County (who was not present at the meeting), wrote to Irvine, saying that he had in his district not more than three hundred effective men, with a frontier of eighty miles in extent, and instead of being able to furnish any troops for general defense (even if he had the authority), he implored that the case might be reversed, and men, arms, and ammunition be sent to him for purposes of defense.

At the conference at Fort Pitt the principal question discussed was that of the general defense of the frontier settlements. All present at the meeting pledged to the commander all the support and assistance in their power to give. The decision arrived at was to form parties of rangers, and to keep these constantly on duty (by tours) and in motion from point to point along the frontiers. For this purpose it was agreed that Washington County should keep a total force of one hundred and sixty men in actual service under two field-officers, constantly ranging along the frontier of the Ohio River "from Montour's Bottom to Wheeling, and thence some distance along the southern line,"[2] and that Westmoreland County should furnish two companies, aggregating sixty-five men, to be continually on duty, guarding the northern frontier from the Laurel Hill to the Allegheny River. Nothing definite was done or proposed at the conference with regard to the projected expedition against the Indians at Sandusky.

Meanwhile the savages in the Northwest had (as had been foreseen) grown still more fiercely hostile since the massacre of the Moravians, and more active than ever on the war-path. In the space of a few weeks, following the return of Williamson's expedition to the Muskingum, several Indian forays were made into Washington County. A Mrs. Walker, whose home was on Buffalo Creek, was taken prisoner on the 27th of March, but succeeded in escaping from her savage captors. On the 1st of April an entire family named Boice, consisting of eight persons, were captured by the savages[3] and taken away to the Indian towns west of the Ohio, and on the following day another party of marauders killed a man within the present limits of the borough of Washington.

A few days after the capture of the Boice family, Miller's block-house, situated on the Dutch Fork of Buffalo Creek, in the present township of Donegal, Washington County, was attacked on a Sabbath morning by a party of about twenty Shawanese warriors, who had arrived during the previous night, but remained hidden near by until early in the morning. Two men came out of the inclosure and started along the path to search for a colt which had strayed. When they had passed the ambushment, the savages fell upon and killed them, and having torn off their scalps the entire party leaped from their place of concealment and surrounded the block-house. The inmates were now only one old man and several women and children, but there were rifles and ammunition, and these were used by the women with so good effect that the savage assaulters were kept at bay until there came a relieving party of three white men, who rushed past the Indians, effected an entrance into the block-house, and defended it so effectively that the red-skinned besiegers finally withdrew and disappeared.[4] A number of other attacks were made in this county and in Westmoreland during the month of April and in the early part of May. In a letter written on the 8th of the latter month by Dorsey Pentecost to President Moore[5] he said, "The Indians are murdering frequently. Last Friday night two men were killed on the frontiers of this County, and about a week before I got home fourteen persons were killed and Captured in Different parts, and last week some mischief was done near Hanna's Town,[6] but have not learned the particulars."

It was evident that the ranging parties of Washington and Westmoreland County militia could not effectually guard the frontier against Indian incursions. It began to be seen more clearly than ever

[1] He did, however, issue such directions in the following May, but it was then of no avail because of an existing law of Virginia prohibiting the sending of her militia troops outside the boundaries of the State.

[2] Butterfield's "Crawford's Campaign Against Sandusky."

[3] One account erroneously places this event in the spring of 1783, one year too late.

[4] The men killed were John Hupp, Sr., and Jacob Miller, Sr. The persons left in the block-house were old Mr. Matthias Ault, Ann Hupp, wife of the murdered John, their four children,—Margaret, Mary, John, and Elizabeth Hupp,—the family of Edgar Gaither, Frederick Miller, an eleven-year-old son of Jacob, who was killed outside the fort, and two or three other members of the same family. The successful defense of the block-house until the arrival of help was principally due to the heroism and undaunted courage of the widowed Ann Hupp. The boy, Frederick Miller, was started from the house to go to Rice's fort, about two miles away, for aid, but the Indians saw him, and he was driven back wounded, narrowly escaping with his life. But the firing of the Indians when they killed Hupp and Miller had been heard at Rice's, and the rescuing party referred to, consisting of Jacob Rowe, only about sixteen years of age, Jacob Miller, Jr., and Philip Hupp (all of whom belonged at the Miller block-house, but chanced to be absent at Rice's at the time of the attack), came with all speed to the assistance of the besieged ones, and gained an entrance as stated. The Indians kept up the siege through the day, but disappeared during the following night.

[6] Hanna's Town was the old county-seat of Westmoreland County.

that a merely defensive line of operations could not afford security to the border settlements, and that this much-desired object could be accomplished only by a successful campaign against the Indian strongholds in the heart of their own country. This belief had been expressed by Gen. Irvine five months before (Dec. 2, 1781), in a letter to Gen. Washington, in which he said, "It is, I believe, universally agreed that the only way to keep Indians from harassing the country is to visit them. But we find by experience that burning their empty towns has not the desired effect. They can soon build others. They must be followed up and beaten, or the British whom they draw their support from totally driven out of their country."

The sentiment of the people (particularly those of Washington County) in favor of an invasion of the Indian country became more positive day by day. No such enterprise could have been carried forward without the aid of Washington County, but its people were especially earnest (it may be said clamorous) for the movement against the Indian towns. On the 1st of May Col. Marshel said in a letter to Gen. Irvine, "Since I had the Honour of consulting with you on the expediency of an Expedition against Sandusky I have met with the Officers and principal People of this County, and find that in all probability we shall be able to carry forward the Enterprise." Six days later a delegation of the leading inhabitants, principally of Washington County, and among them Dorsey Pentecost, then a member of the Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania, called on Gen. Irvine at Fort Pitt, and urged upon him the expediency of giving his consent and aid to the expedition, on which the minds of so large a number of the people west of the Laurel Hill (especially those living west of the Monongahela) were fixed in approval.

It seems that this pronounced expression of the popular feeling decided Gen. Irvine to consent to and promote the expedition. He had been suspicious that one of the objects of the enterprise was to establish a new and independent State or government of some kind west of the Ohio, but upon receiving full and satisfactory assurances that such was not the case, and upon mature consideration which resulted in the conviction that such an idea if really entertained could not be successfully executed, he finally gave a definite consent to, and a promise to support and carry out, the expedition. On the 9th of May he said in a letter to the president of the Executive Council, "A volunteer expedition is talked of against Sandusky, which, if well conducted, may be of great service to this country; if they behave well on this occasion it may also in some measure atone for the barbarity they are charged with at Muskingum. They have consulted me, and shall have every countenance in my power if their numbers, arrangements, etc., promise a prospect of success." There appears in the tone of this letter an evident resolve on the part of Gen. Irvine that the new expedition should be very different in character from that which had so recently and so barbarously executed its bloody work at Gnadenhütten, and this was afterwards made still more apparent by his determined opposition to Col. Williamson as commander.

The plan of the expedition was made by Gen. Irvine, and of course the projected campaign was to be under his direction and control, as commander of the department. He decided that no force of less than three hundred men could march to attack the Indians on the Sandusky with any hope of success against the numbers that might be there concentrated; that to move a smaller body than that to the invasion of the Indian country would be but to invite disaster; therefore under no circumstances would he permit the advance of an expedition numbering less than the number mentioned, while he wished and hoped to be able to make it considerably above that strength.

To raise the necessary force the general had unquestioned authority to direct a draft from the militia of Washington and Westmoreland Counties, yet he resolved to not adopt that course, but to fill the ranks entirely with volunteers. They were not, however, to be irresponsible, but were to be in all respects subject to military rule and discipline, precisely as if they had been drafted from the militia for service in a regularly organized regiment or battalion. Rapidity of movement being indispensable to the success of such an expedition, it was decided that all the men must be mounted; but no horses could be furnished by the department quartermaster, nor any supplies by the commissary, therefore each volunteer was required to provide himself with a horse, arms, and equipments (ammunition being furnished from Fort Pitt); and they or the people of Washington and Westmoreland were to provide supplies sufficient for a campaign of thirty days' duration.

The volunteers were to be allowed to elect their own officers, even to the commander of the expedition. Each man was, in consideration of services on this campaign, and of furnishing horse, arms, and supplies, to receive credit for two full tours of military duty; and in case he should find in the camps or villages of the enemy any articles which had been stolen by the Indians from his home in the settlements, he was to receive them back upon proving property. Gen. Irvine could not promise that the government would pay for horses or equipments lost in the service, but it was announced by Dorsey Pentecost, member of the Council from Washington County, and also by the member from Westmoreland, that the State of Pennsylvania would reimburse all who might sustain losses in the campaign. This semi-official promise was not doubted by the volunteers or the people of the two counties, and it was afterwards made good.

The time fixed for the assembling of the expeditionary forces was the 20th of May. The place designated for the rendezvous was the Mingo Bottom, on the west bank of the Ohio River, a short distance below the present town of Steubenville.[1] Great exertions were made to induce men to volunteer, and the result was a rapid recruitment. Many who were willing to serve in the expedition were unable to equip themselves for a campaign in the Indian country, but in nearly all such cases some friend or neighbor was found who would loan a horse or furnish supplies. The dangerous and desperate nature of the enterprise was fully understood, yet so much of enthusiasm was exhibited in all the settlements that as early as the 15th of May the number of volunteers obtained was regarded as sufficient for the successful accomplishment of the purposes of the campaign, and three days later a great proportion of them had made all their arrangements[2] and were on their way to the place of meeting. But they did not all arrive at the time appointed, and it was not until the morning of the 24th that the last of the volunteers had crossed from the Virginia side of the Ohio to the rendezvous. When, on the same day, the forces were mustered on the Mingo Bottom it was found that four hundred and eighty[3] mounted men were present, ready and eager for duty.[4] Of this number fully two-thirds were volunteers from Washington County,[5] and the remainder from Westmoreland, excepting a very few from the Pan-Handle of Virginia.

It was in the afternoon of the 24th of May that the force was mustered and divided into eighteen companies, their average strength, of course, being about twenty-six men. They were made thus small on account of the peculiar nature of the service in which they were to engage,—skirmishing, firing from cover, and practicing the numberless artifices and stratagems belonging to Indian warfare. Another object gained in the formation of these unusually small companies was the gathering together of neighbors and acquaintances in the same command. For each company there were then elected a captain, a lieutenant, and an ensign. "Among those [captains] chosen," says Butterfield in his narrative of the expedition, were "McGeehan, Hoagland, Beeson, Munn, Ross, Ogle, John Biggs, Craig Ritchie, John Miller, Joseph Bean, and Andrew Hood." Two other captains not mentioned by Butterfield were John Hardin and Joseph Huston. These two, as well as Capt. John Beeson (of Uniontown), commanded companies raised in that part of Westmoreland County which afterwards became Fayette. A large part of the company commanded by Capt. John Biggs was also of the same county. Eleven or twelve of the companies were from Washington County, but their captains cannot be placed, except Craig Ritchie, of Canonsburg.

After the several companies had been duly formed and organized, the line-officers and men proceeded to elect field-officers and a commandant of the expedition. For the latter office there were two candidates. One of these was Col. David Williamson, and his chances of election seemed excellent, because he was a citizen of Washington County, which had furnished two-thirds of the men composing the forces, and also because he was still undeniably popular among the volunteers, notwithstanding the odium which had fallen on the acts of the then recent Moravian expedition, of which he was the commander. His competitor for the command of the new expedition was Col. William Crawford, whose home was at Stewart's Crossings of the Youghiogheny River, in Westmoreland (afterwards Fayette) County. He was a regular army officer of the Continental establishment, was well versed in Indian modes of fighting, and had already made an enviable military record. He, as well as Williamson, enjoyed much personal popularity, and was also the one whom Gen. Irvine wished to have selected for the command.[6]

Upon counting the votes it was found that four

[1] In a letter written on the 8th of May by Dorsey Pentecost to President Moore (Pa. Arch., 1781–83, p. 540) he said, "I hear there is great preparation making for a Desent on St. Duskie, to set out the 20th of this month (the former plan having failed), which will be conducted by Gentlemen of Experience & Verasity. I am Doubtful of the men's being raised, as those Kind of Expeditious have generally failed for the want of Men, and I am further Doubtful on acct. of Provisions, as great numbers will not be able to furnish themselves, and no money in the hands of any person Equal to that business."

[2] Butterfield, in his "Expedition against Sandusky," says, "It is a tradition—nay, an established fact—that many, aside from the ordinary arrangements necessary for a month's absence (not so much, however, from a presentiment of disaster as from that prudence which careful and thoughtful men are prone to exercise), executed deeds 'in consideration of love and affection,' and many witnesses were called in to subscribe to 'last wills and testaments.'" The commander of the expedition, Col. Crawford, executed his will before departing on the fatal journey to the Wyandot towns.

[3] Lieut. John Rose (usually mentioned in accounts of the expedition as Maj. Rose), an aide-de-camp of Gen. Irvine, who had been detailed for the same duty with the commander of this expedition, wrote to the general on the evening of the 24th from Mingo Bottom, and in the letter he said, "Our number is actually four hundred and eighty men." This was a more favorable result than had been anticipated, as is shown by a letter written three days before (May 21st) to Gen. Washington by Gen. Irvine, in which the latter said, "The volunteers are assembling this day at Mingo Bottom, all on horseback, with thirty days' provisions. . . . If their number exceeds three hundred I am of opinion they may succeed, as their march will be so rapid they will probably, in a great degree, effect a surprise."

[4] All were in high spirits. Everywhere around there was a pleasurable excitement. Jokes were bandied and sorrows at parting with loved ones at home quite forgotten, at least could outward appearances be relied upon. Nevertheless furtive glances up the western hillsides into the deep woods kept alive in the minds of some the dangerous purpose of all this bustle and activity."—Butterfield's Historical Account of the Expedition against Sandusky under Col. William Crawford.

[5] Col. James Marshel, in a letter addressed to Gen. Irvine, dated May 29, 1782, said that of the 480 men composing the forces of the expedition 320 were from Washington County, about 130 from Westmoreland, and 20 from Ohio County, Va.

[6] Gen. Irvine wrote to Gen. Washington on the 21st of May, "I have taken some pains to get Col. Crawford appointed to command, and hope he will be." Irvine was evidently determined that Williamson should not be elected, and there is little doubt that he had used such means as made him certain of the result beforehand. If Williamson had been elected, it is not likely that the general would have allowed him to assume command.

hundred and sixty-five had been cast, of which Williamson had received two hundred and thirty, against two hundred and thirty-five for Col. Crawford, who thereupon became commandant of the forces of the expedition.[1] Four majors were then elected, viz.: David Williamson,[2] of Washington County, Thomas Gaddis[3] and John McClelland, of Westmoreland (now Fayette), and Joseph Brinton, of what is now East Pike Run township, Washington County, their rank and seniority being in the order as above named. The brigade-major elected was Daniel Leet, whose residence was near the present borough of Washington. Jonathan Zane, John Slover, and Thomas Nicholson were designated as guides or pilots to the advancing column. Dr. John Knight,[4] post surgeon at Fort Pitt, had been detailed by Gen. Irvine as surgeon to the expedition.

Instructions addressed "To the officer who will be appointed to command a detachment of volunteer militia on an expedition against the Indian town at or near Sandusky" had been forwarded by Gen. Irvine from Fort Pitt on the 21st of May. In these instructions the general expressed himself as follows:

"The object of your command is to destroy with fire and sword, if practicable, the Indian town and settlement at Sandusky, by which we hope to give ease and safety to the inhabitants of this country; but if impracticable, then you will doubtless perform such other services in your power as will in their consequences have a tendency to answer this great end.

"Previous to taking up your line of march it will be highly expedient that all matters respecting rank or command should be well understood, as far at least as first, second, and third.[5] This precaution, in case of accident or misfortune, may be of great importance. Indeed, I think whatever grade or rank may be fixed on to have command, their relative rank should be determined. And it is indispensably necessary that subordination and discipline should be kept up; the whole ought to understand that, notwithstanding they are volunteers, yet by this tour they are to get credit for it in their tours of military duty, and that for this and other good reasons they must, while out on this duty, consider themselves, to all intent, subject to the military laws and regulations for the government of the militia when in actual service.

"Your best chance of success will be, if possible, to effect a surprise, and though this will be difficult, yet by forced and rapid marches it may, in a great degree, be accomplished. I am clearly of opinion that you should regulate your last day's march so as to reach the town about dawn of day, or a little before, and that the march of this day should be as long as can well be performed.

"I need scarcely mention to so virtuous and disinterested a set of men as you will have the honor to command that though the main object at present is for the purpose above set forth, viz., the protection of this country, yet you are to consider yourselves as acting in behalf of and for the United States, that of course it will be incumbent on you especially who will have the command to act in every instance in such a manner as will reflect honor on, and add reputation to, the American arms, of nations or independent States.[6]

[1] Doddridge, in his "Notes" (page 265), says of Crawford that "when notified of his appointment it is said that he accepted it with apparent reluctance." Concerning this Butterfield, in his narrative of the expedition, says,—

"It has been extensively circulated that Crawford accepted the office of commander of the expedition with apparent reluctance, but Rose (Maj. Rose, of Gen. Irvine's staff) settles that question. His reluctance was not in taking command of the troops after the election, but in joining the expedition. He left his home with the full understanding that he was to lead the volunteers. Gen. Irvine, it is true, allowed the troops to choose their own commander, but he was not backward in letting it be known that he desired the election of Crawford."

[2] Williamson received the entire vote of the force for first major. "I cannot but give Col. Williamson," said Maj. Rose in a letter to Gen. Irvine, "the utmost credit for exhorting the whole to be unanimous after the election had been made known, and cheerfully submitting to be second in command. I think if it had been otherwise Crawford would have pushed home, and very likely we should have dispersed, which would likewise have been the case if Williamson had not behaved with so much prudence."

[3] The opposing candidate for second field-major was Col. James Marshel, county lieutenant of Washington, who came within three or four votes of an election. He was an exceedingly popular man, and highly thought of by Gen. Irvine.

[4] Dr. John Knight was a resident of Bullskin township, Westmoreland County. In 1776 he had enlisted in the West Augusta Regiment (Thirteenth Virginia) as a private soldier. Soon after enlisting he was made a sergeant by Col. Crawford, the commanding officer of the regiment. On the 9th of August, 1778, he was appointed surgeon's mate in the Ninth Virginia. Afterwards he was promoted to surgeon of the Seventh Virginia (under command of Col. John Gibson), and held that position in the same regiment at the time the Sandusky expedition was fitted out. He was then detached by order of Gen. Irvine, and at the request of Col. Crawford, to act as surgeon of that expedition. On the 21st of May he left Fort Pitt to join the expeditionary forces, and reached the rendezvous at Mingo Bottom on the 22d. After encountering all the dangers and hardships of the campaign, from which he narrowly escaped with his life, he returned to his regiment, and remained on duty as its surgeon at Fort Pitt till the close of the war, when he left military life. On the 14th of October, 1784, he married Polly, daughter of Col. Richard Stevenson, who was a half-brother of Col. Crawford. Subsequently Dr. Knight removed to Shelbyville, Ky., where he died March 12, 1838. His widow died July 31, 1839. They were the parents of ten children. One of their daughters married John, a son of Presley Carr Lane, a prominent public man of Fayette County. Dr. Knight was the recipient of a pension from government, under the act of May 15, 1828.

[5] These directions were observed, Col. Williamson being designated as second, and Maj. Gaddis as third in command.

[6] Yet the Moravian historians and their imitators have heaped unmeasured abuse on the brave men who composed this expedition. Heckewelder, in his "History of the Indian Nations," calls them a "gang of banditti;" and Loskiel, writing in the same vein in his "History of Indian Missions," said, "The same gang of murderers who had committed the massacre on the Muskingum did not give up their bloody design upon the remnant of the Indian congregation, though it was delayed for a season. They marched in May, 1782, to Sandusky, where they found nothing but empty huts." The Rev. Joseph Doddridge, D.D., following the lead of these Moravian defamers, in his "Notes on the Settlement and Indian Wars of the Western Parts of Virginia and Pennsylvania," says (page 264) of Crawford's expedition, "This, in one point of view at least, is to be considered as a second Moravian campaign, as one of its objects was that of finishing the work of murder and plunder with the Christian Indians at their new establishment on the Sandusky. The next object was that of destroying the Wyandot towns on the same river. It was the resolution of all those concerned in this expedition not to spare the life of any Indians that might fall into their hands, whether friends or foes. . . . It would seem that the long continuance of the Indian war had debased a considerable portion of our population to the savage state of our nature. Having lost so many relatives by the Indians, and witnessed their horrid murders and other depredations on so extensive a scale, they became subjects of that indiscriminating thirst for revenge which is such a prominent feature in the savage character, and having had a taste of blood and plunder, without risk or loss on their part, they resolved to go on and kill every Indian they could find, whether friend or foe." Does not the tenor of Gen. Irvine's instructions to Col. Crawford completely disprove the allegations of Loskiel, Heckewelder, and Doddridge? If further testimony is necessary it is found in a "History of Centre Church," written by Robert A. Sherrard, of Ohio, whose father, John Sherrard, was a volunteer in Crawford's expedition, and present with it in its operations from the Ohio to the Sandusky and back to the Ohio. Mr. Sherrard says, "In my young days I was acquainted with six or seven of the men who were out in Crawford's campaign. They were volunteers from the neighborhood where I was raised, within four or five miles of Connellsville, close to which place Col. Crawford dwelt. John Sherrard, Col. James Paull, John Rodgers, Daniel Cannon, Alexander Carson, and several others of that neighborhood arrived safe home. I have heard my father converse freely on that subject, and at a much later date I have conversed with Col. Paull and John Rodgers about Crawford's defeat,

"Should any person, British, or in the service or pay of Britain or their allies, fall into your hands, if it should prove inconvenient for you to bring them off, you will, nevertheless, take special care to liberate them on parole, in such manner as to insure liberty for an equal number of people in their hands. There are individuals, however, who I think should be brought off at all events should the fortune of war throw them into your hands. I mean such as have deserted to the enemy since the Declaration of Independence."

The forces of Col. Crawford commenced their march from Mingo Bottom early in the morning of Saturday, the 25th of May. There was a path leading from the river into the wilderness, and known as "Williamson's trail," because it was the route over which Col. Williamson had previously marched on his way to the Moravian towns. This trail, as far as it extended, offered the easiest and most practicable route, but Col. Crawford did not adopt it,[1] because it was a principal feature in his plan of the campaign to avoid all traveled trails or routes on which they would be likely to be discovered by lurking Indians or parties of them, who would make haste to carry intelligence of the movement to the villages which it was his purpose to surprise and destroy. So the column, divided into four detachments, each under immediate command of one of the four field-majors, moved up from the river-bottom into the higher country, and struck into the trackless wilderness, taking a course nearly due west. The advance was led by Capt. Biggs' company, and piloted by the guides Zane, Nicholson, and Slover.

On through the dark forest the troops moved rapidly but warily, preceded by scouts, and observing every precaution known to border warfare to guard against ambuscade or surprise, though no sign of an enemy appeared in the unbroken solitude of the woods. No incident of note occurred on the march until the night of the 27th of May, when, at their third camping-place, a few of the horses strayed and were lost, and in the following morning the men who had thus been dismounted, being unable to proceed on foot without embarrassing the movements of the column, were ordered to return to Mingo Bottom, which they did, but with great reluctance.

On the fourth day they reached and crossed the Muskingum River, and then, marching up the western side of the stream, came to the ruins of the upper Moravian village, where they made their camp for the night, and found plenty of corn remaining in the ravaged fields of the Christian Indians. This encampment was only sixty miles from their starting-point on the Ohio, yet they had been four days in reaching it. During the latter part of their journey to this place they had taken a route more southerly than the one originally contemplated, for their horses had become jaded and worn out by climbing the hills and floundering through the swamps, and so the commander found himself compelled to deflect his line of march so as to pass through a more open and level country; but he did this very unwillingly, for it led his army through a region in which they would be much more likely to be discovered by Indian scouts or hunting-parties.

Up to this time, however, no Indians had been seen; but while the force was encamped at the ruined village, on the evening of the 28th of May, Maj. Brinton and Capt. Bean went out to reconnoitre the vicinity, and while so engaged, at a distance of about a quarter of a mile from the camp, they discovered two skulking savages and promptly fired on them. The shots did not take effect and the Indians fled, but the circumstance gave Col. Crawford great uneasiness, for, although he had previously supposed that his march had been undiscovered by the enemy, he now believed that these scouts had been hovering on their flanks, perhaps along the entire route from Mingo Bottom, and it was certain that the two savages who had been fired on would speedily carry intelligence of the hostile advance to the Indian towns on the Sandusky.

It was now necessary to press on with all practicable speed in order to give the enemy as little time as possible to prepare for defense. Early in the morning of the 29th the column resumed its march, moving rapidly, and with even greater caution than before. From the Muskingum the route was taken in a northwesterly course to the Killbuck, and thence up that stream to a point about ten miles south of the present town of Wooster, Ohio, where, in the evening of the 30th, the force encamped, and where one of the men died and was buried at a spot which was marked by the cutting of his name in the bark of the nearest tree.

From the lone grave in the forest they moved on in a westerly course, crossing an affluent of the Mohican, passing near the site of the present city of Mansfield, and arriving in the evening of the 1st of June at the place which is now known as Spring Mills Station, on the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad. There by the side of a fine spring they bivouacked for the night. In the march of the 2d they struck the Sandusky River at about two o'clock P.M., and halted that night in the woods very near the eastern edge of the Plains, not more than twenty miles from the Indian town, their point of destination. They had seen no Indian since their departure from the night camp at the Moravian Indian village on the Muskingum, though they had in this day's march unknow-and I can assert positively that I never heard from either of these three the least intimation that to kill off the remainder of the Christian Moravian Indians was at all the object of Crawford and his men; but on the contrary I have frequently heard these men say the main object was to chastise the Wyandots by killing as many as they could, burn their towns, and destroy their corn. This, and this only, was the object of these men in undertaking this campaign, and by that means to check the Indians from murdering, scalping, and plundering the white inhabitants on the frontier settlements, as had been the case for two months before."

[1] Dr. Doddridge, in his "Notes," says, "The army marched along Williamson's trail, as it was then called, until they arrived at the upper Moravian town." In this, as in many other parts of his narrative, Doddridge was entirely mistaken.

ingly passed very near the camp of the Delaware chief Wingenund.

On the morning of the 3d of June the horsemen entered the open country known as the Sandusky Plains, and moved rapidly on through waving grasses and bright flowers, between green belts of timber and island groves such as few of them had ever seen before. Such were the scenes which surrounded them during all of that day's march, and at night they made their fireless bivouac on or near the site of the present village of Wyandot, not more than ten miles from their objective-point, where (as they believed) the deadly and decisive blow was to be struck.

Two hours after sunrise on the 4th the men were again in the saddle, and the four squadrons began their march, moving with greater caution than ever. A march of six miles brought them to the mouth of the Little Sandusky; thence, having crossed the stream, they proceeded in a direction a little west of north, past an Indian sugar-camp of the previous spring (which was all the sign that they had seen of Indian occupation), and passed rapidly on towards the Wyandot town,[1] the objective-point of the expedition, which, as the guide Slover assured the commander, lay immediately before them within striking distance. Suddenly, at a little after noon, the site of the town came in full view through an opening in the timber, but to their utter amazement they found only a cluster of deserted huts without a single inhabitant! The village appeared to have been deserted for a considerable time, and the place was a perfect solitude. This was a dilemma which Col. Crawford had not foreseen nor anticipated, and he at once ordered a halt to rest the horses and give time for him to consider the strange situation of affairs, and to decide on a new plan of operations.

The guides and some others in Crawford's command were well acquainted with the location of the Indian town. John Slover had previously been a prisoner with the Miamis, and during his captivity with that tribe had frequently visited the Wyandot village on the Sandusky. In guiding the expedition there he had, of course, expected to find the village as he had before seen it, and was, like the rest, astonished to find it deserted. The fact, as afterwards learned, was that some time before Crawford's coming, but how long before has never been definitely ascertained, the Indians, believing that their upper village was peculiarly exposed to danger from the incursions of the whites, had abandoned it and retired down the river about eight miles, where they gathered around the village of the Half-King, Pomoacan, and that was their location when the columns of Col. Crawford descended the Sandusky.

[1] The location of the old Wyandot town was three miles southeast of the present town of Upper Sandusky, or five miles below by the course of the river, and on its opposite bank.

Contrary to the belief of the Pennsylvania and Virginia settlers that the mustering of their forces and the march of their expedition was unknown to the Indians, the latter had been apprised of it from the inception of the project. Prowling spies east of the Ohio had watched the volunteers as they left their homes in the Monongahela Valley and moved westward towards the rendezvous; they had seen the gathering of the borderers at Mingo Bottom, and had shadowed the advancing column along all its line of march from the Ohio to the Sandusky. Swift runners has sped away to the northwest with every item of warlike news, and on its receipt the chiefs and warriors at the threatened villages lost not a moment in making the most energetic preparations to repel the invasion. Messengers were dispatched to all the Wyandot, Delaware, and Shawanese bands, calling on them to send in all their braves to a general rendezvous near the Half-King's headquarters, and word was sent to De Peyster, the British commandant at Detroit, notifying him of the danger threatening his Indian allies, and begging that he would send them aid without delay. This request he at once acceded to, sending a considerable force of mounted men, with two or three small pieces of artillery. These, however, did not play a prominent part in the tragedy which followed.

The Indian scouts who had watched the little army of Crawford from the time it left Mingo Bottom sent forward reports of its progress day by day, and from these reports the chiefs at the lower towns on the Sandusky learned in the night of the 3d of June that the invading column was then in bivouac on the Plains, not more than eighteen miles distant. The war parties of the Miamis and Shawanese had not come in to the Indian rendezvous, nor had the expected aid arrived from the British post at Detroit, but the chiefs resolved to take the war-path without them, to harass and hold the advancing enemy in check as much as possible until the savage forces should be augmented sufficiently to enable them to give battle with hope of success. Accordingly, in the morning of the 4th of June, at about the same time when Col. Crawford was leaving his camp-ground of the previous night to march on the deserted Indian town, the great Delaware chief, Capt. Pipe, set out from his town with about two hundred warriors, and marched to the rendezvous, where his force was joined by a larger party of Wyandots under their chief Ghaus-sho-toh. With them was the notorious white renegade, Simon Girty, mounted on a fine horse and decked out in full Indian costume. The combined Delaware and Wyandot forces numbered in all more than five hundred braves, —a screeching mass of barbarians, hideous in their war-paint and wild with excitement. After an orgie of whooping, yelling, and dancing such as savages were wont to indulge in before taking the war-path, the wild crowd relapsed into silence, filed out from the place of rendezvous, and glided away like a huge serpent across the grassy plain towards the cover of the distant belt of forest.

In the brief halt at the deserted village Col. Crawford consulted with his guides and some of the officers as to the most advisable course to be adopted under the strange circumstances in which he found himself placed. John Slover was firm in the opinion that the inhabitants of the village had removed to a town situated a few miles below. He also believed that other villages would be found not far away from the one which had been abandoned, and that they might be surprised by a rapid forward movement. Zane was less confident, and not disposed to advise, though he did not strongly oppose a farther advance into the Indian country. The commander, after an hour's consideration of the embarrassing question, ordered the column to move forward towards the lower towns. Crawford's army and the combined Indian forces under Pipe and Ghaus-sho-toh were now rapidly approaching each other.

Crossing the river just below the abandoned village, the Pennsylvania horsemen pressed rapidly on in a northerly direction to the place which afterwards became the site of Upper Sandusky. There was no indication of the presence of the foe, but the very silence and solitude seemed ominous, and the faces of officers and men grew grave, as if the shadow of approaching disaster had begun to close around them. A mile farther on, a halt was ordered, for the gloom had deepened over the spirits of the volunteers, until, for the first time, it found expression in a demand from some of them that the advance should be abandoned and their faces turned back towards the Ohio River. At this juncture Col. Crawford called a council of war. It was composed of the commander, his aide-de-camp, Rose, the surgeon, Dr. Knight, the four majors, the captains of the companies, and the guides. Zane now gave his opinion promptly and decidedly against any farther advance, and in favor of an immediate return; for to his mind the entire absence of all signs of Indians was almost a sure indication that they were concentrating in overwhelming numbers at some point not far off. His opinion had great weight, and the council decided that the march should be continued until evening, and if no enemy should then have been discovered, the column should retire over the route by which it came.

During the halt Capt. Biggs' company, deployed as scouts, had been thrown out a considerable distance to the front for purposes of observation. Hardly had the council reached its decision when one of the scouts came in at headlong speed with the thrilling intelligence that a large body of Indians had been discovered on the plain, less than two miles away. Then, "in hot haste," the volunteers mounted, formed, and moved forward rapidly and in the best of spirits, the retiring scouts falling in with the main body of horsemen as they advanced. They had proceeded nearly a mile from the place where the council was held when the Indians were discovered directly in their front. It was the war party of Delawares, under their chief, Capt. Pipe, the Wyandots being farther to the rear and not yet in sight.

When the Americans appeared in full view of the Delawares, the latter made a swift movement to occupy an adjacent wood, so as to fight from cover, but Col. Crawford, observing the movement, instantly dismounted his men, and ordered them to charge into the grove, firing as they advanced. Before this vigorous assault the Delawares gave way and retreated to the open plain, while Crawford's men held the woods. The Indians then attempted to gain cover in another grove farther to the east, but were repulsed by Maj. Leet's men, who formed Crawford's right wing. At this time the Wyandot force came up to reinforce the Delawares, and with them was Capt. William Caldwell, of the British army, dressed in the full uniform of an officer in the royal service.[1] He had come from Detroit, and arrived at the Indian rendezvous a little in advance of the main British force, but after Pipe and Ghaus-sho-toh had set out with their braves to meet Crawford. He now came up to the scene of conflict, and at once took command of both Indian parties. On his arrival he immediately ordered the Delaware chief to flank the Americans by passing to their left. The movement was successfully executed, and they held the position much to the discomfort of the frontiersmen, who, however, could not be dislodged from their cover. But they had no great advantage of position, for the Indians were scarcely less sheltered by the tall grass of the plains, which almost hid them from view and afforded a considerable protection against the deadly fire of the white marksmen.[2]

The fight commenced at about three o'clock, and was continued with unabated vigor, but with varying success, through the long hours of that sultry June afternoon. Through it all the villanous Simon Girty was present with the Delawares, and was frequently seen by Crawford's men (for he was well known by many of them), riding on a white horse, giving orders and encouraging the savages, but never within range of the white men's rifles. The combined forces of the Wyandots and Delawares considerably outnumbered the command of Col. Crawford, but the latter held their own and could not be dislodged by all the artifices and fury of their savage assailants.[1] When the shadows of twilight began to deepen over grove and glade the savage hordes ceased hostilities and retired to more distant points on the plains.

[1] Capt. Caldwell was the commanding officer of the entire force which De Peyster had sent from Detroit in aid of their Indian allies, viz., the mounted detachment known as Butler's Rangers and a company of infantry from the garrison at Detroit. Naturally, it would be supposed that the mounted Rangers would arrive first on the ground, and why they did not is not clearly explained, but they were yet several miles in the rear during the fight of the 4th of June. Capt. Matthew Elliott, of the British, was also present with the Indians in this battle, but he was only a Tory officer in the royal service, and could have no command in presence of Caldwell, who was a captain in the regular British army.

The losses in Col. Crawford's command during the afternoon were five killed and twenty-three wounded, as reported by the aide-de-camp, Rose, to Gen. Irvine. One of the killed was Capt. Ogle, and among the officers wounded were Maj. Brinton, Capt. Ross, Capt. Munn, Lieut. Ashley, and Ensign McMasters.

The losses of the Indians were never ascertained. Though doubtless greater than those of the whites, they were probably not very heary, because the savage combatants were to a great extent hidden from view by the tall grass which grew everywhere in the openings. A number of Indian scalps were taken by Crawford's men, but no prisoners were captured on either side. The British captain, Caldwell, was wounded in both legs, and was carried back to Lower Sandusky in the night succeeding the battle. Upon this the command of the British force that was on the way seems to have passed to his lieutenant, John Turney, as a report of their subsequent operations in the campaign was made by him to De Peyster, the commandant at Detroit.

At the close of the conflict of the 4th of June the advantage seemed to be with the white men, for the foe had retired from their front and they still kept possession of the grove,[2] from which the red demons had tried persistently but in vain for more than four hours to dislodge them. The officers and men of Col. Crawford's command were in good spirits, and the commander himself felt confident of ultimate victory, for his volunteers had behaved admirably, exhibiting remarkable steadiness and bravery during the trying scenes of the afternoon. But the Indians were by no means dispirited, for they had suffered no actual defeat, and they knew that their numbers would soon be augmented by the Shawanese and other war parties who were already on their way to join them, as was also the British detachment which had been sent from Detroit.[3] The night bivouac of the Wyandots was made on the plains to the north of the battle-field, and that of the Delawares at about the same distance south. Far to the front of the Indian camps, lines of fires were kept burning through the night to prevent a surprise, and the same precautionary measure was taken by Col. Crawford. Outlying scouts from both forces watched each other with sleepless vigilance through the hours of darkness, and frontiersmen and savages slept on their arms.

It was the wish of Col. Crawford to make a vigorous attack on the Indians at daylight on the morning of the 5th, but he was prevented from doing so by the fact that the care of his sick[4] and wounded was very embarrassing, requiring the services of a number of men, and so reducing the strength of his fighting force. It was determined, however, to make the best preparations possible under the circumstances, and to attack with every available man in the following night. The Indians had commenced firing early in the morning, and their fire was answered by the whites; but it was merely a skirmish at long range and in no sense a battle. It was kept up during the greater part of the day, but little harm was done, only four of Crawford's men being wounded, and none killed. Col. Crawford, as we have seen, was not prepared for a close conflict, but he, as well as his officers and men, felt confident of their ability to defeat the enemy when the proper time should come, attributing the apparent unwillingness of the Indians to come to close quarters to their having been badly crippled in the fight of the 4th. But the fact was that the savages were content with making a show of fight sufficient to hold their white enemies at bay while waiting for the arrival of their reinforcements, which they knew were approaching and near at hand.

The day wore on. The red warriors kept up their desultory firing, and the white skirmishers replied, while their comrades were busily and confidently

[1] Butterfield relates the following incident concerning Francis Dunlevy, one of the volunteers in the expedition, whose home at that time was on Chartiers Creek, in what is now Peters township, Washington County, viz.: "Francis Dunlevy, who belonged to Captain Craig Ritchie's company, had during the fight been engaged with an Indian of huge proportions. The latter, as evening approached, crept carefully and cautiously towards Dunlevy through the top of a tree lately blown down, which was full of leaves, when getting near enough as he supposed he threw his tomahawk, but missed his aim and then escaped. This Indian was afterwards recognized by Dunlevy as he believed in 'Big Captain Johnny,' who, in the war of 1812, was with the friendly Shawanese at Wapakoueta."

[2] "The battle of Sandusky was fought in and around the grove since well known as 'Battle Island,' in what is now Crane township, Wyandot County, three miles north and half a mile east of the court-house in Upper Sandusky. The spot has always been readily identified by reason of the scars upon the trunks of the trees, made by the hatchets of the Indians in getting out the bullets after the action. But the 'island' may now be said to have disappeared. Cultivated fields mark the site where the contest took place. Occasionally an interesting relic is turned up by the plow-share, to be preserved by the curious as a memento of the battle."—Butterfield.

[3] The British force from Detroit, including Butler's Rangers, had arrived on the evening of the 4th at a point only six miles north of the battle-ground, and there encamped for the night. The Indians knew of this, and as they had also begun to receive reinforcements by small parties of Shawanese, they knew that they had only to hold Crawford's force at bay until all their succors should arrive, when victory would be certain. Col. Crawford was entirely ignorant of the proximity of any body of white troops, though he had no doubt that Indian reinforcements were on their way. Had he known all the facts his feeling of confidence must have been changed to the most gloomy forebodings of disaster.

[4] A considerable number of his men had been made sick by the great fatigue and excessive heat of the previous day, and by the very bad water which they had been compelled to drink, the only water which could be found in the vicinity of the battle-ground being a stagnant pool which had formed under the roots of a tree which had been blown over. Maj. Rose, in his report to Gen. Irvine, said, "We were so much encumbered with our wounded and sick that the whole day was spent in their care and in preparing for a general attack the next night."

making preparations for the intended night assault; but it was a delusive and fatal confidence. Suddenly, at a little past noon, an excited scout brought word to Col. Crawford that a body of white horsemen were approaching from the north. This was most alarming intelligence, but it was true. The British detachment from Detroit—Butler's Rangers—had arrived, and were then forming a junction with the Wyandot forces.[1] But this was not all. Almost simultaneously with the arrival of the British horsemen, a large body of Shawanese warriors appeared in the south, in full view from Col. Crawford's position, and joined the Delawares.

In this state of affairs the idea of an attack on the Indian camp could no longer be entertained. The commandant at once called a council of war of his officers to determine on the course to be pursued in this dire emergency. Their deliberations were very short, and the decision unanimously rendered was to retreat towards the Ohio. In pursuance of this decision, preparations for the movement were at once commenced. The dead had already been buried, and fires were now built over them to prevent their discovery and desecration by the savages. Most of the wounded were able to ride, but for the few who were not, stretchers were prepared. These and other necessary preparations were completed before dark, and the volunteers were ready to move at the word of command. Meanwhile, war parties had been hourly arriving to reinforce the Indian forces, which had now become so overwhelming in numbers that any offensive attempt against them would have been madness.

As soon as the late twilight of June had deepened into darkness all scouts and outposts were called in, the column was formed in four divisions, each under command of one of the field-majors, as on the outward march,[2] and the retreat was commenced, the command of Maj. John McClelland leading, and Col. Crawford riding at the head of all. Usually in a retreat the post of honor, as of danger, is that of the rear-guard, but in this case the head of the column was as much or more exposed than the rear, as the line of march lay between the positions held by the Delawares and Shawanese. That the advance was here considered to be the post of danger is shown by the fact that orders were given to carry the badly wounded in the rear.

The Indians had discovered the movement almost as soon as the preparations for it commenced, and hardly had the head of the column begun to move when it was fiercely attacked by the Delawares and Shawanese. The volunteers pushed on, fighting as they went, but they suffered severely, and soon after Maj. McClelland was wounded, and, falling from his horse, was left behind to the tender mercies of the savages. The division, however, fought its way clear of the Indians, who did not then follow up the pursuit, probably for the reason that they felt doubtful as to the actual intent of the movement, thinking it might prove to be but a feint, covering the real design of a general assault; so, fearful of some unknown stratagem or trap, they remained within supporting distance of the Wyandots and Rangers, and by failing to pursue probably lost the opportunity of routing, perhaps annihilating, the head division.

When the advance-guard received the attack of the Delawares and Shawanese, the other three divisions, which, although not wholly demoralized, were undoubtedly to some extent panic-stricken, most unaccountably abandoned McClelland's command, and in disregard of the orders to follow the advance in a solid column, moved rapidly off on a line diverging to the right from the prescribed route. They had not proceeded far, however, before some of the companies became entangled in the mazes of a swamp, in which several of the horses were lost. During the delay caused by this mishap the rear battalion was attacked by the Indians, and a few of the men were wounded, but the enemy did not push his advantage, and the divisions pushed on as rapidly as possible, and deflecting to the left beyond the swamp, and striking the trail by which they came on the outward march, came about daybreak to the deserted Indian village on the Sandusky, where they found the men of McClelland's division, who had reached there an hour or two earlier, disorganized, panic-stricken, and leaderless, for Maj. McClelland had been left for dead on the field, as before narrated; and during the hurried march, or more properly the flight, from the scene of the fight to the abandoned village, the commander, Col. Crawford, had disappeared, and no one was able to give any information concerning him, whether he had been wounded, killed, captured, or lost in the woods. John Slover, the guide, and Dr. Knight, the surgeon, were also missing. These facts, when known by the men, greatly increased their uneasiness and demoralization.

At this point (the deserted Wyandot village), Maj. Williamson, as Col. Crawford's second in command, assumed the leadership of the forces, and after a brief halt the entire command, now numbering something more than three hundred and fifty men, continued the retreat over the route by which they had come on the outward march.[3] The new commander, never

[1] Reported by the British lieutenant, Turney, at one hundred and forty warriors.

[2] Excepting that of Maj. Brinton, who was wounded. His division was now commanded by Brigade-Maj. Daniel Leet.

[3] Soon after leaving the deserted village they passed a sugar camp which the Indians had used the preceding spring. Butterfield relates that, in passing this place, "Isaac Vance, one of the volunteers from Washington County, espied a brass kettle that had been used by the Indians in this camp to boil sap in, and which had apparently been left in the bush through an inadvertence. This kettle, in the eyes of a backwoodsman, was a prize of too much value to be left in the enemy's country; so, dismounting and seizing a bowlder, he soon had the utensil flattened, ready for transportation. It was then securely fastened to his saddle, and notwithstanding the stirring scenes through which the finder soon after passed, was transported all the way to the home of the borderer."

Isaac Vance lived in the township of Somerset, Washington County, as did also his father, John Vance.

doubting that the Indians would pursue him in force, hurried on his men with all possible speed, keeping out the most wary and trusty scouts on his rear and flanks. The command passed the mouth of the Little Sandusky without seeing any signs of an enemy, but while passing through the Plains, at about eleven o'clock in the forenoon, the scouts discovered far in their rear a pursuing party, apparently composed of both Indians and white men. They were afterwards found to be Wyandots and British Rangers, all mounted. It was now the purpose of Maj. Williamson to cross the Plain country and reach the shelter of the timber before being overtaken by the pursuers; and the latter were equally determined, if possible, to possess themselves of the woods in advance of the Americans. The race was an eager and exciting one on both sides, but at last Maj. Williamson found that the Indians were gaining on him so rapidly that he would be compelled to stand for battle before reaching the timber. Maj. Rose, in his report of these operations to Gen. Irvine, said, "Though it was our business studiously to avoid engaging on the Plains, on account of the enemy's superiority in light cavalry, yet they pressed our rear so hard that we concluded on a general and vigorous attack, whilst our light-horse[1] secured the entrance of the woods."

The place where Maj. Williamson found himself compelled to stand at bay before the pursuing horde of Wyandots and British Rangers, in the early afternoon of the 6th of June, was near the creek called Olentangy,[2] a tributary of the Scioto, near the eastern edge of the Plains, where the column of Col. Crawford had first debouched from the shades of the forest into the open country on the morning of the 3d, when moving towards the Wyandot town, which they found deserted. But the aspect of affairs was materially changed since that time. Then they were advancing in high spirits and confident of victory over the savages; now, in headlong flight before the same barbarous foe, they were turning in sheer desperation to fight for their lives.

The battle-line of the borderers faced to the west, and in its rear, holding the edge of the woods, and ready to act as a reserve corps in case of emergency, was the company of light-horsemen. The pursuing force, close upon them, attacked unhesitatingly and with fierce energy, first striking the front, then quickly extending their battle-line around the left flank to the rear of Williamson's force, which was thus compelled to meet the savage assault in three directions. But the panic and demoralization of the volunteers had entirely disappeared,[3] and they met each successive onslaught with such cool bravery and steadiness, and fought with such desperation, that at the end of an hour from the commencement of the battle, the enemy withdrew discomfited, and apparently with heavy loss. Perhaps the sudden cessation of their firing was in some degree due to the fact that just then a furious thunder-storm, which had for some time been threatening, burst upon the combatants. The men were drenched and chilled to the bone, while much of their ammunition was rendered useless by the rain. This, however, operated quite as unfavorably to the Indians as to the whites.

As soon as the savages and Rangers withdrew, Maj. Williamson, without a moment's delay, caused the dead to be buried and the wounded[4] cared for, and then the retreat was resumed. Capt. Biggs' company, which seems to have always held the post of danger, leading the advance in the outward march, now formed the rear-guard, though its ranks were reduced to nine men and all its officers were missing. It was afterwards relieved, however, and from that time each of the companies in turn took position to guard the rear of the retreating column.

When Williamson commenced his retreat from the battle-field, the enemy, who had in the mean time scattered over the Plains, soon concentrated and renewed the pursuit, firing rapidly but at long range. Soon, however, they began to press the rear more closely, throwing the volunteers into some disorder, which must have grown into a panic but for the coolness and intrepidity of the commander and Maj. Rose. These officers were unceasing in their efforts, constantly moving along the line entreating the volunteers to keep solidly together and preserve unbroken the order of march, and warning them that if any should leave the column and attempt to escape singly or in squads they would certainly lose their scalps. Finally they became steady, and the order of march was preserved unbroken during the remainder of the day. The Indians kept up the pursuit, and occasionally attacked with much vigor, though, as Williamson's force was now moving through the timbered country, the savages no longer held the relative advantage which they had possessed in fighting on the Plains.

The volunteers bivouacked that night (June 6th) on the Sandusky River, about six miles from the battle-field of the afternoon; the enemy's force camped about a mile farther to the rear. Unusual

[2] This battle of Olentangy was fought on a plain about five miles southeast of Bucyrus, Ohio.

[3] Before the fight Maj. Williamson addressed his men, telling them that the only possible chance they had of escaping death and probably torture was to stand solidly together and fight with the determination never to yield; that if they should break and endeavor to save themselves by flight there would be but faint hope that any of them would ever again see their homes. The aide-de-camp, Maj. Rose, rode along the line, cheering the men by his own coolness and apparent confidence. "Stand to your ranks," he cried, in clear, ringing tones, and with his slightly foreign accent; "take steady aim, fire low, and waste not a single shot! Be steady, steady, for all our lives depend upon it!" These admonitions from their officers, and the evident hopelessness of escape by flight, caused them to stand firm, resolved to fight to the last, with no thought of surrender.

[4] The loss of the volunteers in this fight was three killed and eight wounded; that of the enemy was not known, but must have been much greater.

precautions were taken by Maj. Williamson to guard against a surprise during the night, and at the first streakings of dawn on the 7th the men fell in to resume the march; but hardly had the column been formed when the Indians came up and opened fire upon the rear. A lively skirmish followed, in which two of the men fell into the hands of the savages, but no disorder ensued. The retreat was continued steadily and in good order, and, much to Maj. Williamson's surprise, the Indians suddenly abandoned the pursuit. The last shot from the savages was fired at a point near the present town of Crestline. From there the column moved rapidly on in good order and without molestation, reaching the Muskingum on the 10th, crossing that stream between the ruined Moravian villages of Schoenbrunn and Gnadenhütten, and on the 13th reaching the Mingo Bottom, where they found some of the missing, who had arrived ahead of the column. They crossed the Ohio on the same day and camped for the night on the Virginia side of the river. On the 14th they were disbanded, and returned to their homes after an absence of a little less than four weeks. Maj. Williamson was indefatigable in his attention to the wounded and his efforts to alleviate their suffering. On their arrival on the east bank of the Ohio he took care that every wounded man able to ride should be furnished with a horse and an escort to take him to his home; while those who were too badly hurt to endure that method of removal were by his orders carried on litters to the nearest settlements, where they were nursed and cared for. Through all the trying scenes of the campaign Williamson proved himself a brave, efficient, humane, and prudent officer.[1]

The fearful news of the disaster which had befallen the Sandusky expedition reached the settlements two days before the retreating force under Maj. Williamson arrived at Mingo Bottom. Col. James Marshel had it as early as the 11th of June, by a letter from a fugitive who had left the main body five days before. He (Marshel) at once communicated the intelligence to Gen. Irvine. "This moment," he said, "came to hand the inclosed letter, by which you will learn the unhappy fate of our little Army. What the consequences may be God only knows. I would fondly hope that matters are not quite so bad as they are represented." And he added, "I shall be as expeditious as possible in raising a party of men to secure the retreat across the river should the pursuit be continued so far." The same news which Marshel received came also to Dorsey Pentecost, who immediately rode to the Ohio to meet the retreating volunteers. There he found the main body under Williamson, but there was little of comfort in the tale they brought. On his return home he wrote the president of the Council as follows:[2]

"WASHINGTON COUNTY, June 17th, 1782.

"DR. SIR,—By a person who is now here on his way to the head of Elk, I have Just time to tell you that on the 25th of last month 478, some say 488 men, mounted on Horses, set out under the Command of Col. Crawford for S^{t}. Duskie; they were discovered at the Muskingum, and from there, all the way out, Spies was kept on them; the S^{t}. Duskie people collected the Shawanese & The Light dragoons from the British posts between S^{t}. Duskie and the post at De Trouit, they attacked our people in the plains of S^{t}. Duskie, near the S^{t}. Duskie River, on Tuesday was a week last. The battle continued two days, the first day was very close and hot work, the second day was at long shot only. On the night of the 2^{d} day our people retreated, & the Indians broke in on them in the retreat & routed them; however, about two Hundred stuck together & brought off all the wounded except three, which was left on the ground. The next day the Indians attacked our people in the reare, but was repulsed with Considerable Loss on their side; they then pursued their retreat with Success & unmolested to the Ohio. I met the men at the Mingo Bottom last Wednesday, about thirty-five miles from my House, & Collected the Information I send you.

"There is about 20 wounded (few dangerous) and about half that Number killed; there is a good many missing, amongst which is Col. Crawford, and a number of other valuable men, but as the Scattered party's

[1] On the day when the retreating forces recrossed the Ohio (June 13th), Williamson made an official report of the retreat from Battle Island (not of the entire campaign) to Gen. Irvine, as follows:

"I take this opportunity to make you acquainted with our retreat from Sandusky Plains, June 6th. We were reduced to the necessity of making a forced march through the enemy's lines in the night, much in disorder; but the main body marched round the Shawanese camp, and were lucky enough to escape their fire. They marched the whole night, and the next morning were reinforced by some companies, of which I cannot give a particular account, as they were so irregular and so confused. . . . I must acknowledge myself ever obliged to Maj. Rose for his assistance, both in the field of action and in the camp. His character in our camp is estimable, and his bravery cannot be outdone. Our country must ever be obliged to Gen. Irvine for his favor done on the late expedition. Maj. Rose will give you a particular account of our retreat. I hope your honor will do us the favor to call the officers together and consider the distress of our brave men in this expedition, and the distresses of our country in general. Our dependence is entirely upon you, and we are ready and willing to obey your commands when called upon."

Another and more minute report of the operations was made by Lieut. (otherwise called major) Rose to Gen. Irvine, who transmitted the two reports to Gen. Washington, with the following letter written by himself, and dated June 16th, viz.:

"The inclosed letters—one from Col. Williamson, second in command, and the other from Lieut. Rose, my aide-de-camp—contain all the particulars of this transaction which have yet come to my knowledge. I am of opinion had they reached the Plains in seven days (instead of ten), which might have been done, especially as they were chiefly mounted, they would have succeeded. They should also have pushed the advantage evidently gained at the commencement of the action. They failed in another point which they had my advice and, indeed, positive orders for, viz., to make the last day's march as long as possible and attack the town in the night. But they halted in the evening within nine miles, and fired their rifles at seven in the morning before they marched. These people now seem convinced that they cannot perform as much by themselves as they some time since thought they could; perhaps it is right that they should put more dependence on regular troops. I am sorry I have not more to afford them assistance."

are Coming in daily I have Hopes of them. As the people was much confused when I met them, I could not get that Information requisite; what little I got was from Maj. Ross [Rose], Aid De Campt to Gen. Irwin [Irvine], & who went Aid to Crawford, & I hope the General will give you a particular account, as he will receive it from the Major. I am told that the Indians were much superior to our people and that in the engagement they Suffered greatly, and that Col. Crawford Strongly recommended to return before they got to the Town, alleging that our people were too weak, as the Indians had Early Intelligence of their Coming, but was overruled By the rest of the Officers. . . ."

Having seen how Maj. Williamson with the main body of the troops reached and crossed the Ohio River, let us return to trace the adventures and misfortunes of the brave Col. Crawford, his faithful friend Dr. Knight, and others who had become separated from the column and were struggling on through the wilderness, with dangers surrounding them on every side, in their endeavors to escape from the savages.

When the volunteers commenced their retreat from the battle-field of the 4th and 5th of June, at about nine o'clock in the evening of the last-mentioned day, Col. Crawford rode at the head of the leading division (McClelland's). A very short time afterwards they were attacked by the Delawares and Shawanese, and (as has already been mentioned) the rear divisions left their positions in the line of march and moved away to the right, leaving the front division to extricate itself from its perilous situation. They left in such haste that no little disorder ensued, in which some of the sick and wounded were left behind, though it is believed that all but two were finally saved from the enemy. While the Indian attack on the advance division was in progress, Col. Crawford became anxious concerning his son John, his nephew, William Crawford, and his son-in-law, William Harrison, and rode back to find them or assure himself of their safety, but in this he was unsuccessful. While engaged in the search he was joined by the surgeon, Dr. Knight, whom he requested to remain with and assist him. With this request the doctor readily complied. He thought the missing men were in the front, but as the colonel assured him they were not, the two remained behind a considerable time after the last of the troops had passed on, the commander in the meanwhile expressing himself in terms of indignation at the conduct of the three battalions in disobeying his orders by leaving the line of march and pressing on in their semi-panic, forgetting the care of the sick and wounded, and regardless of everything but their own safety.

After the last of the troops had passed on, and when Crawford and the surgeon found it useless to remain longer, they followed as nearly as they could in the track of the larger column, which, however, by this time was a considerable distance away and lost to view in the darkness. Proceeding rather slowly on (for the colonel's horse had become jaded and nearly worn out by the fatigues of the day), they were soon after overtaken by two stragglers who came up from the rear, one of them being an old man and the other a stripling. Neither of these had seen or knew anything about the two young Crawfords and Harrison.

The colonel and his three companions had not proceeded far when the sound of fire-arms was heard in front of them and not very far away. It was from the attack which the savages made on the rear of the retreating column at the time when a part of it became entangled in the swamp, as has been mentioned. The noise of the firing before them caused Crawford's party to turn their course in a more northerly direction, on which they continued for two or three miles, when, believing that they were clear of the enemy, they turned at nearly a right angle, now facing nearly east, and moving in single file, Indian fashion. At about midnight they reached and crossed the Sandusky River. Near that stream they lost the old man, who had lagged behind, and was probably killed by Indians.

From the Sandusky they continued in an easterly direction, but when morning came they turned more southerly. Early in the day the horses ridden by Col. Crawford and the boy gave out entirely and were left behind. Early in the afternoon they were joined by Capt. Biggs and Lieut. Ashley, the latter mounted on Biggs' horse, and suffering severely from the wounds received in the battle of the 4th. The captain had bravely and generously stood by the wounded lieutenant, and was now marching on foot by his side, resolved to save him if possible, even at the risk of his own life. And a fearful and fatal risk it proved to be.

At almost precisely the time when Biggs and Ashley were found by Col. Crawford's party (about two o'clock P.M. on the 6th of June), the main body of volunteers, under Williamson, were facing to the rear, forming line of battle to meet the attack of the pursuing Indians, as has already been noticed. The distance from the field where the battle was raging to the place where the party of fugitives were at that time was about six miles in a northwest direction. After being joined by Biggs and Ashley, the colonel and his companions moved on slowly (being encumbered by the care of the wounded officer) for about an hour, when their flight was interrupted by the same thunderstorm that burst over the battle-field of Olentangy at the close of the conflict. Being now drenched with the rain, and wearied by their eighteen hours' flight, the commander thought it best to halt, and accordingly they made their night bivouac here,[1] amid the most cheerless surroundings, wet, shivering, and in

Early in the morning of the 7th the party pushed on in nearly the same southeasterly direction, recrossing the Sandusky River. An hour or two after their start they came to a place where a deer had been killed. The best part of the carcass had been cut off and wrapped in the skin of the animal, as if the owner had intended to return and carry it away. This they took possession of and carried with them, as also a tomahawk which lay on the ground near by. A mile or so farther on they saw smoke rising through the trees. Leaving the wounded officer behind, in charge of the boy, the others advanced cautiously towards the fire. They found no person there, but they judged, from the indications, that some of the volunteers had been there, and had left the place only a short time before. Lieut. Ashley was then brought up, and they proceeded to roast the venison which they had captured. As they were about finishing their meal a white man was seen near by, who, on being called to, came up very cautiously, and was recognized by Col. Crawford as one of his own men. He said he was the slayer of the deer, and that he had been frightened away from the carcass by the approach of the colonel and his companions. Food was given him, and after eating he moved on with the party.

About the middle of the afternoon they struck the route of the army's outward march, at a bend in the Sandusky, less than two miles distant from the place where Williamson's force had bivouacked the night before, and where, in the morning of the same day, the pursuing Indians had made their last attack on the retreating column. They were still nearer to the camping-place occupied by the Indians during the previous night, and it is difficult to understand how the practiced eye of Col. Crawford could have failed to discover the proximity of Indians, but it is certain that such was the case, for when Dr. Knight and Capt. Biggs advised him to avoid following the trace, for fear of encountering the enemy, he replied with confidence that there was little danger of it, for the savages would not follow the retreating column after it reached the timbered country, but would abandon the pursuit as soon as they reached the eastern verge of the Plains.

From the point where they struck the trail at the bend of the river, then, they moved on over the route which had been passed by the troops in their outward march. Col. Crawford and Dr. Knight, both on foot, led the way; Capt. Biggs (now riding the doctor's horse) followed some fifteen or twenty rods behind, and in the rear marched the boy and the killer of the deer, both dismounted. In this manner they proceeded along the south side of the river until they came very near the place where Williamson had made his camp of the previous evening. It does not appear that they had yet detected the proximity of an enemy, or that they were using more than ordinary precaution as they traveled. Suddenly, directly in front of Crawford and Knight, and not more than fifty feet from them, three Indians started up in full view. Crawford stood his ground, not attempting to gain cover, but the surgeon instantly took to a tree and raised his piece to fire, but desisted from doing so at the peremptory command of the colonel. Immediately afterwards, however, Capt. Biggs saw the savages and fired, but without effect. One of the Indians came up to Crawford and took him by the hand, while another in like manner advanced and took the hand of the surgeon, at the same time calling him "doctor," for they had previously been acquainted with each other at Fort Pitt.

The Indians told Crawford to order Biggs and Ashley, with the two other men in the rear, to come up and surrender, otherwise they would go and kill them. The colonel complied, calling out to them to advance, but this was disregarded, and all four of them escaped, though Biggs and Ashley were afterwards taken and killed by the savages.

It was a party of the Delawares who captured Col. Crawford and Dr. Knight, and they immediately took their captives to the camp of their chief, Wingenund. The time this occurred was in the afternoon of the 7th of June (Friday), only five days after the army had passed by the same place in its outward march in the highest spirits, and with the brave Crawford riding at its head, happily unconscious of the awful doom which awaited him.

Crawford and Knight remained at the camp of the Delawares for three days. During their stay there (in the evening of Sunday, the 9th) a party of outlying scouts came in, bringing the scalps of Lieut. Ashley and Capt. Biggs, as also the horses which had been ridden by those unfortunate officers. Besides Crawford and Knight, there were nine other white prisoners at the Delaware camp, all half-starved and guarded with the utmost vigilance by the seventeen warriors who composed the war party at the camp. Several of these savages were personally known to Crawford and Knight.

On the morning of the 10th the camp was broken up, and the warriors set out with their prisoners for the Sandusky towns. All of them except Crawford were taken to the old town at Upper Sandusky; but the colonel was taken by a different route to the headquarters of Pomoacan, the great sachem of the Wyandots. There were two reasons for his being sent to that village, one of them being to have him guide his captors over the route by which he and Knight had come, so that they might possibly find the horses which had been left behind, and the other reason being to allow the colonel to see Simon Girty, who was known to be at the Half-King's town. Girty was an old acquaintance of Crawford's, as has been seen, and the latter had a faint hope that by a personal interview with the renegade he might be induced to use his influence with the Indians to save the prisoner's life, or at least to save him from the torture by fire. The hope was a vain and delusive one, as the event proved, but the doomed man in his extremity clung to it as drowning men catch at straws. His savage custodians well knew that he would gain nothing by the interview with Girty, but they granted his request, apparently for the demoniac satisfaction of witnessing the despair and agony of his certain disappointment.

The prisoners bound for the old town arrived there the same evening. Later in the night Crawford and his guards reached Pomoacan's village, where he had the desired interview with Girty, during which he offered the wretch one thousand dollars to interfere and save his life. Girty promised to do what he could, though he had not the slightest intention of keeping his word. He also told the colonel that his nephew, William Crawford, and his son-in-law, William Harrison, had been captured by Shawanese scouts, but that the chiefs of that tribe had decided to spare their lives, the latter portion of his statement being false, as he well knew. But the story, with the promise to intercede in his behalf, had the effect to allay for the time the colonel's worst fears.

On the following morning (June 11th) Crawford was informed that he must go to the old town, to join the other prisoners, so that all could be marched in a body to the village of the Half-King. Under this order he was taken to the upper village, where he arrived about the middle of the forenoon, and there found the main body of the white prisoners, including Dr. Knight, and the Delaware chiefs, Pipe and Wingenund, who had come there at an earlier hour in the morning. Here the hopes which had been raised in Crawford's mind by the promise of Girty were suddenly extinguished when Wingenund approached him and painted his face black. The hypocritical chief,[1] while he was performing the ominous operation, professed to be extremely glad to see the colonel, and assured him that he was to be adopted as an Indian; but Crawford was not deceived by this dissimulation, for he well knew that when the Indians painted the face of a prisoner black it meant but one thing,—that the person so marked had been doomed to death. All the other prisoners, including Dr. Knight, had previously been painted black by the implacable Delaware, Capt. Pipe.

A little later in the day the whole party of prisoners, under their Indian guards, moved out from the old town and took the trail down the river. Col. Crawford and Dr. Knight (who were regarded by the Indians as their principal prizes) were marched some distance in the rear of the others, and were kept in charge by no less personages than the chiefs Wingenund and Pipe. They had not proceeded far from the village before they passed the corpse of one of the prisoners who preceded them. A little farther on they saw another, then another and another, four in all, killed by their guards only a few minutes before, and all bearing the bloody marks made by the scalping-knife.

They had supposed that their destination was the town of the Wyandot sachem, Pomoacan, but their hearts sank within them[2] when, at the Big Springs, on the present site of Upper Sandusky, the Indians left the trail leading to the Wyandot headquarters and took that leading to the villages of the Delawares. On this trail they proceeded in a northwesterly course until they reached Little Tymochtee Creek, where Crawford and Knight, with their guards, overtook the other surviving prisoners, only five in number. Here several squaws and young Indians were met, and all the prisoners were halted and made to sit on the ground. The object of this movement became apparent when, a few minutes later, the five prisoners were set upon by the squaws and boys, who tomahawked and scalped them all. One of these five was John McKinley, of Washington County, whose scalped head they cut off and rolled about on the ground. The Indian boys took the warm and bloody scalps and repeatedly dashed them into the faces of Crawford and Knight, who had also been seated on the ground a short distance away from, but in full view of, the butchery.

Of the prisoners who had set out from the old town only Crawford and Knight now remained. The march was resumed on the trail to Pipe's town, the two prisoners being now separated and made to walk a hundred yards or more apart. On their way they were met by Simon Girty on horseback and accompanied by several Indians. Girty spoke to Crawford and also to Knight, heaping upon the latter the vilest epithets and abuse. As the party moved on they were met by many Indians, all of whom maltreated the prisoners, striking them with clubs and beating them with their fists. About the middle of the afternoon the party with their dejected captives arrived at a piece of bottom-land on the east bank of Ty-

[1] The treacherous Wingenund was well acquainted with Col. Crawford, had always professed great friendship for him, and had more than once been entertained by the colonel at his house on the Youghiogheny. Capt. Pipe was also acquainted with Crawford.

[2] The Wyandots had advanced much farther on the road towards civilization than had the Delawares or Shawanese, and not only had they, long before that time, wholly abandoned the practice of burning their prisoners, but they discountenanced the horrid custom among the other tribes. The prisoners, knowing this, had consequently regarded it as a sign in their favor that they were to be taken to the home of the Wyandot sachem, but when they found that they had been deceived, and that their real destination was the towns of the cruel Delawares, they knew too well that mercy was not to be expected. The fact was that Pipe and Wingenund, being fully determined to inflict the fire torture on Crawford and Knight, had recourse to stratagem and deceit to obtain from the Half-King, Pomoacan, his consent to the commission of the barbarity, for, as the Wyandots were more powerful than they, and in fact masters of that section of the Indian country, they dared not do the dreadful deed without the consent of the Wyandot sagamore, and that consent they knew could never be obtained if their request was accompanied by a straightforward statement of their real intentions.

mochtee Creek, where a halt was made, and it became at once apparent that with this halt, the journeying of one at least of the prisoners was ended. Crawford and Knight were still separated, and were not again allowed to hold any conversation together. Knight was in charge of a peculiarly villanous-looking Indian named Tutelu, who had been made his special guard, and who was to take him on the following day to the Shawanese towns, which had been decided on as the place where he was to be put to death.

The spot where the party halted on the banks of the Tymochtee was the place[1] where Col. Crawford was to die. It had been fully and finally decided by the chiefs that he should suffer death by the torture of fire, and as all the barbarous preparations had been made there was but little delay before the commencement of the infernal orgie. The fatal stake had already been set, and fires of hickory sticks were burning in a circle around it. About forty Indian men and twice that number of squaws and young Indians were waiting to take part in the torturing of the unfortunate prisoners.

Immediately on his arrival the colonel was stripped naked and made to sit on the ground, with his hands firmly bound together and tied behind him. Then the yelling, screeching crowd fell upon him and beat him without mercy until he was exhausted and covered with blood. When they had tired of this the victim was dragged to the centre of the fiery circle preparatory to the last act in the hellish drama. A rope had previously been tied around the stake near its foot, and now the other end of it was made fast to the cord with which his wrists were bound together. The rope was some six or eight feet in length, allowing him to pass two or three times around the stake. He could also sit or lie down at will.

The infamous Simon Girty was present, and remained there during all the dreadful proceedings which followed. When Crawford was led to the stake he called out to the renegade (who stood among the foremost in the ring of savage spectators), asking him if they had determined to burn him to death, and upon Girty's unfeeling reply in the affirmative he replied that if so he would try to endure it with patience and die like a soldier and Christian. Then the vindictive Capt. Pipe addressed the savages with violent gesticulations, and at the close of his speech the assembled barbarians applauded with wild delight, whilst some of the crowd rushed in upon the prisoner and cut off both of his ears.[2]

As a prelude to the still more terrible tortures that were to follow, the Indians closed in on the miserable man and fired charges of powder into his unprotected body. More than fifty times was this repeated, and the pain thus inflicted could scarcely have been less than that produced by the flames. After this satanic procedure was concluded the fires (which up to this time had been burning but slowly) were replenished with fresh fuel, and as the heat grew more intense, and the sufferings of the victim became more and more excruciating, the joy and shouting of the red devils rose higher and higher.

Burning at the stake is universally regarded as among the most terrible tortures that human cruelty can inflict. But the Delaware chiefs had prepared for the brave Crawford an agony more intense and protracted than that of the licking flames,—they roasted him alive! The fires were placed at a distance of some fifteen feet from the stake, and within that dreadful circle for three and a half hours he suffered an almost inconceivable physical torment, which death would have terminated in one-tenth part the time if the fagots had been piled close around him.

As the fires burned down the Indians seized burning brands and threw them at the victim, until all the space which his tether allowed him was thickly strewn with coals and burning embers, on which his naked feet must tread as he constantly moved around the stake and back in the delirium of his pain. To intensify and prolong the torture the savages applied every means that their infernal ingenuity could suggest, and which to describe or even to think of fills the mind with sickening horror.

To Simon Girty, who was in prominent view among the savage throng,[3] Crawford called out in the extremity of his agony, begging the wretch to end his misery by sending a ball through his heart. To this appeal Girty replied, sneeringly, that he had no gun, at the same time uttering a brutal laugh of derision and pleasure at the hideous spectacle. If, as tradition has it, he had once been repelled in his attempted addresses to the colonel's beautiful daughter, Sally Crawford, he was now enjoying the satisfaction of a terrible revenge on her miserable father, for the indignity.

Through it all, the brave man bore up with as much fortitude as is possible to weak human nature, frequently praying to his Heavenly Father for the mercy which was denied him on earth. Towards the last, being evidently exhausted, he ceased to move around the stake and lay down, face downwards, upon the ground. The fires being now well burned down, the savages rushed in on him, beat him with the glowing brands, heaped coals upon his body, and scalped him.

[1] The spot where Col. Crawford met his horrible death is on a piece of slightly rising ground in the creek bottom, as above mentioned, a short distance northeast of the village of Crawfordsville, Wyandot Co., Ohio.

[2] This statement is made in the narrative of Dr. Knight, who, after witnessing the dreadful scenes of Col. Crawford's murder, made his escape (as will be mentioned in succeeding pages) and wrote an account of the events of the expedition. That narrative and the report of Maj. Rose, the aide-de-camp, furnish the facts on which this and other reliable accounts of Crawford's campaign are based.

[3] It has been stated in some accounts of the death of Col. Crawford that the British captain, Matthew Elliott, was also present during the dreadful scenes of the torture. It may have been so, but the statement has never been fully substantiated, and there are serious doubts of its authenticity.

Once more he arose, bloody, blinded, and crisped, and tottered once or twice around the stake, then fell to rise no more. Again the barbarians applied burning brands, and heaped live coals on his scalped head, but he was fast becoming insensible to pain, his end was near, and after a few more vain attempts by the savages to inflict further torments, death came to the rescue and the spirit of William Crawford was free.

It was on the 11th of June, at about four o'clock in the afternoon, that the torture commenced. The end came just as the sun was sinking behind the tops of the trees that bordered the bottom-lands of the Tymochtee. Then the savages heaped the brands together on the charred and swollen body and burned it to a cinder, dancing around the spot for hours, yelling and whooping in a wild frenzy of demoniac exultation.

It will be recollected that Dr. Knight was brought from the Indian old town to the place of torture on the Tymochtee with Col. Crawford, though the two were kept apart and not allowed to converse together. The doctor remained a horrified spectator of the burning of his superior officer until near the time of his death. On his arrival at the place Knight was fallen upon by the Indians and cruelly beaten. While Crawford was in the midst of his greatest suffering Simon Girty came to where Knight was sitting and told him that he too must prepare for the same ordeal, and he need have no hope of escaping death by torture, though he would not suffer at the same place, but would be removed to the Shawanese towns to be burned. Soon after an Indian came to him and struck him repeatedly in the face with the bloody scalp which had just been torn from Crawford's head. Towards the end of the diabolical scene, but while Crawford was yet living, Knight was taken away and marched to Capt. Pipe's house, some three-fourths of a mile distant, where he remained during the night, securely bound, and closely guarded by the Indian Tutelu, who had him in his especial charge.

In the morning (June 12th) his guard unbound him, and having again painted him with black, started out on horseback, driving Knight before him on foot, bound for the Shawanese towns, where the doctor was to suffer the torture. Passing by the spot where Crawford had suffered on the previous day, they saw all that remained of the colonel, a few burned bones, when the Indian told his horrified prisoner that this was his "big captain." They moved on towards the southwest, on the trail to the Shawanese town of Wapatomica, nearly forty miles away.

Knight had not wholly abandoned the hope of escaping the torture, though his case looked wellnigh hopeless. He carried as cheerful a countenance as he could, concealed from his guard his knowledge of the import of the black paint on his face, and conversed with him as well as he could, pretending that he expected to be adopted into the Shawanese tribe on arrival at their destination. Tutelu asked him if he knew how to build a wigwam, and Knight assured him that he was excellent at that business. All this pleased the Indian, and to some extent threw him off his guard. The journey of the first day was about twenty-five miles. At the night camp Tutelu again bound his captive, and watched him closely through the night, so that the doctor, although he tried hard to free himself, did not succeed.

At daybreak Tutelu rose, stretched his limbs, unbound his captive, and renewed the fire, but did not immediately prepare to resume the journey. They had been greatly tormented by gnats during the night, and the doctor asked him if he should make a smudge in their rear to drive the pests away. Tutelu told him to do so, whereupon Knight took two sticks (one of them about a foot and a half in length, which was the largest he could find), and holding a coal between them carried it behind the Indian as if to start the smudge, but as soon as he had got the right position suddenly turned and dealt the savage a blow over the head with all his strength, partially stunning him and knocking him forward head first into the fire. His hands were badly burned, but he immediately recovered himself, rose, and ran away, uttering a hideous yell.[1] The doctor seized the Indian's gun and followed him, determined to kill him; but in his eagerness he broke or disarranged the lock of the piece, so that he could not fire. This being the case he followed only a short distance, and then returned to the place where they had passed the night.

Here the surgeon lost no time in making preparations for a desperate attempt to effect his escape from the Indian country. He possessed himself of Tutelu's ammunition, his blanket, and an extra pair of moccasins, and without delay commenced his long journey, taking a course about east by north. All day he traveled without molestation or notable incident, and at night had emerged from the timbered country and entered the Plains, where he made his lonely bivouac. But he was too uneasy and anxious to remain long, and so after two or three hours' rest resumed his way, and traveling all night, guided by the stars, had crossed the open country and entered the forest to the east before daylight appeared. During this day (June 14th) he struck the track of the troops on their outward march, but having already received a severe lesson on the danger of following this he avoided it and took a north course, which he kept during the rest of the day. That night he camped in the forest and slept undisturbed.

The next morning he shaped his course due east, and moved on with greatly lightened spirits but exceedingly weak from lack of food. He could shoot no game, for his utmost endeavors failed to put the lock of his gun into working condition, and finding at last that it was useless to make further attempts, and that the piece could be only an encumbrance to him, he threw it away. He caught a small turtle, and occasionally succeeded in taking young birds, all of which he ate raw. In this way, and by making use of nourishing roots and herbs, he succeeded in sustaining life through all the weary days of his journey to civilization. As he traveled eastward he found heavier timber, and saw everywhere great quantities of game, which was very tantalizing, as he could not kill or catch any, although nearly famished.

[1] Tutelu fled to the village of the Delawares, and was seen on his arrival by John Slover, who was then a captive there. He (Tutelu) reported the loss of his prisoner, with whom he said he had a hard battle, and had given the doctor fearful and probable fatal knife-wounds in the back and stomach, although (as he said) Knight was a man of immense proportions and physical power. Slover told the Delawares that this was false, and that the doctor was a weak, puny man, whereat the Indians ridiculed Tutelu without mercy.

For twenty days from the time of his escape from his guard Tutelu, Dr. Knight traveled on through the wilderness, unmolested by savages, but suffering terribly of hunger and cold,—for he had not the means of making a fire,—and on the evening of July 3d struck the Ohio River about five miles below the mouth of Beaver. On the 5th he arrived safely at Fort Pitt,[1] where he remained as surgeon of the Seventh Virginia Regiment until after the declaration of peace.

John Slover, one of the guides of the expedition, was one of those who were captured by the Indians and condemned to the torture, but almost miraculously escaped. On the evening of the 5th of June, when the forces of Col. Crawford commenced their retreat from Battle Island, and the combined Delawares and Shawanese attacked the advanced battalion under Maj. McClelland, it will be recollected that the three other divisions precipitately abandoned the line of march and moved away on a route diverging to the west, and that soon afterwards the head of the column marched by mistake into a bog or swamp, where a number of the volunteers lost their horses by reason of their becoming mired in the soft muddy soil. Among those who were thus dismounted were the guide, Slover, James Paull (afterwards sheriff of Fayette County), and five others, who then kept together in a party and attempted to make their escape through the woods. They traveled on in safety until the 8th, when, at about nine o'clock in the forenoon, they fell into an ambuscade of Shawanese Indians, who had followed their trail from the Plains. The savages fired on them, and two of the men fell. Paull ran for his life and made his escape, but Slover and two other men were taken prisoners and conducted back to the Shawanese towns on Mad River, which they reached on the 11th of June. On their arrival they were received by an Indian crowd such as always collected on such an occasion, and were made to "run the gauntlet" between two files of squaws and boys for a distance of some three hundred yards to the council-house. One of the men had been painted black (though why the Indians had thus discriminated against this man does not appear), and he was made a special target for the abuse and blows of the barbarous gang. He reached the door of the council-house barely alive, but was then pulled back and beaten and mangled to death, his body cut in pieces, and these stuck on poles about the village.

Slover and the other man ran the gauntlet without fatal or very serious injury, but the latter was sent away the same evening to another village, and no more was heard of him. As to Slover, he was kept at the village for two weeks, during which time councils were held daily and war-dances every night, to all of which he was invited and most of which he attended.[2] The Indians also assigned to him a squaw as a companion, with whom he lived in comparative freedom during his stay at the village.[3] Finally a council was held, at which it was decided that he should be put to death by torture.

The next day "about forty warriors, accompanied by George Girty, an adopted Delaware, a brother of Simon and James Girty,[4] came early in the morning round the house where Slover was. He was sitting before the door. The squaw gave him up. They put a rope around his neck, tied his arms behind his back, stripped him naked, and blacked him in the usual manner. Girty, as soon as he was tied, cursed him, telling him he would get what he had many years deserved. Slover was led to a town about five miles away, to which a messenger had been dispatched to desire them to prepare to receive them. Arriving at the town, he was beaten with clubs and the pipe-ends of their tomahawks, and was kept for some time tied to a tree before a house-door. In the mean time the inhabitants set out for another town about two miles distant, where Slover was to be burnt, and where he arrived about three o'clock in the afternoon. They were now at Mac-a-chack, not far from the present site of West Liberty, in Logan County. Here there was

[1] In a letter from Gen. Irvine to President Moore, dated Fort Pitt, July 5, 1782, he says, "This moment Doctor Knight has arrived, the surgeon I sent with the volunteers to Sandusky; he was several days in the hands of the Indians, but fortunately made his escape from his keeper, who was conducting him to another settlement to be bound [burned]. He brings the disagreeable account that Col. Crawford and all the rest (about twelve, to the doctor's knowledge) who fell into his [their] hands were burned to death in a most shocking manner; the unfortunate colonel in particular was upwards of four hours burning. The reason they assign for this uncommon barbarity is retaliation for the Moravian affair. The doctor adds that he understood those people had laid aside their religious principles and have gone to war; that he saw two of them bring in scalps who he formerly knew."—Penn. Archives, 1781–83, p. 576.

[2] Having previously lived much among the Indians, Slover was well acquainted with their language, and spoke it, particularly the Miami and Shawanese dialects, with great fluency.

[3] "There was one council at which Slover was not present. The warriors had sent for him as usual, but the squaw with whom he lived would not suffer him to go, but hid him under a large quantity of skins. It may have been done that Slover might not hear the determination she feared would be arrived at, to burn him."—Butterfield.

[4] James and George Girty, as well as Capt. Matthew Elliott, of the British service, were present at the Shawanese town, and took part in the Indian councils before mentioned.

a council-house also, as at Wapatomica,[1] but only a part of it was covered. In the part without a roof was a post about sixteen feet in height. Around this, at a distance of about four feet, were three piles of wood about three feet high. Slover was brought to the post, his arms again tied behind him, and the thong or cord with which they were bound was fastened to it. A rope was also put about his neck and tied to the post about four feet above his head. While they were tying him the wood was kindled and began to flame. Just then the wind began to blow, and in a very short time the rain fell violently. The fire, which by this time had begun to blaze considerably, was instantly extinguished. The rain lasted about a quarter of an hour."[2]

The savages were amazed at this result, and perhaps regarded it as an interposition of the Great Spirit on behalf of the prisoner. They finally decided to allow him to remain alive until morning, when, as they said, they would recommence the torture, and devote the whole day to it. He was then unbound, and made to sit on the ground, where he was beaten, kicked, and otherwise maltreated by the Indians, who continued dancing round him and yelling till nearly midnight. Three guards were then detailed to watch him during the rest of the night; he was again bound and taken to a house, where a rope was fastened about his neck and tied to a beam of the house. His guards kept awake taunting him about the torture he was to endure until towards morning, when two of them fell asleep, and not long afterwards the other followed their example. Soon they were all asleep, and when he was entirely sure that they were so Slover commenced attempts to unbind himself. He had comparatively little difficulty in slipping the cords from one of his wrists, which left him at liberty to work at the rope around his neck. This he found much more securely tied, and he began to despair of loosening it, as the daylight had begun to appear and the Indians would soon be on the alert. At last, however, he succeeded in untying the knots, and rose from his painful position, free, but still in the greatest danger of discovery.

Stepping softly over the sleeping warriors, he quickly left the house, and ran through the village into a corn-field. Near by he saw several Indian horses grazing, and having with no little difficulty caught one of these, using the rope with which he had been bound as a halter, he mounted and rode away, first slowly, then more rapidly, and finally with all the speed of which the animal was capable. No alarm had yet been given in the village, and he had therefore reason to believe that the Indians were still ignorant of his escape.

Slover forced the horse to his utmost speed for a long time, but gradually his pace slackened and grew slower and slower until about two o'clock in the afternoon, when, finding it impossible to urge him beyond a walking gait, he dismounted, left the animal, and pushed on on foot. He had heard the distant hallooing of Indians behind him, showing him that he was pursued, but he kept on, using every precaution to cover his trail as he proceeded. No Indians appeared, and he traveled on without a moment's stop until ten o'clock at night, when, being very sick and vomiting, he halted to rest for two hours. At midnight the moon rose, and he proceeded on, striking a trail, which he kept till daylight, and then, as a measure of precaution, left it, and struck through the woods along a ridge at a right angle from his previous course. This he continued for about fifteen miles, and then changed to what he judged to be his true course. From this point he met with no specially notable adventure. On the third day he reached the Muskingum, on the next he reached and crossed the Stillwater, and in the evening of the fifth day of his flight he camped within five miles of Wheeling. Up to this time he had not closed his eyes in sleep since he left his cabin and squaw companion at Wapatomica. Early on the following morning he came to the Ohio River opposite the island at Wheeling, and seeing a man on the other side, called to him, and finally induced him to come across and take him over in his canoe, though at first he was very suspicious and unwilling to cross to the west shore. On the 10th of July Slover reached Fort Pitt.

As the volunteers who marched with Col. Crawford to Sandusky were during the campaign regularly in the service under the orders of the general commanding the Western Department, there were of course muster-rolls of the several companies showing the names of all their members; but no such rolls are now known to be in existence. In the absence of these and of any unofficial list of those who composed the force under Crawford, very few names are now known of Washington County men who marched with the expedition to Sandusky. A few, known as residents of this county, have been incidentally mentioned in the preceding narrative of the campaign, and the names of some others (but not many) have been gathered from different sources. Among them are those of John Canon, of Canonsburg, David Steele, of Peters township, Isaac Cox, James and Hugh Workman, of Amwell township, and William Huston, of Washington, all of whom returned from Sandusky in safety. In one account it is stated that William Huston never returned; but this is proved to be incorrect by an affidavit which is found, made by William Huston before Justice Samuel Shannon in 1798. John Campbell, William Nimmons, and William Johnson volunteered from this county, and marched with the expeditionary forces from the Mingo Bottom to the Sandusky Plains, but did not come back with the fugitives from the scene of disaster, and were never again heard of in the settlements. The names of these men, as volunteers from Washington County, were given by William Darby, whose statement has been published by De Hass, Butterfield,[1] and other writers upon the subject of Crawford's ill-starred enterprise.

The names of a few others who enrolled themselves with the volunteers who marched from Washington County in the memorable campaign of 1782 against the Wyandot towns are found in the minutes of the Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania, referring to awards made some years afterwards in reimbursement for losses sustained by various persons in that campaign. Such of the entries in those minutes as have reference to residents of Washington County[2] are given below (names of such as are known to have been residents of Westmoreland being omitted), viz.:

"In Council.

"PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 7, 1785.

"The comptroller-general's reports upon the following accounts against the State for losses sustained, etc., upon the Indian expedition of 1782, under the direction of Colonel William Crawford, were read and approved, viz.:

". . . Twelve pounds to James Alexander; . . . six pounds four shillings and five pence to Noble Graham; six pounds to Samuel Dualls; thirteen pounds to John Dean; seven shillings and sixpence to Samuel Cane; seven pounds to Richard Clark; . . . fifteen pounds to Louis Heming; . . . and sixteen pounds to Joseph Barker.

"January 10, 1785, . . . thirteen pounds to James Woods; eight pounds ten shillings to Jacob Van Kirk; thirty pounds to James Nicholl; . . . four pounds nineteen shillings and sixpence to Joseph Parish; . . . sixteen pounds to Jacob South; ten pounds to Jacob Schwartz; . . . five pounds sixteen shillings and three pence to John Lucas; . . . five pounds to Alexander McDonald; . . . four pounds ten shillings to Robert Jackson; fifteen pounds to William Case; fifteen pounds to Aaron Rollins; eleven pounds to Lewis Duvall; three pounds eight shillings to Charles Burdin; . . . six pounds ten shillings to Dennis Stevens.

"March 2, 1785.—Accounts approved of Craig Ritchie and Andrew Munro, for horses lost on the Sandusky expedition. Of the aforesaid Craig Ritchie, four rations due from the 20th of May to the 20th of June, 1782.

"August 30, 1785.—The comptroller-general's report upon the accounts of William Shearer, of the county of Washington, for a horse lost on the Sandusky expedition, was read and approved.

"September 15, 1785.—Upon the account of James Scott, for a horse, blanket, etc., lost on the Sandusky expedition.

"September 21, 1785.—Of Peter Peterson, for rations due on the Sandusky expedition. Of Henry Taylor, for thirty days' rations furnished John Blean upon the aforesaid expedition. Note.—All the (3) three persons above named are inhabitants of Washington County.

"December 31, 1785.—Of Richard Graham, for a horse lost on the Sandusky expedition.

"April 19, 1786.—Of Hugh Sprouls, of the county of Washington, for a horse lost on the Sandusky expedition.

"Of Joseph Brown, of said county, for rations furnished to the militia employed on the said expedition. Of Thomas Brown, of said county, for rations furnished as aforesaid.

"December 8, 1789.—Of George Tompoh, for his provisions, while employed as a militiaman on the frontiers of Washington County, and for a blanket, a pack-saddle, and two bags lost on the (said) expedition under Colonel Crawford, in 1782, amounting to two pounds seven shillings and sixpence.

"Of John Hill, for a saddle, blanket, two bags, and a wallet or pack lost on the said expedition, amounting to four pounds two shillings and sixpence.

"Of Robert Taylor, for thirty days' provisions due him while employed on said expedition, amounting to one pound two and sixpence. Of Richard Hopkins, for a horse lost on the said expedition, amounting to four pounds.

"Of John Turvey, for thirty days' provisions due to him while employed on said expedition, amounting to one pound two shillings and sixpence.

"December 17, 1789.—Of Robert Walker, Jr., of Washington County, for provisions furnished by him for the Sandusky expedition, under Colonel Crawford, in the year 1782, amounting to one pound two shillings and sixpence.

"February 18, 1790.—Of Alexander Lashley, for a horse which was taken into public service and lost on the Sandusky expedition against the Indians, under Colonel Crawford, in the year 1782, valued at twelve pounds, and allowed.

"August 28, 1790.—Of Moses Cook, for a horse which was lost on the Sandusky expedition against the Indians, in 1782, amounting to fifteen pounds.

"September 6, 1790.—Of the estate of James Guffee, for a horse which was lost on the Sandusky expedition against the Indians, in 1782, amounting to fourteen pounds."

Proposed Second Sandusky Expedition.—It has been mentioned that a number of fugitives from the disordered forces of Col. Crawford reached the Ohio River considerably in advance of the main body in its retreat under command of Williamson. These stragglers immediately returned to their homes, and spread through the frontier settlements the most alarming and exaggerated reports[3] of the disaster

[1] Butterfield, in his "Historical Account of the Expedition Against Sandusky," quotes Darby's account, as follows:

"From the fort [the stockade inclosing the house of Jacob Wolfe, in what is now Buffalo township, Washington County] my parents removed to Catfish [Washington], and spent the residue of 1782, and to April, 1783, on the farm of Alexander Reynolds, recently owned by Dr. F. J. Lemoyne. On this farm we were living when . . . the militia army were defeated under Colonel William Crawford . . . James and Hugh Workman were both in that expedition, and I fancy I see the two women now when James Reynolds came running to my mother, exclaiming, 'Jamy Workman is killed!' James Workman, who was a married man, was not killed, but returned to his family and lived many years afterwards. A like report came in regard to Hugh, and happily proved untrue, to the great joy of his betrothed wife, Peggy Bryson, living then with her brother-in-law, Thomas Nichol. John Campbell, of Pigeon Creek, was killed in the action." Butterfield then proceeds:

"The brothers Workman were in the same company when the army on its outward march left Mingo Bottom; but when Crawford selected his company of light-horse, Hugh joined it, leaving his brother James in the ranks of the mounted infantry. James was twenty-five and Hugh twenty-three years of age when they joined the Sandusky expedition. The former applied for a pension fifty years after, and was successful. Both were then living (1833) in Amwell township, Washington County." James Workman was one of those who became separated from the main body of Crawford's forces in the night of June 5, 1782, and while he and another man in the same condition were making their way through the woods in their attempt to escape, they met Nicholas Dawson, of Westmoreland County (one of the volunteers), who had mistaken his course and was heading towards Sandusky, thus running directly into danger instead of escaping from it. They tried to convince him that he was wrong, but he obstinately insisted that he was not. Finding it impossible to persuade him to change his course, they at last told him that as he would certainly be taken by the Indians if he kept on, and as it was better for him to die by the hands of white men than to be tortured by savages, they were determined to shoot him then and there unless he consented to turn his course and go with them. This was an unanswerable argument, and Dawson finally yielded to it, though with a very bad grace. He changed his route, joined company with the two men, and so succeeded in making his escape, and arrived in safety at his home beyond the Monongahela.

[2] The greater part of those named are known to have been inhabitants of the county of Washington. It is not unlikely that some are included who were not such, but they are certainly very few.

[3] The earliest reports which obtained currency were to the effect that the army of Crawford was almost annihilated, and that the Indians were pursuing them to the Ohio, and would doubtless cross the river and carry rapine and desolation through the border settlements. The fact was which had befallen the expedition. These reports not only caused great grief and extreme anxiety for the fate of relatives and friends who were with Crawford's forces, but the wildest consternation also, for it was feared and believed that the victorious savages—red and white—would soon be across the Ohio, and would carry devastation and butchery eastward to the Monongahela, if not to the base of Laurel Hill. When the grief and anxiety of the people was to a great extent allayed by the return of the volunteers, and the consequent discovery that the disaster was by no means as overwhelming as had at first been reported, the dread of Indian invasion still remained, and the bold frontiersmen, discarding the idea of waiting for the coming of the foe, and then merely standing on the defensive, began at once to urge the forming of a new expedition to carry the war into the heart of the Indian country, and to prosecute it to the point of extermination, or at least to the destruction of the Wyandot, Delaware, and Shawanese towns, for they believed that in no other way could security be had for the settlements along the border. It was the wish of the leading spirits—such men as Williamson, Marshel, and Col. Cook, of Westmoreland—that the proposed expedition should be made as strong numerically as possible, that it should include besides volunteers from the militia of Washington and Westmoreland Counties as many regular Continental troops as could be spared from Fort Pitt, and that it should be commanded by Gen. Irvine in person.

The first proposition communicated to the commandant at Fort Pitt for a new Indian campaign appears to have been that of two captains of Westmoreland militia (Robert Beall and Thomas Moore),[1] who joined in a letter to Gen. Irvine, dated June 23d, in which they said, "The unfortunate miscarriage of the late expedition, the common interest of our country, and the loss of our friends induce us to be thus forward in proposing another. . . . We do not wish to be understood as giving our own private sentiments, but of those of the people generally in our quarter, for which purpose we are authorized to address you, and from accounts well authenticated we assure you it is the wish of the people on this side the Monongahela River" without a dissenting voice.

In his reply to Beall and Moore (dated June 26th) Gen. Irvine said, "Inclination as well as duty is a continual spur to me not only to acquiesce in but to encourage every measure adopted for the public good. Your proposals on this occasion are so truly patriotic and spirited that I should look on myself unpardonable were I to pass them unnoticed." In a letter of the same date, addressed to Col. Edward Cook, lieutenant of Westmoreland County, Irvine said, "Your people seem so much in earnest that I am led to think, if other parts of the country are so spirited and patriotic, something may probably be done, but as it will take some time to come to a proper knowledge of this matter, and that must be accurately done, there can be no harm in making the experiment. . . . I have no intimation of any plan being on foot in Washington County for this purpose, though it is said the people wish another expedition."

The manner in which it was proposed to form the new expedition and carry it to a successful issue is indicated in a letter written by Irvine to the Secretary of War, Gen. Lincoln, on the 1st of July, from which the following extracts are made:

"The disaster has not abated the ardor or desire for revenge (as they term it) of these people.[2] A number of the most respectable are urging me strenuously to take command of them, and add as many Continental officers and soldiers as can be spared, particularly officers, as they attribute the defeat to the want of experience in their officers. They cannot nor will not rest under any plan on the defensive, however well executed, and think their only safety depends on the total destruction of all the Indian settlements within two hundred miles; this, it is true, they are taught by dear-bought experience.

"They propose to raise by subscription six or seven hundred men, provisions for them for forty days, and horses to carry it, clear of expense to the public, unless government at its own time shall think proper to reimburse them. The 1st of August they talk of assembling, if I think proper to encourage them. I am by no means fond of such commands, nor am I sanguine in my expectations, but rather doubtful of the consequences; and yet absolutely to refuse having anything to do with them, when their proposals are so generous and seemingly spirited, I conceive would not do well either, especially as people too generally, particularly in this quarter, are subject to be clamorous and to charge Continental officers with want of zeal, activity, and inclination of doing the needful for their protection. I have declined giving them an immediate, direct answer, and have informed them that my going depends on circumstances, and in the mean time I have called for returns of the men who may be depended on to go, and the subscriptions of provisions and horses. The distance to headquarters is so great that it is uncertain whether an express could return in time with the commander-in-chief's instructions.

that, including all those killed in battle, those who afterwards died of wounds, those who suffered death at the hands of their savage captors, and those who were missing and never heard from, the total loss sustained by Crawford's forces was less than seventy-five men.

[1] Beall and Moore were neighbors of the unfortunate Col. Crawford. This fact probably increased their zeal and desire for retaliation upon the Indians.

[2] The general, it seems, had somewhat changed his mind concerning the temper of the people since the 16th of June, when, in his report of the Crawford expedition to Gen. Washington, he said,—

"These people now seem convinced that they cannot perform as much by themselves as they some time since thought they could; perhaps it is right that they should put more dependence on regular troops. . . ."

"As you must know whether any movements will take place in this quarter, or if you are of the opinion it would on any account be improper for me to leave the post, I request you would please to write me by express. But if no answer arrives before or about the 1st of August, I shall take for granted you have no objections, and that I may act discretionally. Should it be judged expedient for me to go, the greatest number of troops fit to march will not exceed one hundred. The militia are pressing that I shall take all the Continentals along, and leave the defense of the fort to them; but this I shall by no means do. If circumstances should seem to require it, I shall throw in a few militia with those regulars left, but under Continental officers."

On the same day, July 1st, Gen. Irvine wrote Gen. Washington, informing him of the plan for a second expedition to Sandusky, but saying that he should not think of proceeding with the campaign without express orders from the commander-in-chief. "By the best information I can obtain," he added, "we may lay out our accounts to have to fight the Shawanese, Delawares, Wyandots, Mingoes, and Monseys, in all about five hundred. They are all settled in a line from Lower Sandusky near Lake Erie to the head of the Miami, not more than seventy-five miles from the two extremes; Upper Sandusky lies near the centre. If all these could be beat at once, it would certainly nearly, if not entirely, put an end to the Indian war in this quarter."

There were good grounds for the alarm felt by the people west of the Monongahela, for a few days after the return of the volunteers from the Sandusky expedition the Indians appeared in large numbers along the west bank of the Ohio, their main force being concentrated at Mingo Bottom, with smaller parties at various points on both sides of the river, but closely and constantly watched by detachments of the militia of Washington County. The settlers between the Ohio and Monongahela Rivers were almost in a state of panic. On the 30th of June Col. John Evans (lieutenant of the Virginia county of Monongalia), whose home was in that part of Washington County which afterwards became Greene, wrote Gen. Irvine informing him of the presence of Indian war parties in his vicinity, and adding, "Without your assistance I much fear our settlements will break. The defeat of Col. Crawford occasions much dread."

On the 2d of July, Col. Marshel wrote Gen. Irvine, giving information of the alarming situation of affairs on the Ohio border, and reporting to the general that he had sent Col.[1] Williamson with a detachment to Cox's fort, about four miles below Mingo Bottom, on the Virginia side of the Ohio, and that Col. Thomas Crook had marched with another detachment to Wheeling, the latter having Marshel's orders to form a junction with Col. Williamson's force, in case he could do so without endangering the safety of the post at Wheeling. And Marshel continued, "Tomorrow I intend marching whatever men may rendezvous in this quarter to Richard Wells' fort, which is within five miles of Mingo Bottom, at which place I intend to stay, if circumstances will admit, until I hear from you; and I shall expect, if you think it necessary, that a number of your troops will march to our assistance as soon as possible." Again, on the following day, he wrote Gen. Irvine from Catfish (Washington County seat), informing him that the inhabitants were clamorous for assistance. "The people declare," he said, "they must abandon their habitations unless a few men are sent to them during harvest. They also declare their willingness to submit to and supply the men on the faith of the government."

On the 5th of July Gen. Irvine said, in a letter to the president of the Council,[2] "The people generally seem anxious to make another tryal, and urge me to take Command of them. Their proposals are to raise Volunteers, Provisions, and Horses by subscription, at their own Expence, without making any charge against the public, unless they should hereafter think proper to reimburse them; they also promise to obey orders &c. The 1st of August is the time talked of to march. I have not yet determined whether to go or not, but am getting in Returns of Men, Horses, & Provisions subscribed."

Meanwhile the people continued in a state of mind bordering on panic. Many of them moved from their homes to the shelter of the forts and blockhouses. Nearly as much consternation prevailed in the settlements east of the Monongahela, and the general alarm was greatly increased by the sudden appearance of the savage enemy in Westmoreland County, where, on the 11th of July, they killed and scalped three sons of Mr. Chambers, and two days later attacked and burned Hannastown, the old county-seat of Westmoreland.[3] The party which ac-

[1] In the preceding narrative of the march of the expeditionary force to and from Sandusky this officer was mentioned as Major Williamson, that being the grade to which he was elected for that campaign. After his return from the expedition his proper military title was (as it had been before) Colonel Williamson, of the Washington County militia.

[3] An account of the destruction of Hannastown was given by Michael Huffnagle in a letter to President Reed, as follows:

"Fort Reed, July, 1782.

"Sir,—I am sorry to inform your Excellency that Last Saturday at two O'Clock in the afternoon, Hanna's Town was attacked by about one hundred Whites and Blacks. We found several Jackets, the buttons mark'd with the King's eighth Regiment. At the same Time this Town was attacked another party attack'd Fort Miller, about four Miles from this Place. Hanna's Town & Fort Miller in a short Time were reduced to Ashes, about twenty of the Inhabitants killed and taken, about one hundred head of Cattle, a number of horses, and hogs kill'd. Such wanton destruction I never beheld, burning and destroying as they went. The People of this Place behaved brave, retired to the Fortt, left their all a prey to the Enemy, & with twenty Men only & nine guns in good order, we stood the attack till dark. At first some of the Enemy came close to the Pickets, but were soon oblidg'd to retire farther off. I cancomplished this destruction was composed of Indians and British Rangers, and came in from the north, by way of the valley of the Allegheny.

Intelligence of the attack on and destruction of Hannastown did not reach Gen. Irvine at Fort Pitt until three days after the occurrence, and of course it was then too late for the commandant to send a force in pursuit of the savages with any hope of success. The Indians who made the foray were from the north, mostly Mingoes. The surviving prisoners captured at Hannastown and Miller's were taken to Niagara and delivered to the British military authorities there. At the close of the war they were delivered up and returned to their homes.

A day or two after the destruction of Hannastown a party of seven or eight Wyandots made an incursion in Washington County, near its present northern border. They attacked a cabin, in which they found an old man alone, whom they murdered and scalped. Then they plundered the place and made off with their booty, without having taken the lives of any more victims. The news spread through the settlements, and a party of eight frontiersmen set out in pursuit a few hours later. In the party were the two brothers, Andrew and Adam Poe, both famous for their prowess in Indian warfare. It was while on this pursuit that the Poe brothers had the desperate hand-to-hand fight which resulted in the killing of the noted Wyandot chief, "Big Foot," the story of which is narrated more at length in the history of Hanover township. The other members of the pursuing party overtook the Indians and killed all but one, but lost three of their own number, including a young man named Cherry.

Before the events above narrated, Gen. Irvine wrote (July 11th) to Gen. Washington, saying that the people were constantly growing more determined in their efforts to raise a new force to operate against the Sandusky towns, that solicitations to him to assist in it and to assume the command were increasing daily, and that the militia officers had actually commenced preparations for the expedition. The news of the descent of the savages on Hannastown caused these preparations to be urged with greater energy by the bolder and more determined men, while it increased the general alarm and apprehension in a great degree. Gen. Irvine, in a letter written to President Moore, of the Executive Council, on the 16th of July, said, in reference to the probable results of this affair, "I fear this stroke will intimidate the inhabitants so much that it will not be possible to rally them or persuade them to make a stand. Nothing in my power shall be left undone to countenance and encourage them."

Notwithstanding Gen. Irvine's fears to the contrary, the raising of the new expedition was strenuously urged and pushed forward with all possible vigor by the principal officers of the militia in the two counties. Other than clearly established physical disability, or having served in the then recent campaign under Col. Crawford, very few pleas for exemption from service were deemed valid. Men were required to perform regular tours of duty at the several stations in anticipation of Indian attacks, but were excused from this duty if disposed to volunteer for the new expedition. But the continual alarms caused by Indian forays rendered it necessary to keep large numbers of the militiamen constantly on duty at the stations, and before long it became evident that the requisite number of volunteers could not be raised and equipped for the proposed new campaign by the time (August 1st) originally set for the general rendezvous.

"The incursions of the Indians on the frontier of this country," said Gen. Irvine, in a letter written on the 25th of July to the Secretary of War, "will unavoidably prevent the militia from assembling as soon as the 1st of August. Indeed, I begin to entertain doubts of their being able to raise and equip the proposed number this season." Under these circumstances the general thought it proper to extend the time of preparation for the expedition, and accordingly he directed that the forces should assemble on September 20th (instead of August 1st), at Fort McIntosh, as a general rendezvous, and march thence to the invasion of the Indian country.[1]

On the 10th of August Col. Marshel received orders from Gen. Irvine to call out from the militia a party of twenty men and an officer to range the country lying on the waters of Ten-Mile and Buffalo Creeks, in Washington County, this order being made in response to an address to the commandant, signed by the principal inhabitants of that region, and asking him for a force to protect their homes against the savages. Gen. Irvine, in giving the desired order to Col. Marshel, said, "Though I do not think there is as much danger as they apprehend, yet if they run, the consequence is the same, and I do not wish any more breaks in the settlements."

The people of Washington County, even more than those of Westmoreland, were firm in their determination to prosecute the new campaign against the Indians at Sandusky. On Thursday, August 22d, the militia officers and principal citizens of the county not inform you what Number of the Enemy were killed, as we see them from the Fortt carrying off severals.

"The situation of the Inhabitants is deplorable, a number of them not having a Blanket to lye on, nor a Second Suit to put on their Backs. Affairs are strangely managed here; where the fault lies I will not presume to say. This Place being of the greatest consequence to the Frontiers, to be left destitute of Men, Arms, & ammunition is surprising to me, although frequent applications have been made. Your Excellency, I hope, will not be offended my mentioning that I think it would not be amiss that proper inquiry should be made about the management of the Public affairs in this County, and also to recommend to the Legislative Body to have some provision made for the Poor distress'd People here. Your known humanity convinces me that you will do everything in your power to assist us in our distress'd situation."—Penn. Archives, 1781–83, p. 596.

[1] Both the State and general government had approved the plan of the expedition, and Gen. Irvine had been appointed to the command of it.

met at Catfish Camp (the present borough of Washington) to consult together and take measures "for the purpose of carrying an expedition under the command of Brigadier General Irvine against Sandusky or other Indian towns bordering on our frontier." This meeting resulted in a resolution that the county would furnish its full quota of men and material for the expedition,[1] and that for this purpose all delinquents should be assessed, each individual in proportion to his property, an amount sufficient to cover his share of the necessary expense of the outfit and equipment. It was also agreed that if any horses should be lost in the proposed campaign, and the government should fail or neglect to pay for them for one year after such loss, then the owner of the animal should receive payment from the other members of the company to which he belonged, each contributing in proportion to the assessed value of his estate. The quotas of wheat for the rations of the drafts from each battalion were to be delivered at some mill or mills within the respective districts of such battalions by September 6th next ensuing.

The chairman of this meeting was the county lieutenant, Col. James Marshel, who communicated its proceedings to Gen. Irvine, with the assurance on his part that he had no doubt his county would raise and equip a force of at least five hundred men, to be ready at the appointed rendezvous by the 15th of September, "which," as he said, "will be as soon as the people of the county can possibly be in readiness." The general was pleased with the patriotism of the meeting, and of its resolutions, but he very plainly indicated in his reply that he doubted the ability of the people to execute what they had promised. He had, however, the grace to say to Col. Marshel, "I trust you will not be mistaken notwithstanding."

The Indians continued to grow bolder and more aggressive in their raidings along the border. On the 11th of September, in the evening, an Indian force of two hundred and sixty warriors under the renegade George Girty (brother of the infamous Simon), accompanied by a force of about forty British Rangers from Detroit under Capt. Pratt, of the royal service, attacked the fort (Fort Henry) at Wheeling,[2] but were repulsed. Other attempts were made by them to carry the place by assault during the day and night of the 12th, but with no better success, and in the morning of the 13th they withdrew from Wheeling with the intention of carrying their depredations to the inland settlements. Their attack on Wheeling is described by Ebenezer Zane in the following letter to Gen. Irvine:[3]

"WELING, 14th September, 1782.

"SIR,—On the evening of the eleventh instant a body of the enemy appeared in sight of our garrison. They immediately formed their lines around the garrison, paraded British colors, and demanded the Fort to be surrendered, which was refused. About 12 o'clock of night they rushed hard on the pickets in order to storm but was repulsed. They made two other attempts to storm before day but to no purpose. About 8 o'clock next morning there came a negro from them to us, and informed us that their force consisted of a British captain and 40 regular soldiers and 260 Indians. The enemy kept up a continual fire the whole day. About ten o'clock at night they made a fourth attempt to storm to no better purpose than the former. The enemy continued round the garrison till the morning of the 13th instant, when they disappeared. Our loss is none. Daniel Sullivan, who arrived here in the beginning of the action, is wounded in the foot.

"I believe they have drove the greater part of our stock away, and might, I think, be soon overtaken.

"I am, with due respect, your ob't serv't,

"EBENEZER ZANE."

When the Indian besiegers found themselves compelled to withdraw from Fort Henry[4] without having effected its capture as they had expected to do, the larger part of their force, together with Capt. Pratt's British Rangers, crossed the Ohio with what plunder they had been able to secure, and took their way through the wilderness towards the Sandusky. The remainder of the Indian force, some sixty or seventy in number, took the opposite direction, striking east-

[1] The meeting resolved that the county would furnish as its quota six hundred and seventy-one men from the several militia battalions, two hundred and fifty-two horses, and 40,200 rations (to consist of one and one-fourth pounds of flour and the same weight of beef each); also that any person furnishing two hundred rations and delivering the same as directed by the commanding officer of the battalion of his district, or in lieu of such number of rations should furnish and deliver a good and serviceable pack-horse, with pack-saddle, halter, lashing rope, and two kegs (or in their stead one good bag), should receive therefor exemption from and credit for a two months' tour of military duty. The resolution of the meeting was "that each and every battalion of Washington County militia shall furnish the quota of men, provisions, and pack-horses, equipped for transportation, hereunto annexed to each and every battalion respectively, namely:

[2] John Slover, the guide in Crawford's expedition, who made his escape from the Indians after having been tied to the stake for torture, as before narrated, had given warning that the savages were meditating an extended series of operations against the frontier settlements, and that among these projected operations was an attack in force on the post at Wheeling. This information he said he gained by being present at their councils for several days while in captivity, and fully understanding every word that was uttered by the chiefs on those occasions, as he was entirely familiar with the Delaware, Wyandot, and Shawanese languages. The tale which he brought of these intended expeditions by the Indians against the white settlements was not believed by Col. Cook, Col. Marshel, and Gen. Irvine, but the result proved that Slover had neither misunderstood nor falsified the intentions of the savages as expressed by their chiefs in council.

ward towards the interior settlements, bent on massacre and devastation in revenge for their disappointment at Fort Henry. Their objective-point was Rice's fort, on the Dutch Fork of Buffalo Creek, in the present township of Donegal, Washington County.

Intelligence of the attack on Fort Henry was brought to Col. James Marshel at Catfish by Capt. Boggs immediately after the siege began, and while all the Indian and British forces were collected round the fort. On receipt of the information Marshel notified Gen. Irvine by letter as follows:

"THURSDAY, September 12, 1782.

"DEAR SIR,—By an express this moment arrived from Wheeling, I have received the following intelligence, namely: That a large trail, by supposition about two hundred Indians, was discovered yesterday about three o'clock near to that place. Capt. Boggs, who brought the account, says that when he had left the fort about one mile and a half he heard the swivel at Wheeling fired, and one rifle. He further says that Ebenezer McCulloch, from Van Meter's fort, on his way to Wheeling, got within one-half a mile of the place shortly after Boggs left it, where he was alarmed by hearing a heavy and constant fire about the forts, and makes no doubt the fort was then attacked. . . ."

Three days later Col. Marshel communicated to Gen. Irvine further information of the movements of the Indians in the following letter:

"SUNDAY MORNING, 15th September, 1782.

"DEAR SIR,—You may depend upon it, as a matter of fact, that a large body of Indians are now in our country. Last night I saw two prisoners who made their escape from Wheeling in time of the action, and say the enemy consists of 238 Indians and 40 Rangers, the latter commanded by a British officer; that they attacked Wheeling Fort on Wednesday night, and continued the attack until Thursday night, at which time the above deserters[1] left them. That Fort they say was the principal object of the enemy; but it appears, both from their account and the enemy's advancing into the country, that they have despaired of taking it. The deserters say that shortly before they left the enemy that they had determined to give up the matter at Wheeling, and either scatter into small parties in order to distress and plunder the inhabitants, or attack the first small fort they could come at. The latter, I'm this moment informed, is actually the case; that they have attacked one Rice's Block-House, on what is called the Dutch fork of Buffaloe, and it's to be feared it will fall into their hands, as only those have been called upon who are not going upon the expedition. I'm afraid they will not turn out as well as they ought to do. If the enemy continues to advance in one body the matter will become serious, and perhaps require our whole strength to repel them. But if it can possibly be avoided I could wish not to call upon a man that's going upon the expedition against Sandusky. Besides, the battalion rendezvous is appointed as soon as the men could possibly be collected. Unless the officers have made their appointments, as you will see by Col. McCleery's[2] letter they have done in the first battalion, no doubt ammunition will be wanted on this occasion. A small quantity, such as the bearer can carry, will do. Excuse haste.

"From, Sir, your most obt. humble serv't,

"JAMES MARSHEL."

The fact that the Indians were advancing eastward from Wheeling was known at Rice's fort about half an hour before the savages made their appearance, the intelligence having been brought by Jacob Miller, who learned the news at the house of Dr. Moore, near Catfish, and rode with all possible speed to notify the people at the threatened point, and to take part in the defense. Some of the men from the fort had gone to Hagerstown for supplies, and only five were left to defend it, viz.: George Lefler, Peter Fullenweider, Daniel Rice, George Felebaum, and Jacob Lefler, Jr. This force was increased to six by the arrival of Miller. The Indians soon made their appearance and surrounded the fort. The six defenders fired, and three savages fell. The Indians returned the fire without effect, but in their second volley they killed George Felebaum, who was standing at a port-hole. The ball struck him in the forehead, and he expired instantly. The firing was kept up during the day, but without any further casualty to the white men.

Abraham Rice, of the fort, was absent, having set out at once on receipt of the news brought by Miller to go to Lamb's fort, some four miles away, for assistance. He had not been gone long when he heard the firing at his own fort, and at once determined to return and assist in the defense; but he failed in his attempt, for he was discovered by the Indians, who fired a great number of shots and wounded him badly, but he made his escape, and was able to reach Lamb's, whence, after his wounds had been dressed, he set out on his return, having with him a party of twelve men. This was late in the evening. On approaching the besieged fort ten of the party became alarmed and retreated, but Rice and the other two went on. They were soon discovered by an Indian, who thereupon gave the usual alarm, which passed around the entire line encircling the fort. The savages supposed that a large party of whites was approaching, and after one more fierce but ineffectual attempt to carry the fort they retreated from the place, having lost four warriors by the rifles of the defenders. On the following morning a force of about sixty frontiersmen collected and started in pursuit of the Indians, but after proceeding two or three miles it was found that the savages had scattered in small parties, and the pursuit was abandoned. The Indians, however, in their retreat met another party of four white men, two of whom they killed, losing one of their warriors.

[1] The two men whom Marshel refers to in this letter, first as "prisoners" and afterwards as "deserters," were, so says Doddridge, "two white men who had been made prisoners when lads, raised among the Indians, and taken to war with them. These men deserted from them soon after their council at the close of the siege of Wheeling."

The Indian attacks at Wheeling and at Rice's fort (showing that the savages could make incursions in force and almost at will in spite of the vigilance of the "ranging parties" of militia) materially dampened the ardor of the people with regard to the new Sandusky campaign, notwithstanding that the government had ordered a considerable body of Continental troops to accompany the expedition, in accordance with the wishes of Cols. Marshel and Cook and several of the more prominent among the militia officers of Washington and Westmoreland Counties.

On the 18th of September, two days before the time which had been appointed for the rendezvous at Fort McIntosh,[1] Gen. Irvine addressed communications to Col. Marshel and Col. Cook, saying, "I have this moment received dispatches from the Secretary at War informing me that some regular troops are ordered from below to assist us in our intended expedition. I am therefore to beg you will immediately countermand the march of the volunteers and others of your counties until further orders. As soon as I am positively assured of the time the troops will be here I shall give you the earliest notice." The time for the assembling of the volunteers and other forces for the expedition was then postponed to the 6th of October;[2] but before that time Gen. Irvine had received a letter from the Secretary of War as follows:

"WAR OFFICE, September 27, 1782.

"DEAR SIR,—From late accounts forwarded by his Excellency General Washington, we learn that the Indians are all called in [by the British]. This has induced the resolution to lay aside the expedition I mentioned in my last.

"I am, dear sir, your obᵗ. servᵗ,

"B. LINCOLN."

This caused the commandant at Fort Pitt to abandon all thoughts of the proposed campaign, though he did not immediately notify the county lieutenants to that effect. But on the 18th of October he said, in a letter to Col. Edward Cook, of Westmoreland, "I received your letter by Sergt. Porter, and one last night from Col. Marshal, which is full of despondency. Indeed, by all accounts I can collect, it would be vain to insist on bringing the few willing people to the general rendezvous, as there is not the most distant prospect that half sufficient would assemble. Under the circumstances I think it will be most advisable to give up the matter at once, and direct the provisions and other articles to be restored to the owners."

About two weeks after Gen. Irvine wrote this letter he received official notification from the Secretary of War (dated October 30th) that the Indian expedition had been abandoned, and thereupon the fact was officially communicated to the lieutenants of Westmoreland and Washington Counties. This ended all thoughts of raising a force to invade the Indian country, and it also closed the military history of this section of country for the period of the war of the Revolution. After the official proclamation of peace, however, and as late as the end of the spring of 1783, Indian depredations were continued to some extent along the Western Pennsylvania and Virginia border, though none of these are found reported as having been committed within the territory which now forms the county of Washington.

Washington Militia in 1784.—The composition of the Washington County militia immediately after the close of the Revolution is shown in a return made by Col. James Marshel, county lieutenant, dated July 7, 1784,[3] as follows:

CHAPTER IX.

THE CIVIL AND LEGAL HISTORY.

BY BOYD CRUMRINE.

I.

The Wilderness—The First Settlements—Attempted Removal of Settlers—Council at Fort Pitt, April, 1768—The Treaty of Fort Stanwix—Settlers West of the Monongahela—Bedford County erected.

To write the civil and legal history of Washington County is first, in a general way, to discuss the origin and progress of the settlements within her borders, then the establishment of municipal government and the organization of courts of justice for the due and orderly administration of the law.

The Wilderness.—The cabins of white men were first built within the original limits of Washington County possibly in 1766, certainly in 1767. In the latter year, if not in the former, the Monongahela had been crossed and settlers had stopped on Dunkard Creek, in what is now Greene County, at the mouth of Ten-Mile Creek, and upon Raccoon Creek.

It is thought that, prior to 1750, the hills and 1750. valleys of this State west of the Alleghanies were untrodden by the feet of white men, except of adventurous traders among the Indians, such as Peter Chartiers and others. Nor were our lands at this date occupied by the homes of the Indians. These prior possessors of the soil resided and had their homes or towns chiefly along and south of the great lakes, though smaller villages, temporary abiding-places, and hunting-camps were here and there along the Ohio, Allegheny, and Monongahela. There may have been many localities which were unknown to the Indians at the coming of the English. Within the lands lying between the Monongahela and the Ohio, as originally erected into Washington County, the red men had no permanent dwelling-places, although Catfish, a warrior, and Shingis, a king, of the Delawares, had hunting-lodges, the former where Washington now stands,[1] the latter at the mouth of Chartiers Creek.

Thomas Hutchins, the engineer of Bouquet's expedition against the Western Indians in 1764, in his topographical description of Virginia, Pennsylvania, etc., wrote of the country of which our county forms a part nearly a century ago:

"The whole country abounds in Bears, Elks, Buffaloe, Deer, Turkies, &c.,—an unquestionable proof of the extraordinary goodness of its soil.

"In the year 1760, a small town, called Pittsburgh, was built near Fort Pitt, and about 200 families resided in it; but upon the breaking out of the Indian war (in the month of May 1763) they abandoned their houses and retired into the fort.

"In the year 1765, the present town of Pittsburgh was laid out. It is built on the eastern bank of the River Monongahela, about 200 yards from Fort Pitt. . . .

"The country on both sides of the Ohio, extending South-Easterly and South-Westerly from Fort Pitt to the Mississippi, and watered by the Ohio River and its branches, contains at least a million square miles, and it may, with truth, be affirmed, that no part of the globe is blessed with a more healthful air or climate;—watered with more navigable rivers and branches communicating with the Atlantic Ocean, by the Rivers Potowmac, James, Rappahannock, Mississippi and St. Lawrence, or capable of producing with less labor or expense Wheat, Indian Corn, Buckwheat, Rye, Oats, Barley, Flax, Hemp, Tobacco, Rice, Silk, Potash, &c., than the country under consideration. And although there are also considerable quantities of high lands for about 250 miles, (on both sides of the River Ohio,) Southwardly from Fort Pitt, yet even the summits of most of the hills are covered with a deep rich soil, fit for the culture of Flax and Hemp, and it may be also added, that no soil can possibly yield larger crops of Red and White clover, and other useful grasses, than this does."

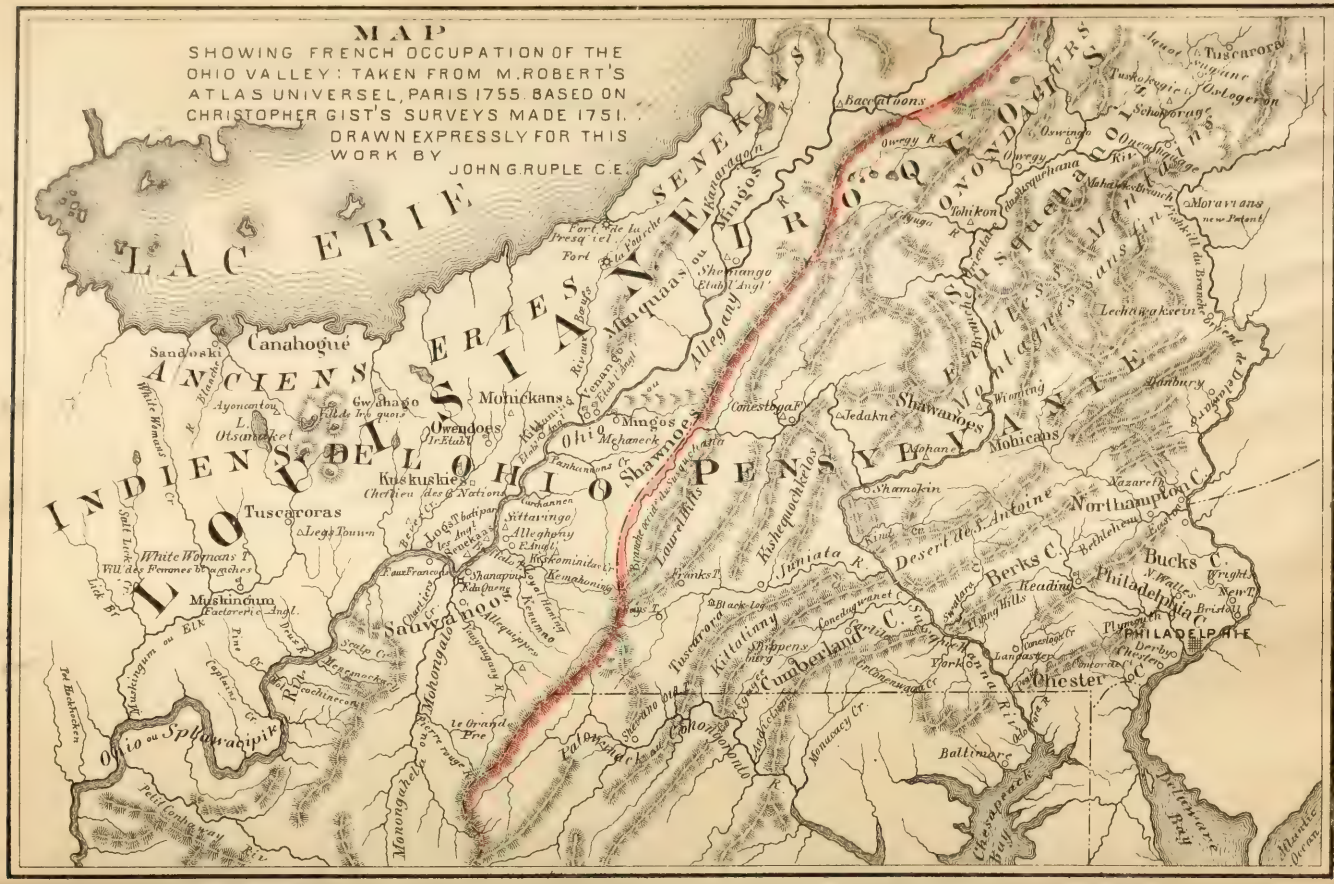
In a foot-note Hutchins quotes from Gordon, a still earlier traveler:

"This country may, from a proper knowledge, be affirmed to be the most healthy, the most pleasant, the most commodious, and the most fertile spot of earth known to European people."

Francis Parkman, writing of the country west of the Alleghanies in 1760, during the time of the French and Indian war,[2] says,—

"One vast and continuous forest shadowed the fertile soil, covering the lands as the grass covers a garden lawn, sweeping over hill and hollow in endless undulation, burying mountains in verdure, and mantling brooks and rivers from the light of day. Green intervals dotted with browsing deer, and broad plains alive with buffalo, broke the sameness of the woodland scenery. Unnumbered rivers seamed the forest with their devious windings. Vast lakes washed its boundaries, where the Indian Voyager, in his birch canoe, could descry no lands beyond the world of waters. Yet this prolific wilderness, teeming with waste fertility, was but a hunting ground and a battle-field to a few fierce hordes of savages. Here and there in some rich meadow opened to the sun, the Indian squaws turned the black mould with their rude implements of bone and iron, and sowed their scanty stores of maize and beans. Human labor drew no other tribute from that exhaustless soil."

Fort Pitt was built by Gen. Stanwix in the year 1759, near the ruins of Fort Du Quesne, destroyed by Gen. Forbes the preceding year. The same writer just quoted says,[3]—



"Fort Pitt stood far aloof in the forest, and one might journey eastward full two hundred miles before the English settlements began to thicken. Behind it lay a broken and woody tract; then succeeded the great barrier of the Alleghanies, traversing the country in successive ridges, and beyond these lay vast woods extending to the Susquehanna. . . . Two roads led from Fort Pitt to the settlements, one of which was cut by General Braddock in his disastrous march across the mountains from Cumberland in the year 1755. The other, which was more frequented, passed by Carlisle and Bedford, and was made by General Forbes in 1758. Leaving the fort by this latter route, the traveler would find himself, after a journey of fifty-six miles, at the little post of Ligonier, about a hundred miles from Fort Pitt. It was nestled among the mountains, and surrounded by clearings and log cabins. Passing several small posts and settlements he would arrive at Carlisle, nearly a hundred miles farther east, a place resembling Bedford in its general aspect, although of greater extent. After leaving Fort Bedford numerous houses of settlers were scattered here and there among the valleys, on each side of the road from Fort Pitt, so that the number of families beyond the Susquehanna amounted to several hundreds, thinly distributed over a great space."

What is known as the French and Indian war, the history of which will appear in another part of this work, terminated with the definitive treaty of peace signed between England and France on Feb. 10,

[1] Judging from the point marked "Catfish's Camp" upon the original plot of the town, as laid out on Oct. 13, 1781, it must have been within the present Trinity Hall grounds. A later but a still ancient draft places the old warrior's camp in the same locality.

1763. Then passed from France all her possessions east of the Mississippi, including Canada. Up to this time, says Bancroft, "not a fountain bubbled on the west of the Alleghanies but was claimed as being within the French empire. Louisiana stretched to the head springs of the Allegheny and the Monongahela, of the Kanawha and the Tennessee."

It is thus seen that the lands on which we live, until the period referred to, were claimed to be under the jurisdiction of France, and though when that jurisdiction was removed the territories now of Washington County were as yet unsettled by the white race, still a brief reference to that jurisdiction may be made the starting-point of these chapters.

In the library of Washington and Jefferson College is a very rare and valuable atlas, with the title page, "Atlas Universel, par M. Robert de Vaugondy, Geographe Ordinaire du Roy et par M. Robert de Vaugondy, son fils, Geographe ord. du Roy, et de S. M. Polonoise Duc de Loraine et de Bar, et Associé de L'Academie Royale des Sciences et belle Lettres de Nancy. Avec Privilége du Roy, 1757." The ninety-eighth map of the series is entitled "Partie de L'Amerique Sepentrionale, qui comprend Le Cours de L'Ohio, La Nlle Angleterre, La Nlle York, Le New Jersey, La Pennsylvania, Le Maryland, La Virginie, La Caroline. . . . Avec Privilége 1755." Upon this map, which, as will be observed, is from the French stand-point altogether, the boundary line between Pennsylvania and Louisiana is the western base of the Alleghany Mountains.

On the same map, as is seen from a portion copied to illustrate this chapter, is the Monongahela, "ou Mohongalo," receiving on its west bank three unnamed streams, and on its east one, before it has the waters of Pierre-Rouge (Redstone) on its east bank. Then one more unnamed stream enters it on the west before it receives the "Yauyaugany" from the east; then flowing on it unites with the "Ohio ou Allegany," coming from the northeast, and with the latter forms the "Ohio ou Splawacipiki." Below the union the Chartiers Creek, running from the south, enters the Ohio; then, farther down, "Bever" Creek from the north. No settlements or villages, either of white men or of the Indians, are indicated upon any of the territory between the Monongahela and the Ohio.[1]

France claimed all the lands west of the Alleghanies by right of prior discovery, and the establishment of her power upon the coasts of North America was coeval with the first colonies from England.[2] Samuel Champlain became the father of New France, upon the waters of the St. Lawrence, in 1603. In 1616, Le Caron, Champlain's companion, "had passed into the hunting-grounds of the Wyandots, and, bound by his vows to the life of a beggar, had, on foot or paddling a bark canoe, gone onward and still onward, taking alms of the savages, till he reached the rivers of Lake Huron."[3] Marquette and Joliette, in 1673, with five Frenchmen and two Algonquins, passed up the Fox River, across the portage and into the waters of the "Ouisconsin," thence to the Mississippi, down beyond the mouth of the Ohio as far as the mouth of the Arkansas, whence they returned.[4] In 1682, the same year in which Wm. Penn first came to his new colony on the Delaware, Robert Cavalier de la Salle, having passed with his expedition from the lakes into the Mississippi, in April of that year proceeded to the mouths of that river, and in the name of Louis XIV. took possession of all the lands watered by the Mississippi and its tributaries and named it Louisiana.[5] We have already seen how that Louisiana, upon the French map before referred to, extended to the base of the Alleghany Mountains.

History has not recorded when the Ohio was first explored and made known to white men, but it does not do violence to the judgment to assume that the French, full of adventure, were the first Europeans to become acquainted with its beautiful shores.

"It is known that the French were particularly fond of pursuing discoveries in every direction in which their light boats might be rowed. And it has been supposed that the Ohio and its tributaries had been ascended to their spring-heads at a much earlier date than either history or tradition now informs us."[6]

The first notice taken by Pennsylvania, so far as we are informed, of the claims of France as embracing any part of her western territory was at a meeting of the Provincial Council held on Aug. 4, 1731, Patrick Gordon, Esq., Governor. The Governor laid before the Council a message prepared for the House of Representatives, then in session, which being read was approved. The first part related to the Sugar Islands. The Governor then proceeded to inform the board that the matter mentioned in the close of his intended message related to Indian affairs, and would be found to be of great consequence to the whole province, the details whereof he would leave to Mr. Logan, to whom the information had first been given, and who from his long experience and knowledge in those affairs could give the best account of it.

Mr. Logan "then producing the Map of Louisiana, as inserted in a Book called a New General Atlas, published at London, in the year 1721, first observed from thence how exorbitant the French Claims were on the Continent of America; that by the description in the said Map they claimed a great part of Carolina and Virginia, and laid down Susquehanna as a Boundary of Pennsylvania. Then he proceeded to observe that by virtue of some Treaty, as they allege, the French pretend a Right to all Lands lying on Rivers of the Mouths of which they are possessed; That the River Ohio (a branch of the Mississippi) comes close to those mountains which lye about 120 or 130 miles back of Susquehanna, within the Boundaries of this Province, as Granted by the King's Letters Patent; that adjoining thereto is a fine tract of land called Allegheny, on which several Shawnese Indians had seated themselves. And that by the Advices lately brought to him by several Traders in those parts, it appears that the French have been using Endeavors to gain over those Indians to their Interest,"[1] etc.

[1] It is believed that this French map was made up, partly at least, from the map of Joshua Fry and Peter Jefferson, published at London in 1754, of the "Most Inhabited Part of Virginia, &c.," which was constructed, as appears upon its face, from surveys of Christopher Gist, made in 1751.

Whereupon recommendations were at once made to the House of Representatives to prepare for a treaty to be made with the Five Nations.

Pennsylvania was thus warned as early as 1731 that a powerful continental nation, with which the parent kingdom was then at peace, was threatening a foothold upon fertile lands within her own charter limits, yet, disturbed for many years by a controversy with Lord Baltimore concerning her southern boundary, and also by disagreements between the proprietary Governors and the provincial Assemblies, as well as by continually embarrassing relations in her Indian affairs in her undoubted possessions and settlements east of the mountains, for many years she made no effort to repel the French intrusion; indeed, not until Virginia, in 1748 and 1749, had taken the initiative in the establishment of the Ohio Company in the vicinity of the Pittsburgh of to-day, for the purpose of displacing the French enlodgment, did Pennsylvania manifest an interest in the subject; where her western boundary might lie she seemed to know little and care less. It was the Virginia occupation in 1748–49, resulting in the French and Indian war, the history whereof and of the French expulsion will be elsewhere related, which brought to Pennsylvania a suggestion of watchfulness to her western boundary.

The First Settlements.—The jurisdiction of France had not yet been determined in the valley of the Ohio when Englishmen began to settle upon the waters of the Monongahela. In 1751, at a council with the Six Nations, Delawares, and Shaw-1751. anese, held by George Croghan, then the deputy Indian agent, at Logstown,[2] an Indian village on the Ohio about eighteen miles below Pittsburgh, a Dunkard came from Virginia and requested leave to settle on the "Yogh-yo-gaine River, a branch of the Ohio," when he was told that he must apply to the Onondaga Council, and be recommended by the Governor of Pennsylvania.[3] But the first actual white settlers west of the Laurel Hill mountains were doubtless Wendell Brown and his two sons, Maunus and Adam, and perhaps another son, Thomas. They came in 1751, and settled below the mouth of Little Jacobs Creek, in Fayette County,[4] not far from New Geneva. Then followed Christopher Gist, in 1753; William Jacobs, in 1761, at the mouth of Redstone Creek; William Colvin, in 1764, where Brownsville now stands; Lemuel Barrett, in 1763, where Bridgeport now is;[5] William Crawford, on the Youghiogheny, opposite Connellsville, in 1765.[6] It is thus seen that the beginning of the settlements west of the Alleghanies was prior to the commencement of the French and Indian war in 1754, and they continued until that war terminated, and was followed by Pontiac's conspiracy in 1764; but not until the period of the peace which followed Bouquet's expedition in the year last named were there any settlements made west of the Monongahela River.

Books and papers heretofore printed upon the history of the country lying between the Monongahela and Ohio inform us that the settlements within our limits began about 1770, and increased very rapidly in 1771, 1772, and 1773. Dr. Doddridge states that the settlements on this side of the mountains commenced along the Monongahela, and between that river and the Laurel Ridge, in the year 1772, and that in the succeeding year they reached the Ohio River.[7] This is certainly incorrect.

Before it is shown, however, when our earliest set-

[2] Where was Logstown? On March 10, 1777, depositions were taken at the house of John Ormsby, in Pittsburgh, in relation to the claim of the Indiana Company to lands conveyed by the Six Nations at the treaty at Fort Stanwix in November, 1768. The deposition of Edward Ward was as follows:

"Major Edward Ward Deposeth and saith that at the beginning of the year 1754, William Trent, Esquire, was appointed by Governor Dinwiddie, of Virginia, Captain of a company to be raised, of which this deponent was appointed Ensign by the said Trent, who assembled the Chiefs & Deputies of the Six Nations, and requested of them permission to erect a Trading-House at the Junction of the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers, to carry on a Free and Open Trade with the Six Nations and their dependants, which was granted by the said Deputies, with this restriction that he was to found no Settlement or Improvements on the said Land, but on the Contrary to Evacuate the same when required by the Six Nations, after which the said Captain Trent inlisted a number of men not exceeding thirty-three, and proceeded to erect a Fort at the place before mentioned. That on the 17th of April following, and before the Fort was nearly completed, this Deponent, who commanded in the absence of Capt Trent, was put to the necessity of surrendering the possession to a Superior number of Troops, Commanded by a French officer, who demanded it in the name of the King of France, at which time the Half-King and a number of the Six Nations in the English Interests were present. This deponent further saith that in the year 1752, and before his surrender to the French, there was a small Village Inhabited by the Delawares on the Southeast side of the Allegheny River, in the neighborhood of that place, and that old Kittaning, on the same side of the said river, was then Inhabited by the Delawares; that about one-third of the Shawanese Inhabited Loggstown, on the west side of the Ohio, and tended corn on the East side of the River, and the other part of the Nation lived on the Scioto River. That the Deputies of the Six Nations, after the surrender, joined the Virginia Forces, Commanded by Colonel George Washington, who was then on his march, at the Little Meadows, and continued with him in the service of Virginia till after the defeat of Monsieur La Force and a party of French Troops under his Command." See this affidavit in full in I. Calendar of Va. State Papers, 278. At the time it was made Edward Ward was a justice in the Yohogania County Court, of which more hereafter.

[7] "Notes on the Settlement and Indian Wars of the Western Parts of Virginia and Pennsylvania," by Dr. Joseph Doddridge, page 129. Dr. Doddridge was the eldest son of John Doddridge, of Maryland, who first immigrated to Friend's Cove, a few miles south of Bedford, but in 1773 removed with his family to a place a short distance from West Middletown in this county. The author of the work referred to was born at the settlement near Bedford in 1769, and was with his father when the removal referred to was made. A younger brother was Philip Doddridge, who became celebrated in early times as an able and eloquent lawyer. The notes on the settlements were written in 1824, and the author died in 1826, at Wellsburg, where he is buried. The brother, Philip, died in 1832, at Washington, D. C., while a member of Congress.

tlers began to arrive, it should be stated that all settlements made west of the Alleghanies within the present limits of Southwestern Pennsylvania prior to the treaty of Fort Stanwix, on Nov. 5, 1768, were without authority and illegal. The policy observed by both the province of Pennsylvania and the colony of Virginia was not to permit of improvements upon lands until they had been purchased from the Indians; doubtless, if not in recognition of rightful ownership, at least to avoid hostilities on the part of the red men. Braddock's road, opened for the army of that ill-fated general in 1755, carried to Redstone (now Brownsville) by Col. Burd in 1759, was the gateway through the mountain barrier, first used and most generally by immigrants from Maryland and Virginia, and later by immigrants from the older counties of Pennsylvania in the east; and, though the boundary contest between the two governments had not begun actively for several years yet, still both governments had sought to prevent the occupation of white settlers until the Indian title had been extinguished. Capt. Alexander Mackay, with a party of the Forty-second Regiment of the king's forces, was sent from Fort Pitt to Redstone Creek, and on June 1, 1766, he issued a proclamation warning the settlers in that vicinity away. Soon afterward, in July of the same year, Governor Fauquier, of Virginia, issued a like proclamation. And so, in the following September, Governor Penn, by proclamation, prohibited "all his Majesty's subjects of this or any other province or colony from making any settlements, or taking any possession of lands, by marking trees or otherwise, beyond the limits of the last Indian purchase (that of 1754) within this province, upon pain of the severest penalties of the law, and of being excluded from the privilege of securing such settlements should the lands where they shall be made be hereafter purchased of the Indians."[1] These prohibitions were but following the proclamation of the king, of a like tenor, made at the termination of the French and English war in 1763, though they were of but little if any effect. The immigrants from "over the mountains" still came, singly, or with a few old neighbors or acquaintances. They made friends with the natives by their trade and intercourse, and, though no record has come down to us of their daily life and habits during this period, yet the nature and character of such an existence can be supplied by the imagination. And though there was still peace and a friendship with the individual hunters of the tribes, nevertheless there were threats and warnings from the chiefs of the nations, indicating that the intrusion upon their hunting-grounds was not accepted with equanimity. In the councils with the deputies of the ruling nation complaints were loud and frequent.

Attempted Removal of Settlers.—At length in December, 1767, shortly after Mason and Dixon's line had been extended to the second crossing of Dunkard Creek, near what is now Mount Morris, in Greene County, where the distinguished surveying party was stopped by the watchful Indians, Gen. Gage, commanding at New York, wrote to Governor Penn: 1767.

"The accounts which I have lately received from all quarters are full of Intelligence of the dissatisfaction of the Indians, and of their ill Disposition towards us. I am now called upon by a letter I have received from Sir William Johnson,[2] expressive of his apprehensions of an immediate Rupture with the Indians unless some means are fallen upon to pacify them, to acquaint you that altho' several Causes for their present ill temper are suggested, yet the Insults they have received from the frontier people, chiefly from those of Virginia, and the obstinacy of the People who persist to settle on their lands, not only without their consent but in contradiction to their warmest Remonstrances, and the endeavors that have been used to remove them, I perceive to be the most immediate cause of their discontent."

The letter recommended the adoption of effectual measures to remove "these Lawless Settlers," and a like letter was addressed to the authorities of the colony of Virginia.

The reply of Governor Penn, at an early date afterward, promised a reference of the subject to the Assembly to meet in the next month, and then proceeded:

"With respect to the Insufficiency of the Laws to secure the Indians in their Persons and Properties, I would beg leave to observe that the remote Situation of their Country, and the dispersed and Vagrant manner in which the People live, will generally render the best Laws that can be framed for those Ends in a great measure ineffectual. The Civil Officers whose Business it is to see that they are duly enforced, cannot exert their authority in so distant and extensive a wilderness. In the execution, therefore, of the present interesting matter, I am persuaded that notwithstanding all the Legislature can do I shall find it necessary to apply to the Military aid, which you have so readily offered me in support of the Civil Power. Yet I fear that while the Severity of the weather in the Winter Season continues, it will be found extremely difficult if not impracticable to oblige these Lawless people to abandon their present habitations, and to remove with their Families and Effects into the interior part of the Country, and I am of Opinion it would be unadvisable to make any attempts of that kind before Spring."

The Assembly met on the 4th of January, 1768, when the Governor at once laid before that body a

[2] Sir William Johnson was the agent for Indian affairs on the part of the crown, and resided in a splendid residence called Johnson Hall on the Mohawk River, about thirty miles from Albany, N. Y. He came to America in 1734; in 1755 he was in command of the provincial troops of New York in the expedition against Crown Point, and commanded the expedition against Niagara in 1759. In his capacity of Indian agent he had acquired a powerful influence over the Indians, and there is an anecdote related of him which shows that in his intercourse with them he had not failed to learn their cunning. Having sent to England for a finely laced suit of clothes, on their arrival, Hendrick, the chief of the Mohawks, was dazzled with their splendor. His vanity could not be appeased, and he hit upon an expedient to gratify it. He went to Sir William one morning and demurely told him that in the preceding night he had dreamed that the baronet had generously presented him with a suit of his laced clothes. The hint could not be mistaken, and the chief went away happy with the result of his ingenuity. In a few days, however, Sir William made known to his Indian majesty a dream he had had, that the chief had given him a tract of land containing several thousand acres. "The land is yours," said Hendrick, "but now, Sir William, I never dream with you again; you dream too hard for me." Sir William died on July 11, 1774, at his home. (See I. Olden Time, p. 520; Blake's Biog. Dict., p. 665.)

message, accompanied with the correspondence referred to, and stating the causes of the im-1768. pending Indian hostilities to the settlements made and being made upon their unpurchased lands, and further stating,—

"And I must inform you that those Settlements upon the Indian Lands to the westward of the Alleghany Mountains, now appear by the Line lately Run between Pennsylvania and Maryland, to be within the bounds of this province. . . . I must earnestly recommend to you the framing of a Law not only to remedy the present Evil, but to punish future Delinquencies of the same kind, &c."

The Assembly, while preparing a bill intended to effect the purpose desired, responded to the Governor's message in a long address, showing a full appreciation of the necessity for cautious treatment of the tribes, and soon afterward an anxious letter was received by the Governor direct from Sir William Johnson, in which it was said,—

"There are doubtless amongst the Scattered Tribes living in back parts of that Country, several Idle Indians, who may, from motives of private Interest, be persuaded to give some encouragement to the Settlers; but these are private acts of Persons who would not presume to avow them to the Confederacy, whose sole Right it is, and whose Resentment may have a most fatal Tendency, &c."

The result of this correspondence, necessarily so interesting to the present residents of the Monongahela valley,[1] was that on Feb. 3, 1768, there was passed "a most terrifying law," the first one enacted at that session. This act, after reciting that "many disorderly people, in violation of his Majesty's proclamation, have presumed to settle upon lands not yet purchased from the Indians, to their damage and great dissatisfaction, which may be attended with dangerous and fatal consequences to the peace and safety of this province," enacted,—

"That if any Person or Persons, settled upon any Lands within the Boundaries of this Province, not purchased of the Indians by the Proprietaries thereof, shall neglect or refuse to remove themselves and Families off and from the same Lands, within the Space of Thirty days after he or they shall be required so to do; . . . or if any Person or Persons being so removed, shall afterwards return to his or their Settlements, or the Settlement of any other Person, with his or their Family, or without any Family, to remain and settle on such Lands; or if any Person shall, after the said Notice to be given as aforesaid, reside and settle on such Lands, every such Person and Persons, so neglecting or refusing to remove with his Family, or returning to settle as aforesaid, or that shall settle on such Lands after the Requisition or Notice aforesaid, being thereof legally convicted by their own confession or the Verdict of a Jury, shall suffer death without the Benefit of Clergy."[2]

On Feb. 24, 1768, Governor John Penn issued his proclamation, embracing the provisions of the act quoted from, and warning all persons offending against it with the penalties therein provided. The same day Rev. John Steel, a fighting parson of Carlisle, Cumberland Co., John Allison and Christopher Lemes, Esqs., and Capt. James Potter, also of Cumberland County, were sent to the Monongahela valley with printed copies of the proclamation and with full instructions in writing.[3]

On March 15, 1768, George Croghan, a deputy superintendent of Indian affairs under Sir William Johnson, wrote the Governor that he was about to proceed to Fort Pitt, to hold a council with the Western Indians, whom he expected to meet there on the 25th of that month, and stating that if Pennsylvania was to be represented by commissioners at that council they should set off in a few days,[4] whereupon John Allen and Joseph Shippen, the latter being the secretary of the Provincial Council, were duly appointed, though the council with the Indians was not held until a later date than that fixed.

The Rev. John Steel and his companions proceeded in due time to their destination, had several conferences with the settlers, and when they reached Fort Cumberland (now Cumberland, Md.) on their return they made the following report to the Governor, here printed entire, as throwing so much light upon the early history of the Monongahela valley:[5]

"Fort Cumberland, April 2, 1768.

"May it please your Honour:

"Having in our return reached Fort Cumberland, and being here to part, We concluded it necessary to prepare an Extract from our Journal of what appeared to us most important, which We Ordered to be transmitted to your Honour by Mr. Steel.

"We arrived at the Settlement on Red Stone, on the twenty-third Day of March. The People having heard of our coming had appointed a Meeting among themselves on the twenty-fourth, to consult what measures they should take. We took the advantage of this Meeting, Read the Act of Assembly and Proclamation explaining the law, and giving the Reason of it as well as we could, and used our Endeavors to persuade them to comply, alleging to them that it was the most probable Method to entitle them to favour with the Honourable Proprietaries when the Land was purchased. After Lamenting their distressed Condition, they told us the People were not fully collected, but, as they expected, all would attend on the Sabbath following, and then they would give an answer.

"They, however, affirmed that the Indians were very Peaceable, and seemed sorry they were to be removed: and said they apprehended the English intended to make War upon the Indians, as they were moving off their People from their Neighborhood.

"We labored to persuade them that they were imposed on by a few straggling Indians; that Sir William Johnson, who had informed our Government, must be better acquainted with the mind of the Six Nations, and that they were displeased with the White People's settling on their unpurchased Lands. On Sabbath, the twenty-seventh day of March, a considerable Number attended, (their Names are Subjoined,) and most of them told us they were resolved to move off, and would Petition your Honour for a Preference in obtaining their Improvements when a Purchase was made.

"While We were conversing we were informed that a number of Indians were come to Indian Peter's;[6] We judging it might be subser-

The benefit of clergy was this: By the old English law the clergy, because they were supposed to have more of the good thing of learning than other persons, were exempted from the punishment of death imposed for the commission of certain crimes. Later statutes gave this exemption to all persons who could read and write. But the Stat. 7, Geo. IV., c. 28, s. 6, after our Revolution, abolished this exemption, and thereafter the learned and the unlearned suffered in the same way for the commission of crime.

[5] The writer is of the opinion that in the preparation of local history the better method is, first, to observe as closely as possible a chronological arrangement, and, second, to allow the actors to speak for themselves when letters, papers, or documents of any kind are used. To quote verbatim from such sources enables the reader to form his own judgment, not only as to the individuality of the person whose words are read, but also as to the subject matter, illuminated sometimes by the quaint and curious speech. In this belief literal copying is observed, even as to spelling of proper names.

vient to our main design, that the Indians should be present, while We were advising the People to obey the Law, sent for them; They came; and after Sermon delivered a speech, with a string of Wampum[1] to be transmitted to Your Honour. This Speech was: 'Ye are come, sent by your Great Men, to tell these People to go away from the Land, Which Ye say is ours; and we are sent by our Great Men, and are glad We have met here this day. We tell you the White People must Stop, and We stop them 'till the Treaty, and when George Croghan, and our great Men will talk together, we will tell them what to do.' The names of the Indians are subjoined. The Indians were from Mingo Town, about Eighty Miles from Redstone. After this the People were more Confirmed that there was no danger of War. They dropped the design of Petitioning, and said they would wait the issue of the Treaty; some, however, declared they would move off. We had sent a messenger to Cheat River, and to Stewart's Crossings, on the Yougheoghenny, with Several Proclamations, requesting them to meet us at Guesse's place, as most Central for both Settlements.

"On the thirtieth of March about thirty or fourty men met us there. We proceeded as at Red Stone, reading the Act of Assembly, and a Proclamation, and endeavored to convince them of the Necessity and Reasonableness of quitting the unpurchased Land, but to no purpose. They had heard what the Indians had said at Red Stone, and reasoned in the same manner, declaring that they had no Apprehensions of a War; that they would attend the Treaty, and take their Measures accordingly. Many severe things were said of Mr. Croghan, and one Lawrence Harrison treated the Law and Government, with too much disrespect. On the thirty-first of March, We came to the Great Crossings of Yougheoghenny, and being informed by one Speer, that eight or ten Families lived in a place called Turkey-Foot, We sent some Proclamations thither by said Speer, as We did to a few Families nigh the little Yough, judging it unnecessary to go amongst them. It is our Opinion that some will move off in Obedience to the Law, that the greatest Part will wait the Treaty, and if they find that the Indians are indeed dissatisfied, We think that the whole will be persuaded to Remove. The Indians coming to Red Stone, and delivering their Speech, greatly obstructed our design. We are, your Honour's most obedient,

"Carlisle, April 11, 1768.

"May it please your Honour:

"Upon my return to Carlisle, the 8th instant, I had the Pleasure to see your brother Allen, and Secretary Shippen, in their way to Fort Pitt. The Secretary requested a Copy of our Journal, believing it might be of some Use to them, with which they were immediately furnished, and further advised me to wait an Opportunity rather than hire an Express, to Transmit to your Honour our Papers, which I am favored with in the present Bearer. Sir, there is one thing which, in preparing the Extract of our Journal, happened to be overlooked, viz.: The People at Red Stone alleged that the removing of them from the unpurchased Lands, was a Contrivance of the Gentlemen and Merchants of Philadelphia, that they might take Rights for their improvements when a Purchase was made. In confirmation of this, they said that a Gentleman of the name of Harris, and another called Wallace, with one Frigg, a Pilot, spent a considerable time last August, in viewing the Lands and Creeks thereabouts. We promised to acquaint your Honour with this.

"I am of Opinion, from the appearance the People made, and the best intelligence We could obtain, that there are but about an hundred and fifty Families in the different Settlements of Redstone, Yougheoghenny and Cheat River. . . ."[2]

Council at Fort Pitt, 1768.—The council with the Indians was held at Fort Pitt, now Pittsburgh, beginning on April 26th, and ending on the 9th of May. There were, among others of the whites, George Croghan, deputy Indian agent for Indian affairs, John Allen and Joseph Shippen, Jr., commissioners on the part of Pennsylvania, and the officers of the garrison. Of the Six Nations there were 12 chiefs, 6 chief warriors, with 293 warriors, besides women and children; of the Delawares, 13 chiefs, 9 chief warriors, with 311 warriors, besides women and children; of the Shawanese, 10 chiefs, 8 chief warriors, with 141 warriors, besides women and children; Munsies, 5 chiefs, with 196 warriors, besides women and children; Mohickons, 3 chiefs, with 90 warriors, besides women and children; of Wyandots, 7 were sent; in all there were 1103 Indians, besides women and children.[3] 1768.

The conference, lasting for many days, was upon two principal matters: one, the pacification of the Indians as to murders of members of different tribes committed at a late date, particularly the killing of several Indians upon the Susquehanna by one Frederick Stump and John Ironcutter, his servant, on January 10th preceding; and the other, the arranging of difficulties which had arisen on account of the settlements already made and being made upon their lands. Many speeches were delivered, and much formality observed at this well-attended conclave. The passions aroused among the natives by the outrages admitted to have been committed upon them were rather easily arranged by shrewd management and a "condolence" in the shape of presents, amounting in value to upwards of fifteen hundred pounds, and towards the end of the council the matter of the removal of the settlers from the Monongahela was the d—d Dutchman," and wished to give up his land for another tract. He then settled just opposite Redstone Old Fort, where West Brownsville now stands, and no doubt lived there at the time of Rev. Steel's visit. The tract was warranted to him on April 5, 1769, under the name of "Indian Hill."

[1] Wampum was an Iroquois word meaning a mussel. Such shells are made into beads, each a cylinder about three-eighths of an inch long, and about one-eighth of an inch thick, and strung upon a string, constituting a string of wampum. Such strings plaited together made a belt of wampum. Everything of moment transacted at solemn council, and every message delivered, was ratified by a string or belt of wampum.

brought forward. It will be remembered that Allen and Shippen had been supplied by Rev. Mr. Steel, at Carlisle, with a copy of the minutes of the conference had with the settlers at Redstone on the 27th of March. The whites seemed to await with some impatience an opportunity to open the debate upon this subject; and indeed it would appear, as shown by the result, that there was more anxiety on the part of the Pennsylvania authorities that the settlers should remove, than there were on the part of the Indians themselves, on whose account such furious legislation and proclamations had been made and issued.

At the session on the 2d of May, a week after the council began, Tohonissagarrawa, a chief of the Six Nations, by whom as the lords paramount all the lands in this western country were claimed to be owned, said through an interpreter to Brother Onas, as the Governor of Pennsylvania was called,—

"Brother: It is not without grief that we see our Country settled by You without our knowledge or Consent; and it is a long Time since we first complained to you of this Grievance, which we find has not yet been redressed, but settlements are still extending further into our Country. Some of them are made directly on our war Path, leading to our Enemies Country, and we do not like it.[1] You have laws amongst you to govern your People by, and it will be the Strongest Proof of the Sincerity of your Friendship to let us see that you remove the People from our Lands; as we look upon it, it will be Time enough for you to settle them, when you have purchased them and the Country becomes yours."[2]

The reply of the Pennsylvania commissioners was made on the 4th of May, in which they expressed their pleasure that they had so good an opportunity of acquainting the Indians of the endeavors which had been made to do them justice in this respect, and proceeded to recite the issuance by the Governor of the proclamation which had been unobserved. "As the people," said they, "who have settled on your Lands came chiefly from Virginia, the Governor of that Province, likewise, issued Proclamations and orders to the same Purpose. The King's General too [His Excellency General Gage] hath twice sent parties of Soldiers to the people living on Red-Stone Creek and the Monongahela to warn them off your Lands, and threatened them with seizing their persons and effects if they refused to move away." They then informed the Indians of the passage of the law inflicting the penalty of death on all persons who should continue on their lands after the first day of the next June; that four prudent and honest men had been sent among the settlers to distribute copies of the act, and of the proclamation commanding strict obedience to it under the penalties provided; that the messengers had returned home and reported to the Governor that they had executed his orders, but that they were told by the people settled at and near Redstone Creek that they had been encouraged by the Indians themselves to continue on those lands, but they would obey the law and move off without delay:

"But Brethren we are sorry to tell you that as soon as the Men sent by the Governor had prevailed on the settlers to consent to a compliance with the Law, there came among them eight Indians, who live at Mingo town, down this River, and desired the People not to leave their Settlements, but to sit quiet on them till the present Treaty at this place should be concluded. The People on receiving this advice and encouragement suddenly changed their minds, and determined not to quit their places till they should hear further from the Indians."

The commissioners then quoted the speech made at Redstone by the Mingo warriors,[3] and expressed their great anxiety at this behavior of the Indians, as it had absolutely frustrated the efforts being made to remove the intruders from their lands. They then proposed that the Indians would send some of their wise and prudent men "to the people settled at Redstone, Youghogany, and Monongahela, to contradict the advice of the eight Indians from the Mingo Town," and the commissioners would send an "honest and discreet" white man to accompany them:

"And, Brethren, if after receiving such notice from you they shall refuse to remove by the time limited them, you may depend upon it the Government will not fail to put the Law into immediate Execution against them."

On the 6th of May, Beaver, a chief of the Delawares, said,—

"The Country lying between this River and the Allegheny Mountains has always been our Hunting Ground, but the White People who have scattered themselves over it have, by their hunting, deprived us of the Game, which we look upon ourselves to have the only right to, and we desire you will acquaint our Brother, the Governor, of this, and prevent their Hunting there for the future."

The proposition to send messengers to the settlers was assented to on the 9th of May, and White Mingo and the three deputies sent from the Six Nations were selected by the Indians, to be accompanied by John Frazer and John Thompson, appointed as the "honest and discreet" representatives of the province. The latter received written instructions, definite and imperative in terms, but when ready to depart up the river they sent several times for the Indian messengers, "who at last came to the fort and acquainted them that they had been seriously considering the business they were going to be sent on, and it now appeared to them so disagreeable that they could by no means consent to undertake it, and immediately returned the wampum which had been given them." They at first set up a want of power from their superiors, being present only as deputies, and they further added "that the driving white people away from their settlements was a matter which no Indians could with any satisfaction be concerned in, and they thought it most proper for the English themselves to compel their own people to remove from the Indians' lands."

[2] That the Indians, though wild and untamable, were nevertheless not devoid of reason and eloquence an extract is made from a speech on the land question at another council by Gachradodow to Asaragos, the Indian name of the Governor of Virginia: "The world at the first was made on the other Side of the great Water, different from what is on this Side, as may be known from the different Colours of our Skin and of our flesh, and that which you call Justice may not be so amongst us; you have Laws and Customs and so have we. The Great King might send you over to conquer the Indians, but it looks to us That God did not approve of it. If he had he would not have placed the Sea where it is as the Limits between us and You." For an affecting scene, showing real eloquence on the part of the uncultivated Indian, see the proceedings of the council of condolence held at Shamokin (Sunbury), in 1769, to appease the Indians on account of the murder of Seneca George's son by a nephew of old Conrad Weiser, in IX. Col. Records, 618.

The Indians appointed to carry the message having declined, the commissioners vainly endeavored to procure the appointment of others in their stead, and therefore concluded to abandon the attempt. But before they left for Philadelphia, Guyasutha came with Arroas, a principal warrior of the Six Nations, to the commissioners at their lodgings, where the former made the following statement, giving most judicious reasons for their failure to send the messengers, as they had engaged to do:

". . . We were, all of us, much disposed to comply with your Request, and expected it would have been done without difficulty, but I now find that not only the Indians appointed by us, but all our other young Men are very unwilling to carry a Message from us to the White People, ordering them to remove from our Lands. They say they would not chuse to incur the ill will of those People; for if they should be now removed they will hereafter return to their Settlements when the English have purchased the Country from us. And we shall be very unhappy if, by our Conduct towards them at this time, we shall give them Reason to dislike us, and treat us in an unkind Manner when they again become our Neighbors. We therefore hope, Brethren, you will not be displeased at us for not performing our Agreement with you, for You may be assured that we have good Hearts toward all our Brethren, the English."

The result was that the settlers, "chiefly from Virginia," were not removed from the homes they had established in the then wilderness of the Monongahela valley; nor did any of them suffer the death penalty provided by a timid Assembly; if such had been the case there might have been a less number of the Linns, the Colvins, the Teagardens, the Browns, the Rodgers, the Swartses, the Martins, the Harrisons, within and near the bounds of Washington County than we have at present.

The efforts to dispossess the early settlers are thought to have produced two very natural consequences: first, they tended to alienate the settlers from the Pennsylvania government, and to turn them the more readily to Virginia in the boundary controversy which after a time followed; and again, they contributed, as has been thought, with other influences to maintain a good feeling between the early pioneers and the Indians, by which means the filling up of the lands westward of the Alleghanies to the Ohio River was rapidly promoted.

Treaty at Fort Stanwix, 1768.—The speech of Guyasutha clearly foreshadowed an expected treaty by which the Indian title to this country was to be purchased. Accordingly in the fall of the same year, under the supervision of Sir William Johnson, the treaty was held at Fort Stanwix, now Rome, Oneida County, N. Y., for the important purpose of settling a general boundary line between them (the Indians) and the neighboring colonies.[1]

[1] IX. Col. Records, p. 545.

Governor Penn intended to be present at this treaty on Sept. 7, 1768, but was obliged to return before it was opened. The Council was not begun till October 24th, and on November 5th was transacted the business which more immediately concerns us, to wit, the purchase by the proprietary government of Pennsylvania of the Indian title to a large part of the lands of the province. This purchase included all of the present counties of Washington, Greene, Fayette, Westmoreland; all of Allegheny and Beaver south of the Ohio River, and then extended northeast to Susquehanna and Wayne.

The settlers were now no longer to be disturbed by the government on account of objections from the Indians, and on Feb. 26, 1769, notice was given by an advertisement from the land-office that on the 3d of April ensuing the land-office would be opened to receive applications for lands within the new purchase at the rate of five pounds sterling per one hundred acres, and one penny per acre quit-rent. No person was to be allowed more than three hundred acres. On the day when the office was opened numbers of applications for lands within the limits of Washington County were granted, as will soon appear by a reference to a few of them.

Settlers West of Monongahela.—But before the 3d of April, when lands west of the Alleghenies could lawfully be acquired,—indeed, before the council at Fort Pitt and the treaty at Fort Stanwix,—there were many settlements made west of the Monongahela River, and extending well towards the Ohio. It is now believed, indeed documentary evidence has made it clear, that in and prior to 1767 settlers had made improvements here and there all over the beautiful country extending from Fort Pitt southward to the boundary line and between the two rivers named. It is not purposed here to show these settlements in detail, but it is beyond doubt that as early as 1767 Everhart Hupp, Abraham Teagarden, and Jesse Baumgartner settled at or near the mouth of Ten-Mile Creek, and on April 3, 1769, the first day of the opening of the land-office, warrants were granted to William Preston, Robert Harrison, Paul Fooks, and David Evans for the four tracts which afterwards made up the Morganza property when purchased, a little before 1796, by Col. George Morgan. On April 5, 1769, Phineas Kellum, or Killeum, obtained a warrant for a tract on the North Fork of Ten-Mile Creek.

The records of the land-office show that on June 15, 1769, applications were made by Abraham Hunter for three hundred acres "on a branch of Shirtees Creek [by the path leading] from Fort Bird to Mingo Town, joining land of Joseph Hunter, Jr., including Catfish, a Delaware Indian's improvement;" by Joseph Hunter, for three hundred acres "on a branch of Shirtees Creek, joining land of Abraham Hunter;" and by Martha Hunter, 1769.

for three hundred acres "on a branch of Shirtees Creek, joining land of Joseph Hunter, Jr." These lands when surveyed on Nov. 11, 1769, were named respectively, in the order above given and going from south to north, Catfish Camp, Grand Cairo, and Martha's Bottom. The borough of Washington, on Oct. 13, 1781, was laid out on parts of the two tracts called Catfish Camp and Grand Cairo. Each one of the surveys was returned as containing over three hundred and thirty acres. Fort Bird, or more properly Fort Burd, was at Redstone, now Brownsville, and the Mingo town was on the west side of the Ohio, just below where Steubenville now stands.

The same year, 1769, without more particularity as to dates, warrants were granted to Mary McDowell for a tract afterwards passed to Henry Taylor, just northeast of Washington; to William Drummond and to John Allman, for tracts on Chartiers Creek; to Michael Marshall, for a tract in what is North Strabane; to Indian Peter, for the Indian Hill tract, between "Krepp's Knob" and the Monongahela, on part of which West Brownsville stands. In 1770, Joseph Parkinson had acquired property at 1770. Parkinson's Ferry, now Monongahela City; Gabriel Cox, on Peters Creek; John Grimes, on Buffalo Creek; and in the fall of that year Henry Taylor, the grandfather of Matthew Taylor, came out from Cecil County, Md., and made his improvement on the lands known to this day as the Rich Hills, just northeast and in sight of Washington.[1]

Henry Taylor, as shown by the note hereto, built his cabin in the fall of 1770, and returned to Cecil

[1] To illustrate by actual instance the method of acquiring titles by what was called "Tomahawk Improvements," as well as the manner of life of our early settlers, the reader will pardon the following extracts. In 1782 suits in ejectment were brought in our Common Pleas Court by Henry Taylor, claimiog under his Pennsylvania rights; and the questions at issue were, which party had made the earliest settlements. Depositions were taken and filed, and from those on the part of Mr. Taylor are made the following extracts, relating as appears from them to the Taylor lands, a part of which are at this day owned by Matthew Taylor, a grandson of Henry Taylor.

Deposition of Alexander Bowling, July 3, 1783:

"That in the fall of the year 1770, he this Deponent saw Henry Taylor at Monongahela River, on his way out to Chartiers Creek; he understood he was going out to take up land, and he applied to him to show him Land that was not yet Improved: in answer to which he told said Taylor he was about gathering his Corn and he could not go until he had it finished. Van Sweringen being present said he was going out that way to see some Land he had got of Baltzer Shilling, & that he would be glad of his company, and that said Baltzer could show him Land plenty. Said Taylor went out in a few days with said Sweringen. This Deponent further says that some time after, he went out to work on a tract of land he had out on said Chartiers Creek, & on his way he saw Henry Taylor and Van Sweringen surveying and Marking a Line which said Taylor informed that he was marking off his Claim and said Taylor was marking this White Oak Tree which stands about north-west of where Mr. Yeates now lives, and that he then and there saw a plain marked line towards the south east; said Taylor asked this Deponent to stay with him all night, pointing over the ridge and that his Cabban was a little way from where they then stood."

Deposition of Isaac Williams, Jan. 30, 1784:

"That in the year 1770, that he saw Henry Taylor living in the forks of Chartiers Creek, that he understood he was Improving that Land that is now in Dispute, and to make a Settlement thereon; that he hired his Brother John Williams to strenthen the improvements then Claimed by said Taylor; that he new the work to be Done, as he hunted to get provision for the men while they were doing the work; that he also knew Taylor to pay his brother a Riffle Gun and some Cash when he went away, and on his return paid the sum of Eight pounds: that when they were doing the work he found a new Cabban on the White Oak Ridge appearing to have been built that Winter; that on Taylor's finding that some person had been at work on his Land, he employed me to Enquire and if possible find out who it was, and to purchase their Claim, which I found it to be Hugh Sidwell, and purchased the said White Oak Cabban and all his claim, in Behalf of said Taylor, for the sum of twenty shillings."

"Question asked by Henry Taylor at Isaac Williams, if Baltzer Shilling did not make a practice of Running about Through the woods and Marking and Hazing trees and calling that his Improvements and that in a Great Number?

"Answered, he knew it well to be his constant practice."

Deposition of John Williams, Jan. 30, 1784:

"That in the faul of the year 1770, that he seen Henry Taylor Living in a new Cabban on the Rich Hills which he understood was built by said Taylor, as he Frequently Lodged at his house at the Monongahela River, when going and returning from Chartiers; that he seen said Taylor having Surveying Instruments to Run out his Land; that when he was hunting there he saw New Marked lines which was Called Taylor's Lines; at that time he seen no Improvements on or within said lines but what was called Taylor's, and that Cabban on the Rich Hill where Taylor was living in was the first he knew or ever seen on the forks of Chartiers Creek; That said Taylor Hired him that same faul to farther Improve the said Land, . . . that he Deadened some Timber and Cut and Split five hundred rails on the Rich Hill Tract, five hundred rails on the White Oak Ridge Tract, that he built a good Cabban and Split five hundred rails on another Tract, for which the said Taylor paid him before he left the Settlement a Riffle Gun and four Dollars Cash, and the next spring when the said Taylor Returned from Cecil County, Maryland, he paid me the Remainder Honorably, being Eight pounds pennsylvania money."

Deposition of Hugh Sidwell, July 4, 1783:

"That he built a cabin about Christmas, 1770, and sold his claim to Isaac Williams for Henry Taylor for twenty shillings."

Deposition of Isaac Grier, Jan. 12, 1783.

"That in y^e year 1770, about the last of November or the beginning of December, he this Deponent did assist Henry Taylor to Build a Cabban on the Waters of Chartiers Creek, on a piece of Rich land, to y^e southwest of the Cabban where the said Taylor now lives in, now known by the name of the burned Cabban & after Finishing the afsd Cabban on Friday, spent the Next Day in same being Satirday and the next Day being Sunday set on our way towards the Monongahela River, where we met with Van Sweringen, Baltzer Shilling, James Hendricks & another young man to me unknown who I understood had been surveying Lands. We lodged that night at John Williams hunting Camp; said Sweringham, Shilling, Hendricks, and stranger Passed on towards afsd River; the next day being Monday saw the afsd Sweringham, Baltzer Shilling, Mr. Hendricks & stranger at Shillings Cabban near Pigeon Creek, and we then and there saw Joseph Alexander and his father on their way out to Chartiers to see some Land, and Farther this Deponent saith not."

Deposition of Frederick Lamb, Jan. 2, 1784:

"That some time in the Month of April in the Year 1772, he came to Polser Shilling where he was doing some work on a certain Tract of Land where Richard Yates now dwells on, he had seen on a Tree a small distance from them, with H T on it, which at the time he thought it had been Henry Taylor's Claim and he asked the said Polser was not this Henry Taylor's Land; Polser answered, Yes, it is his Claim, and that he was working there on purpose to affront said Taylor; and he wanted Taylor to come there on purpose to quarrel with him, and give Taylor a Thrashing, and would Black his eyes well. He then told Polser that Henry Taylor was a civil man and would not fight with him and that twas better to let it alone. Then Polser said he would go up and let Van Sweringen have it, for Van was not ashamed of any mean action and he knew Van to be Rogue enough to cheat Taylor out of the Land."

County, Md. On the 1st day of February, 1771, before his return in the spring following, he obtained orders of survey for his improvements, one of which recites:

"Whereas Henry Taylor of the County of Cecil in Maryland, hath requested that we would grant him to take up one hundred and fifty Acres of Land on the Middle Fork of Chartiers Creek, Bounded on the North-East by Robert Hamilton's Land and on the Path leading from Catfish Camp to Pittsburg, including his Improvements in the County of Cumberland: Provided the same Land does not interfere with any Manor or appropriated Tract in the said County of Cumberland," etc. The warrant is signed, "John Penn."

In the month of October, 1770, George Washington made a journey by way of Braddock's road and Fort Pitt and down the Ohio River to the Kanawha, and kept a diary of his observations. As of date the 23d of the month he describes his approach to the two Cross Creeks, one emptying into the Ohio from the east and the other from the west, and proceeds: "About three miles or a little more below this, at the lower point of some islands which stand contiguous to each other, we were told by the Indians that three men from Virginia had marked the land from hence all the way to Redstone; . . . at this place we encamped."

It is indicated from what has already been written of our early settlements, and it plainly appears upon a full examination, that the lands lying between the Monongahela and the Ohio were settled from the outer limits to the central portion by approaches from the mouths and up the courses of the streams flowing into the rivers. The pioneers first stopped along the rivers themselves, then gradually followed up the branches into the upper lands. And accounts heretofore published have stated, and investigations made in the preparation of this work have confirmed the statement, that by the year 1774 there was scarcely a section of the lands lying between the two rivers which did not contain the cabin of the pioneer.

It has been seen that in February, 1771, when the warrant heretofore quoted was issued to Henry Taylor, the land the survey of which it authorized was described as in the county of Cumberland. Cumberland County, the sixth county of Pennsylvania established, was erected by the act of Assembly passed Jan. 27, 1750, just about the time when the earliest settlers reached the valley of the Monongahela. It embraced all the lands lying westward of the Susquehanna River and north and west of the county of York, extending by a shading of inhabitants growing lighter and lighter with the approach to this Western wilderness. The seat of justice being for a little while at Shippensburg, and afterwards where it is to-day, at Carlisle, it is apparent that its jurisdiction was not felt to any extent by the settlers of our county; still the inhabitants were not without the protection of the law, for Thomas Gist, son of Christopher Gist, settled at Mount Braddock, in Fayette County, was commissioned a justice of Cumberland County in 1770,[1] and in the same year Col. William Crawford was also appointed a justice of that county.[2] His home was opposite where Connellsville now is, on the Youghiogheny River.

Bedford County Erected.—It was not a long while, however, after our first settlers arrived until the seat of justice was brought a little nearer to their new homes, for on March 9, 1771, Bedford County was erected out of a part of Cumberland. Like the latter county, Bedford was originally of wide dimensions, and the reason assigned for its formation was "the great hardships the inhabitants of the western part of the county of Cumberland lie under from being so remote from the present seat of jurisdiction and the public offices." To indicate its great extent it may be stated that its boundaries were: "Beginning where the province line crosses the Tuscarora Mountain, and running along the summit of that mountain to the gap near the head of the Path Valley; thence with a north line to the Juniata; thence with the Juniata to the mouth of Shaver's Creek; thence northeast to the line of Berks County; thence along the Berks County line northwestward to the western boundaries of the province; thence southward, according to the western boundary of the province,[3] to the southwest corner of the province; and from thence eastward with the southern line of the province to the place of beginning." 1771.

An examination of the records shows that the settlers west of the mountains had much more to do in the administration of justice that when they were within the jurisdiction of Cumberland County with its seat of justice at Carlisle. Still, for the reason that it was not yet definitely established that that portion of the county lying between the Monongahela and the Ohio was within the boundaries of Pennsylvania, the then inhabitants of that locality seem not to have received much notice from the county authorities.

The first court of Bedford County was held at Bedford, one hundred miles east from Pittsburgh, on April 16, 1771, and George Wilson, Esq., who lived near the mouth of Georges Creek, in what was afterwards Fayette County, was one of the justices. Among the first justices of the peace were Col. (then Captain) William Crawford and Thomas Gist, hereinbefore mentioned as justices of the county of Cumberland, and Dorsey Pentecost, then living on his "plantation" called "Greenway," in the Youghiogheny settlement, but who came to the eastern branch of Chartiers Creek about 1777, and was afterwards the second president judge of Washington County.

[3] Observe here that at this date, 1771, it is not indicated what the western boundary of the province was, whether it was a meridian line, or whether it corresponded with the sinuosities of the Delaware, which was the eastern boundary, nor is it, of course, indicated where that boundary lay. This will be explained in the chapters upon the Boundary Controversy.

Dorsey Pentecost was a member of the first board of county commissioners of Bedford County, as was also John Stephenson, a half-brother of William Crawford, and residing in the same locality, near what is now Connellsville. The third paper put on record by the first recorder of deeds is "a mortagage made this 14th January, 1771, between Francis Howard, now of Fort Pitt, Ensign in his Majesties 18th regiment of Foot, and Edward Hand, Surgeon's Mate in said reg't, for 1636 acres of land lying on both sides of Chartiers Creek."[1] This land is referred to in an extract from the records of the Quarter Sessions of Westmoreland County, hereafter quoted. Upon the deed books of Bedford County is also a curious deed, dated February, 1770, from Anonquit, Enishera, and Connehracahecat, the first a chief and the others two deputies of the Six Nations, for "our full leave and liberty of us, and for and in behalf of the said Six Nations, to settle on a tract of land on the north side of the Alligania River opposite to Fort Pitt, in form of a Cemi Circle from said landing, &c." The deeds of the Indians to private persons, however, were of no validity.

The territory belonging to Washington County as originally erected, that is, lying between the Monongahela and the Ohio and extending from Pittsburgh to the southern boundary line (thus including Greene County), was embraced within two of the original Bedford County townships, to wit, Pitt and Springhill, the former embracing the northern part and the latter the southern.

At the first session of the court of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, held at Bedford, for Bedford County, the 16th of April, 1771, the court proceeded to divide the county into townships. The limits of Pitt and Springhill townships were as follows:

"Pitt.—Beginning at the mouth of the Kiskeminetas and running down the Allegheny River to its junction with the Monongahela, then down the Ohio to the western limits of the Province, thence with the western boundary to the line of Spring Hill, thence with that line to the mouth of Red Stone Creek, thence down the Monongahela to the mouth of Youghiogheny, thence with the line of Hempfield to the mouth of Brush Run, thence with the line of said township to the beginning.

"Spring Hill.—Beginning at the mouth of Red Stone Creek and running thence a due west course to the western boundary of the Province, thence south with the Province line to the southern boundary of the Province, then east with that line to where it crosses the Youghiogheny to Laurel Hill, thence with the line of Tyrone to Gists, and thence with that line to the beginning."

The official assessment rolls for these townships for 1772 show that Pitt township had fifty-two landholders, twenty tenants, and thirteen single freemen; Springhill, three hundred and eight landholders, eighty-nine tenants, and fifty-eight single freemen; and we find many familiar names given as residing either at that date or soon afterward in the original Washington County.

The assessment roll for 1772 of Springhill township shows the following names among others: Thomas Brown (Ten-Mile), Jeremiah Beek (Beck), William Brashear, William Crawford (the Quaker, afterwards of East Bethlehem), Josiah Crawford, Oliver Crawford, John Casteel, Henry Enoch, John Garrard, John Garrard, Jr., Zachariah Goben (Gapen), James Harrod, William Harrod, Levi Harrod, Thomas Hughes (Muddy Creek), Andrew Link, Jacob Link, John Moore, David Morgan, John Masterson, Daniel Moredock, James Moredock, John Swan, Robert Sayre, Abraham Teagarden, George Teagarden, Henry Vanmetre, Gabriel Cox, Bernard Eckerly, James Carmichael, Samuel Eckerly, John Hupp, William Teagarden, and John Williams. Among the names from the Pitt township list are Jacob Bausman, who settled this side of the Monongahela, at Pittsburgh, in the original Washington County, and was the grandfather of John Bausman, late of Washington, Pa.; John Barr, John Campbell, Samuel Heath, and John McDonald.[2] But few of the many familiar names have been copied, not only to avoid errors,—because Springhill and Pitt townships embraced territory east of the Monongahela as well as to the west of it,—but also for the reason that the purpose is merely to indicate with what great rapidity our western country was being filled with settlers as soon as it was possible to acquire lawful titles after the peace of 1764, the treaty of 1768, and the opening of the land-office in 1769.

CHAPTER X.

II.

Westmoreland County Erected—The Provincial System—Westmoreland County Records—The Revolution—The Revolutionary Judicial System—Westmoreland Courts Reorganized.

Westmoreland County Erected.—And now, by the 1st of January, 1773, the pioneers west of the mountains had become stronger in numbers and so well established that they determined 1773. to possess, if possible, the machinery of courts of justice and of other offices created for the protection of property and preservation of rights for their own immediate use. So, on Jan. 26, 1773, there is found in the journal of the House of Representatives the following:

"A petition from a Number of the Freeholders and Inhabitants on the West-Side of Laurel-Hill, in the County of Bedford, was presented to the House and read, setting forth that they labor under very great Hardships and Inconveniences in being so remote from the Courts of Justice, and the public offices in the said County, many of the Petitioners living at the Distance of an Hundred Miles from the County Town, and the Roads so very bad at some Seasons as to be almost impassable;

—that in consequence thereof, the Fees of the Sheriff and other Officers are much increased, and become a heavy Grievance to the Petitioners, who therefore most humbly pray the Honourable House, to erect the said Part of the County of Bedford, West of Laurel Hill, into a separate County.] Ordered to lie on the Table."

Another petition of like tenor was presented to the House and read on January 30th, and on the same day the consideration of the petitions was resumed. On February 12th the Governor acquainted the House that he should be ready to pass the bill which had been prepared in accordance with the petitions referred to, when presented to him for that purpose. The act, as passed and approved by the Governor on the 26th of the month, provided:

"That all and singular the lands lying within the province of Pennsylvania, and being within the boundaries following, that is to say; beginning in the province line, where the most westerly branch, commonly called the South or Great Branch of the Youghiogheny River crosses the same; then down the easterly side of the said branch and river to the Laurel Hill; thence along the ridge of the said Hill, northeastward, so far as it can be traced, or till it runs into the Allegheny Hill [Mountains]; thence along the ridge dividing the waters of Susquehanna and the Allegheny River, to the purchase line, at the head of Susquehanna; thence due west to the limits of the province, and by the same to the place of beginning; shall be, and the same is hereby declared to be, erected into a county, henceforth to be called Westmoreland.[2]

Thus Westmoreland County, including, as it did when erected, all of Fayette, Greene, Washington, Allegheny west of the Allegheny River and south of the Monongahela River, and all of Beaver south of the Ohio, as well as all of Indiana and that part of Armstrong east of the Allegheny River, was of magnificent proportions. The Laurel Hill range of mountains divides the county from Somerset and Cambria. The next range west is the Chestnut Ridge, and between the latter and Laurel Hill is the beautiful valley of Ligonier, about ten miles wide. West of Chestnut Ridge the county assumes the character of "an original table-land or inclined plane, scooped out into hills and valleys by the action of the water. Near the larger streams the hills are higher and more precipitous; between the sources of the smaller streams they rise in gentle undulation, nicely suited to the purposes of agriculture. From the summit of Chestnut Ridge the country seems to spread out into a vast verdant plain."[3]

This territory was destined to be for years the theatre of interstate strife, as well as of the worst forms of border warfare. The frontier line, dividing the settlements of the pioneers from the Indian country, had now moved to the west of the mountains, and while our early people were habituating themselves to the orderly recognition of the law, terror and outrage, as well as a conflict of jurisdiction, made their homes to be homes of unrest.

By the provisions of the organic act, the courts of Westmoreland County were to be held at the house of Robert Hanna until the court-house should be built. Hanna's settlement was about three miles northeast of the present Greensburg. Having opened a house of public entertainment, a number of other dwellings had been established near Hanna's place, and here were held the courts of Westmoreland County until some time after the county of Washington was erected. At this place, called Hanna's Town, were the first courts of justice ever held by an English-speaking people west of the Alleghany Mountains; and as the territory afterwards constituting our own county, and our own early settlers had, as will shortly appear, much to do with the courts and officials of Westmoreland County, it will be proper to give in some detail a sketch of the organization of that county, as the names cited will hereafter become quite familiar.

The first justices of Westmoreland County were included in a general commission issued by the Supreme Executive Council on Feb. 27, 1773. It embraced the following well-known names: William Crawford, then living opposite the present Connellsville, afterwards the colonel in command of the expedition against the Sandusky Indians; Arthur St. Clair, afterwards a major-general in the Revolution; Thomas Gist; Alexander McKee, afterwards, with Simon Girty, a deserter to the British-Indians; Robert Hanna; William Louchry; George Wilson, living near the mouth of Georges Creek, opposite Greene County; Eneas Mackay, Joseph Spear, Alexander McClean, James Caveat, and others. On Jan. 11, 1774, affairs at Pittsburgh assuming a threatening aspect by reason of the proceedings of Dr. John Connolly in the establishment of the Virginia jurisdiction, to be discussed at length hereafter, additional justices were added to the commission, among whom were Van Swearingen, then living east of the Monongahela, opposite Greenfield, afterwards becoming the first sheriff of Washington County; Alexander Ross, a trader and speculator at Pittsburgh, and a Tory when the Revolution soon afterwards began; Andrew McFarlane and Oliver Miller, both afterwards Washington County men. In 1777, Edward Cook, the proprietor of Cookstown, now of Fayette County, and James Marshall, thought to be the James Marshel afterwards the first county lieutenant, recorder, and register for Washington County, became justices for Westmoreland County. All these justices were "commissionated" by the Governor to be justices of the Court of General Quarter Sessions of the peace and of the County Court of Common Pleas for the said county, and William Crawford, being the first named in the commission, became by a well settled usage the presiding justice; in 1775, however, having accepted a commission from the Governor of Virginia during the boundary controversy, he was dismissed from his office as a Pennsylvania magistrate.

The record of the Provincial Council for Saturday, Feb. 27, 1773, reads as follows:

[1] 6 Votes of Assembly, 433.

[2] The reader will observe that here again, as in the erection of Bedford County, there is no attempt to define the western boundary.

[3] Day's Historical Collections, 680.

"A Law having passed yesterday for erecting a part of the County of Bedford into a separate County, called Westmoreland, and Arthur St. Clair, Esq., the Present Prothonotary, &c., of Bedford, having requested the governor to Grant him the offices in the new County, in lieu of those he now holds in Bedford County, His Honor was this day pleased to appoint him to the Several offices following, in the said County of Westmoreland, by three Separate Commissions, under the Great Seal of the Province, viz.: Prothonotary or principal Clerk of the County Court of Common Pleas, Clerk or Register of the Orphans' Court, and Recorder of Deeds."[1]

The courts of Westmoreland County are now organized, and, as the extracts soon to be given from their records will show, the people west of the Monongahela were within the benefits afforded thereby. Up to this time no roads had ever been established by authority of law south of Pittsburgh and between the two rivers, and whatever legal jurisdiction had been exercised was, like the condition of the settlements themselves, of a kind not very concentrated.

The Provincial System.—It should be remembered, too, that at this time Pennsylvania was still a proprietary province, its people bearing allegiance to the English sovereign. To understand the form of government, soon to be changed (not very radically, it is true, except as to the sovereign power), it must suffice to say that the proprietary form of government was one in which the proprietary was granted the ownership of the lands, and became the Governor of the people to whom the lands were conveyed by him, subject only, as to his political power, to the supreme sovereignty of the king. By the charter granted by Charles II. in 1681,[2] he conveyed to Mr. Penn, his heirs and assigns, all the territory within the limits specified:

"And him, the said William Penn, his heirs and assigns, we do by this our royal charter, for us, our heirs and successors, make create and constitute the true and absolute proprietary of the country aforesaid, and of all other the premises; saving always to us, our heirs and successors, the faith and allegiance of the said William Penn, his heirs and assigns, and of all other proprietaries, tenants and inhabitants, that are, or shall be, within the territories and precincts aforesaid; and saving also unto us, our heirs and successors, the sovereignty of the aforesaid country; to have and to hold, possess and enjoy the said tract of land, country, isles, inlets, and other the premises, unto the said William Penn, his heirs and assigns, forever; to be holden of us, our heirs and successors, Kings of England, as of our castle of Windsor, in the county of Berks, in free and common socage, by fealty only, for all services and not in capite, or by Knight service; yielding and paying therefor to us, our heirs and successors, two Beaver skins, to be delivered at our Castle of Windsor, on the first day of January, in every year; and also the fifth part of all gold and silver ore which shall from time to time happen to be found within the limits aforesaid, clear of all charges. And of our further grace, certain knowledge and mere motion, We have thought fit to erect, and we do hereby erect, the aforesaid country and islands into a province and seignory, and do call it Pennsylvania, and so from henceforth will have it called."

This, the Section III. of the charter, clearly indicates the absolute character of the grant to Penn, so far as his ownership and power of disposition of lands were concerned. In the vault of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania at Philadelphia are preserved the original certificates for the payment of the last installment of two beaver-skins deliverable to the king, in accordance with the terms of the section quoted. They are dated Jan. 1, 1780, and the formalities observed and apparent upon the papers are somewhat interesting.

The form of government and the judicial system authorized by the charter and established for the province of Pennsylvania may now be briefly noticed.

The Governors were appointed by the proprietaries, by and with the advice of the king and Council. The executive department was composed of the Governor and his Council, and did not sit as an upper house, the entire legislative power being vested in a single body of representatives chosen by the people.

After 1710 the highest court was the Supreme Court, with law and equity sides, the equity jurisdiction, however, being discontinued by the act of 1767. The court consisted of four judges learned in the law, one of whom was distinguished in his commission as the chief justice, and any two of whom might hold the court. It held two sessions in banc annually in Philadelphia, and had appellate jurisdiction over all the inferior courts in criminal, and in civil cases above fifty pounds in value. The judges were required to go the circuit of the several counties twice a year, if necessary, to try issues of fact pending therein, and these circuit courts might be holden by one judge. These judges, as well as the justices of the inferior courts and of the peace, appear to have been commissioned to hold office for life, or during good behavior, which meant at the will of the Governor, by whom they were appointed.

The county Courts of Common Pleas, Courts of General Quarter Sessions, and Orphans' Courts, "for protecting the interests of minors and regulating the affairs of decedents," were held by the justices of the peace of the county, who were not required to be learned in the law, and whose number depended entirely upon the will of the Governor. Three of the justices constituted a quorum, and the one first named in the commission became the president by long established usage. The courts were held four times in each year. The Court of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace appeared to be the principal county court, and in it might sit all the justices of the peace of the county, while the Court of Common Pleas and the Orphans' Court were held by the same justices, or some of them, specially commissioned therefor; but these courts seem to have been of minor importance, the Supreme Court drawing to it the chief part of the civil business. Criminal causes of a high grade, such as were triable only in the Court of Oyer and Terminer, were tried by commissioners specially appointed and authorized. The power thus to create commissioners for the trial of criminal offenses becoming objectionable, was first prohibited by the State constitution of 1790.

[1] X. Col. Records, 77. As we shall meet with Arthur St. Clair frequently hereafter, a brief sketch may be acceptable. He was born in the town of Thurso, in Caithney, Scotland, in 1734; was educated at the University of Edinburgh; studied medicine with the celebrated Dr. William Hunter, of London, but in 1757 entered the military service of Great Britain in the Sixtieth, or Royal American, Regiment of Foot, and became a subordinate of Gen. Amherst in America. He was with Gen. Wolfe in the reduction of Quebec and the battle on the Plains of Abraham, Sept. 13, 1759, and resigning from the British army in 1762, first removed to Bedford, then to Ligonier valley in 1764. In 1770 he was appointed surveyor for Cumberland County, and the same year became a justice of the courts and a member of the Council for that county. When Bedford County was created, in 1771, he was made a justice of its courts, prothonotary, clerk, and register. When the conflict of jurisdiction occurred between Pennsylvania and Virginia, he was a zealous Pennsylvanian, but the Revolution coming on, he entered the Continental service, was made a major-general, became an intimate with Gen. Washington, and served with distinction to the end of the war. In 1783 he was a member of the Council of Censors (St. Clair Papers, 116); delegate to Congress, 1785-87, and president of that body in 1787; appointed Governor of the Northwestern Territory in 1788. In January, 1790, fixed the seat of justice for the Territory at Cincinnati, naming the place after the order of which he was president in Pennsylvania from 1783 to 1789. In 1791 suffered a severe defeat in an engagement with the Indians of the Miami and the Wabash. He resigned his commission of general in 1792, and in 1802 he was removed by President Jefferson from his governorship. Being the life-long friend of Washington, he was also an ardent Federalist. Retiring to a small log cabin on Chestnut Ridge, he spent the remainder of his days in poverty. Truly republics are ungrateful!

The lowest court was that of the local magistrate or justice of the peace, with the jurisdiction to examine into charges of criminal offenses, and in civil matters to try causes involving less than forty shillings.

The sheriffs (and the coroners as well) were appointed by the Governor within three days after return made to him from two persons chosen by the freemen of each county, and in default of such appointment the first person on the return was entitled to the office.

The prothonotary or "Principal Clerk" and the clerk of each county were each appointed from three persons nominated by the justices of the peace, and if one of them were not commissioned within ten days, the highest on the list held the office.[1]

Westmoreland County Records.—The early records of the courts of Westmoreland County, to return from the digression, were kept by Arthur St. Clair, whose several commissions as "Prothonotary or Principal Clerk" of the Court of Common Pleas, clerk of the Court of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, and clerk of the Orphans' Court are dated Feb. 27, 1773, in the thirteenth year of the reign of His Majesty George III., and purport to have been granted by "Richard Penn, Esq., Lieutenant-Governor and Commander-in-chief of the Province of Pennsylvania and Counties of New Castle, Kent, and Sussex on the Delaware." The penmanship displayed in the keeping of these records is indicative of a high degree of care and method.

[1] The outline above given of the provincial judicial system is believed to be accurate, though in the conflicting accounts by different writers to be sure of accuracy is of some difficulty. The reader is referred to Gordon's History of Pennsylvania, 121 and 547–48; Lodge's English Colonies, 231, 232; Futhey and Cope's History of Chester County, 364, et sequitur.

William Crawford was the president judge, as stated, until the order of Council for his removal was passed in 1775.[2]

It has been thought best, for the sake of clearness, first to cull from the records of Westmoreland County the transactions affecting the inhabitants west of the Monongahela up to the time of the organization of our own county, then to retrace our way to the beginning of the "Boundary Controversy," occurring immediately upon the organization of Westmoreland, and not terminated until immediately preceding the creation of Washington County.

The very first act of the first court ever held by English-speaking people west of the Alleghany Mountains, to wit, the Quarter Sessions of Westmoreland County, is recorded as follows:

"At a court of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace held at Robert Hanna's Esquire for the county of Westmoreland the sixth day of April in the thirteenth year of the reign of our Sovereign Lord George the third, By the Grace of God of Great Britain and Ireland King, Defender of the Faith, &c., And in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-three, Before William Crawford, Esq., and his associates Justices of the same court.

"The Court proceeded to divide the said county into the following townships by the limits and descriptions hereafter following, viz.:"

Omitting the townships which did not extend west of the Monongahela, the townships created by this order were the two following, in the language of the order:

"Pitt.—Beginning at the mouth of Kiskeminitas and running down the Allegheny River to its junction with the Monongahela, then down the Ohio to the Western Limits of the Province, thence up the Western Boundary to the line of Springhill, thence with that line to the mouth of Redstone Creek, thence down the Monongahela to the mouth of Youghiogheny, thence with the line of Hempfield to the mouth of Brush Run, thence with the line of said Township to the Beginning."

* * * * * * * * *

"Springhill.—Beginning at the Mouth of Redstone creek and running thence a due West course to the Western Boundary of the Province, thence by the Province line to the Southern Boundary of the Province, thence east with that line to where it crosses the Youghiogheny, thence with the Youghiogheny to Laurel Hill, thence with the line of Tyrone to Gist's, and thence with that line to the beginning."[3]

As will be seen hereafter, Washington County when stricken off from Westmoreland embraced all the territory lying between the Monongahela and the western boundary of the State, and south of the Monongahela and Ohio at Pittsburgh. Therefore, drawing a line due west from the mouth of Redstone Creek (Brownsville), this line is the division line between the old townships of Westmoreland County. That line passed through East Bethlehem township

[2] "At a Council held at Philadelphia, 25th January, 1775. . . . Captain St. Clair appearing at the Board and representing that William Crawford, Esquire, President of the Court in Westmoreland County, hath lately joined with the Government of Virginia in opposing the Jurisdiction of Pennsylvania in the County, the board advised the Governor to supersede him in his office as Justice of the Peace and Common Pleas. A Supersedeas was accordingly ordered to be issued."—X. Col. Records, 228.

[3] It is observed that as to Pitt and Springhill townships, embracing the territory west of the Monongahela River, Westmoreland County adopted the lines previously established by Bedford County.

centrally, through the southern ends of West Bethlehem and Amwell, and centrally through Morris, East Finley, and West Finley, these being the townships bordering on Greene County. All of Washington County north of that line was in Pitt township; all south of that line, as well as all of Greene County, was in Springhill township.

The first grand inquest contains the name of William Teegarden, Jr. This was either a William Teegarden who lived on the old Forbes road to Pittsburgh, or another William Teegarden who kept a ferry near the mouth of Ten-Mile Creek.

The first cause entered at this term of court was:

"The King	}	Forcible Entry. True Bill. Defendant being three times called appears not: process awarded; per cur."
v.
Garrett Pendergrast, Jr.

It is interesting to note that the first proceeding in any court of justice west of the Alleghanies to lay out a public highway was instituted for the benefit of residents west of the Monongahela, for at this the first term of the Quarter Sessions of Westmoreland County, upon the petition of inhabitants of Springhill township, John Moore, Thomas Scott, Henry Beason, Thomas Brownfield, James McClean, and Philip Shute were appointed viewers to view and lay out a road:

"To begin at or near the Mouth of a run known by the name of Fish Pott run about two miles below the Mouth of Ten Mile Creek, on the west side of Monongahela River (it being a convenient place for a ferry, as also a good direction for a leading road to the most western parts of the Settlements), thence the nearest and best way to the Forks of Dunlap's Path and General Braddock's Road on the top of Laurel Hill."[1]

At the second term of the Quarter Sessions, held July 6, 1773, the grand inquest contained inter alia the following names: James Crawford, living nearly opposite Fredericktown; James Devore, adjoining Andrew Devore, also kept a ferry at the mouth of Pigeon Creek; Brice Virgin, and Henry Taylor. At this term there were two bills of indictment for Riot found against Henry Vanmetre, Abraham Vanmetre, Jacob Vanmetre, Simeon Moore, Jesse Pigman, Nathan Freaks, Thomas Roach, Daniel Murdoch (Moredoch), Charles Swan, John Swan, John Swan, Jr., Thomas Swan, Thomas Hughes, James Johnson, and one Harrison, all residents of what is now Greene County.

The grand inquest of the next term, Oct. 6, 1773, contained the names of Joseph Beelor, residing on Chartiers Creek, below the mouth of the Eastern Branch, in Peters township, James Crawford, and John McDonald. At this term there was a true bill for a misdemeanor, name not given, found against Simon Girty,[2] and process for his arrest awarded. James Brigland pleaded guilty to an indictment for a felony, and was punished by "ten lashes well laid on" at the public whipping-post and a fine of twenty shillings. Luke Pickett suffered a similar punishment for a like offense. William Hawkins was held in £100, and Joshua Wright in £50, in a recognizance for the appearance of the former at the next term to answer to "a certain bill of indictment."[3] Benjamin Kuykendall was held in £20, with William Teegarden as his surety in £10, for his appearance as a witness against Hawkins. At this time it is recorded: "John Williams is appointed constable in Pitt township over the Monongahela River." This may have been the same John Williams who helped to build Henry Taylor's cabin, near Catfish Camp, in 1770. Record is also made at this term of the following:

"Upon the Petition of Divers Inhabitants of the township of Pitt, in the county of Westmoreland, Humbly shewing that whereas your Petitioners together with a number of other Inhabitants of the Township aforesaid labor under great difficulties and disadvantages for want of a Public Road leading from the South-West side of the Monongahela River opposite to the town of Pittsburg, by Doctor Edward Hand's Land on Chartiers to the Settlement up said creek supposed to be at or near the western Boundary of the Province of Pennsylvania: And praying the Court would nominate and appoint men to view and examine the same and if they could find it necessary & Convenient that then & in such case to lay out a Public Road as they shall think may be least to the damage of the Neighbors or parties concerned & least injurious to the Inhabitants thereabouts and make return thereof under their hands to the Court, agreeable to an Act of Assembly in such Case made and Provided. The Court appoints John Campbell, Benjamin Ronow, Phillip Ross, Christopher Miller, Jacob Bousman, and Andrew Robison to view the said road & that they or any four of them if they see cause do lay out the same as a Public Road by courses & distance the nearest and best way and make Report of their Proceedings to the next Court."

[1] It is singular that the stream of water entering the river "two miles below the mouth of Ten-Mile," though the distance is not quite so great, should have had the name Fish Pot in 1773, the same name by which it is still known. The old road laid out across the river at this place was long a leading thoroughfare to the West. John S. Williams, in 2 American Pioneer, 442, describes the trip of his family from North Carolina to Marietta in 1802: "The mountain roads (if roads they could be called, for pack-horses were still on them) were of the most dangerous and difficult character. I have heard an old mountain tavern-keeper say that, although the taverns were less than two miles apart in years after we came, he has known many emigrant families that stopped a night at every tavern on the mountains. I recollect but few of our night stands distinctly, say . . . Tomlinson's (near Cumberland), Beesontown (Uniontown), Simpkins', and Merrittstown. . . . After a tedious journey we all arrived safe at Fredericktown, Washington Co., Pa., where we stopped to await the opening of the land-office at Steubenville. . . . Made another start . . . in the afternoon and lay at Benjamin Townsend's at Fish Pot Run; we lay also at the Blue Ball, near Washington; at Rice's, on the Buffalo; and at Warren, on the Ohio." This party crossed at Millsboro' doubtless, although there was a ferry at the mouth of Fish Pot Run kept by James Crawford, and to this day the Crawfords reside across the river opposite. Oliver Crawford kept a ferry at the mouth of Muddy Creek.

[2] This was the same Simon Girty, notorious in the border warfare, who, in the spring of 1778, with Alexander McKee and Matthew Elliott, deserted to the British-Indians, and in 1782 was present at the burning and torture of Col. William Crawford.

[3] Both William Hawkins and Joshua Wright lived upon Peters Creek, and the latter was the great-grandfather of Joshua Wright, of Washington. Benjamin Kuykendall also lived on Peters Creek, near the Monongahela River, and was afterwards a justice in the Yohogania court. "I crossed the Monongahela at 11 o'clock to-day, and went on foot two and one-half miles to Kerkendall's mills, where I bought four barrels of best flour at 11*s.* 8*d.* per barrel, and one barrel of whiskey, thirty gallons, at 2*s.* 6*d.* per gallon, all to be landed free of charge at the river this evening. The landlord tried his skill at fishing, but caught nothing except a terrible fish, if such it may be called, named an alligator."—Col. May's Journal, Tuesday, May 6, 1786, p. 32.

This was the first road ever laid out by judicial proceedings in any part of what is now Washington County, and doubtless one terminus was in the neighborhood of Washington. John Campbell lived in Lower Chartiers, Jacob Bausman on the "South Side" of the river at Pittsburgh, where his descendants yet reside, and Dr. Edward Hand was surgeon's mate "in his Majesties 18th reg't of Foot" at Fort Pitt before that post was abandoned by the English forces.

At this term record was made of the oaths of Joseph Beelor and James Caveat as county commissioners.

The next term of the Quarter Sessions was held the first Tuesday of January, 1774, when Andrew Pierce, Moses Brady, Morgan Morgan, David Allen, Henry Taylor, and John Kennon (doubtless John Canon) were appointed viewers "upon the petn. of 1774. divers Inhabitants of Springhill & Pitt township," to view a road "to begin at Thomas Guess's [Gist's, Fayette County,] and from thence to Paul Froman's Mill near the River Monongahela, [mouth of Mingo], and from thence to another Mill of the said Paul Froman's on Chartiers Creek."[1]

At the term of the Quarter Sessions held in April, 1774, there were quite a number of cases against Baltzer Shilling, who annoyed old Henry Taylor in 1770 by marking trees, etc., as noticed in a note to a preceding page. There was also an indictment for Riot against Adam Alexander, also mentioned in the note referred to. Charges of the offenses of Riot and Forcible Entry and Detainer are quite frequent all through these records, originating no doubt in personal controversies concerning land titles. The records of this term's business in the Quarter Sessions show the following interesting road proceeding:

"Upon the Petition of a number of the Inhabitants of Tyrone and Menallin townships, setting forth that they are under difficult circumstances for want of a Public Road leading into Braddock's Road on any part of the mountain; And further, we would observe to your worships that from the natural situation of the country, we at present who live on the west side of Monongahela River, are obliged frequently to carry our corn the distance of twenty miles to the mill of Henry Beason, near Laurel Hill, and in all probability at some seasons of the year will ever have to do so; And praying your worships would be pleased to grant us a Public Road to begin on the east side of the Monongahela River, near the Old Fort, thence the nearest and best way to intersect Braddock's Road near the forks of Dunlap's Path and said road on the top of Laurel Hill.

"The court appoints Richard Waller, Andrew Linn, Jr., William Colvin, Thomas Crooks, Henry Hart, and Joseph Graybill, viewers, etc."

Beeson's mill, where Uniontown now is, being fed by a mountain stream, was more available in dry seasons of the year than either of Froman's mills on the "West Side." Thomas Crooks was then, or soon afterward, of near Hillsborough. Joseph Graybill, of Fallowfield township, was an ancestor of the present Grables on Pigeon Creek.

Passing now to the October term, 1775, of the Quarter Sessions, among the names of the grand jurors are Joseph Brownlee, Thomas Applegate, and William Teegarden. The state of 1775. social science of the times is illustrated by a record made at this term, which is copied entire:

"The King } Felony (true Bill): Defendant being arraigned
v. } pleads guilty and submits to the Court.
Elizabeth Smith. }

"Judgment that the said Elizabeth Smith be taken this afternoon (being the eleventh instant) between the hours of three and five, and there to receive fifteen lashes on her Bare Back well laid on; that she pay a fine of eighteen shillings and five pence to his Honour the Governor; that she make restitution of the goods stolen; that she pay the costs of prosecution and stand committed till complied with. Sheriff received his fee and fine; clerks fees and attorneys fees paid.

"Judgment."

But this was not the end of poor Elizabeth Smith's case. She was an indented servant, i.e., a white person sold for a term of years, perhaps for her passage-money across the ocean. This is indicated by an order made the next day upon a petition setting forth that the Elizabeth Smith so tried and punished was a servant of James Kinkaid, the petitioner, who prayed that she might be ordered to serve additional time for the period she had been confined in the county jail, and it was so ordered.

The next term of the Quarter Sessions was held on the second Tuesday of April, 1776. Observe that this was but a short time before the meeting of the Provincial Conference at Carpenter's Hall, Philadelphia. There were several orders made relating to township lines, roads, and in recognizances in criminal causes, but no business of importance to us was transacted. Then there is an interregnum, and there are no records of any court held thereafter until Jan. 6, 1778, almost two years. For the last time is "The King" made the plaintiff in criminal prosecutions. A new order of things is about to be established. The people of Pennsylvania are soon to assume the sovereign power of governing themselves. This change of government and the manner in which our jurisprudence was affected by it will now be briefly sketched.

The Revolution.—A "Provincial Convention for the Province of Pennsylvania"[2] had been held at Philadelphia on Jan. 23, 1775, and continued by adjournments from day to day to the 28th. Similar conventions were held in other provinces and colonies. At this Philadelphia convention each of the counties except Westmoreland was represented, and resolutions were passed heartily approving the conduct and proceedings of the Continental Congress, and it was resolved that the convention would faithfully endeavor to carry into execution the measures of the Association entered into and recommended by them, that it was the most earnest wish and desire of the convention to see harmony restored between Great Britain and her colonies, " . . . but if the humble and loyal petition of said Congress to his most gracious Majesty should be disregarded, and the British administration, instead of redressing our grievances, should determine by force to effect a submission to the late arbitrary acts of the British Parliament, in such a situation we hold it our indispensable duty to resist such force, and at every hazard to defend the rights and liberties of America." Other resolutions were adopted designed to stimulate the production of a sufficient supply of articles necessary for subsistence, clothing, and defense; "that from and after the first day of March next no person or persons should use in his, her, or their families, unless in cases of necessity, and on no account to sell to the butchers or kill for the market, any sheep under four years old. And where there is a necessity for using any mutton in their families, it is recommended to them to kill such as are the least profitable to keep." The manufacture of madder and other dye-stuffs and the raising of flax and hemp was also recommended. And it was also significantly

[1] Paul Froman immigrated from York County, Pa., to the Shenandoah valley, Va., in 1732, and very early came thence to this country. His mill on Chartiers Creek was on the Eastern Branch, and the same with Beck's Mills in North Strabane. The tract on which it stood contained fourteen hundred acres, and was conveyed by Froman to Dorsey Pentecost, Nov. 20, 1777.

"Resolved, unanimously, That saltpetre being an article of great use and consumption, we recommend the making of it, and are further of opinion it may be done to great advantage.

"Resolved, unanimously, That the necessity we may be under for gunpowder, especially in the Indian trade, induces us to recommend the manufacturing of that article as largely as possible by such persons who are or may be owners of powder-mills in this province."

Of course this saltpetre and gunpowder were for use only in trade and innocent consumption! The necessity for the production of every article required for consumption—nails and wire, steel, paper, glass, wool-combs and cards, copper sheets, bottoms and kettles, fulling-mills, barley, tin plates, and printing types—was strongly impressed upon the people; and it was finally resolved that the Committees of Correspondence for the city and liberties of Philadelphia should be a standing Committee of Correspondence for the several counties here represented, "and that if it should at any time hereafter appear to the Committee of Correspondence of the city and liberties that the situation of public affairs renders a provincial convention necessary, that the said Committee of Correspondence do give the earliest notice thereof to the committees of the several counties."

Thus it came about that on June 18, 1776, "a number of gentlemen met at Carpenter's Hall, in Philadelphia, being deputed by the committees of 1776. several of the counties of this province, to join in a provincial conference, in consequence of a circular letter from the committee of the city and liberties of Philadelphia, inclosing the resolutions of the Continental Congress of the 15th of May last."[1] At this convention of deputies, known as "The Provincial Conference," Westmoreland County was represented by Edward Cook and James Perry. The resolutions of the Continental Congress referred to recommended the total suppression of all authority under the king of Great Britain, and provided,—

"That it be recommended to the respective assemblies and conventions of the united colonies, where no government sufficient to the exigencies of their affairs has been hitherto established, to adopt such government as shall, in the opinion of the representatives of the people, best conduce to the happiness and safety of their constituents in particular and America in general."

By special order this resolution of such great moment was read a second time, and after mature consideration, as the record states,

"Resolved, unanimously, That the said resolution of Congress of 15th of May last is fully approved by this conference.

"On motion, Resolved, unanimously, That the present government of this province is not competent to the exigencies of our affairs.

"On motion, Resolved, N. C. D.,[2] That it is necessary that a provincial convention be called by this conference for the express purpose of forming a new government in this province on the authority of the people only."

The conference then proceeded to determine the number of which the convention should consist, and what should be the qualifications of the electors and of the persons who might be elected. It was resolved that eight representatives be sent to the convention by the city of Philadelphia, and eight by each county of the province, and that an elector should be a freeman, qualified by the laws of the province to vote for representatives in Assembly, of the age of twenty-one years, who had lived one year in the province immediately preceding the election, and had "contributed at any time before the passing of this resolve to the payment of either provincial or county taxes, or had been rated and assessed towards the same;" and there was framed a test or oath renouncing allegiance to the British sovereign, to be administered if thereunto by any one required. On the next day,—

"On motion, Resolved, unanimously, That whereupon as the county of Westmoreland hath been exempted from the payment of taxes for three years last past, and thereby many persons may be excluded from a vote at the ensuing election in consequence of the foregoing regulations, contrary to the intention thereof, therefore every person of 21 years of age, being a free man residing in said county, shall be admitted to vote, he being an associator[3] and having lived one year in the province next

[3] The appellative "Associators" had quite an early origin in Pennsylvania history.

In November, 1747, when through disagreement between the proprietary representatives and the Provincial Council the province was left defenseless, the people of the city of Philadelphia entered into a voluntary military association for the general defense of the city and the province. They armed themselves, elected their own officers, and, presenting themselves before Council, were recognized and commissions ordered for their commanders. Chester County followed with a similar association in December, and Bucks County in January. These associations died out with their occasion,—the hostilities with the French.

When the news of Concord and Lexington reached Pennsylvania, in the latter part of April, 1775, a military association was formed in Philadelphia with branches in every county, and the first act of the Council of Safety, June 30, 1775, was "to approve of the Association entered into by the good people of this Commonwealth for the defense of their lives, liberties, and properties."

A committee of Council formed Articles of Association for them, to be found in X. Col. Records, Sec. S., 308. The "Associators" organized and composed the first battalion that went into service, formed the Flying preceding the election, and taking the test aforesaid, if thereunto required."

It was subsequently determined that any one qualified to vote for members of Assembly by the laws of the province might be elected a member of the convention; and it was further provided that a test oath should be taken by the member-elect before taking his seat, renouncing allegiance "to George the Third, King of Great Britain," and not then could the person-elect be entitled to his seat until he had subscribed the following declaration:

"I, ——, do profess faith in God, the Father, and in Jesus Christ, His eternal Son, the true God, and in the Holy Spirit, one God blessed forever more; and do acknowledge the holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be given by divine inspiration."

A committee was also appointed who reported the time, place, and manner of holding the election for the members of the convention, whereby, their report being adopted, the several counties were divided into election districts, the voting-places designated, and the officers to hold the elections appointed. Westmoreland County was divided into two districts, the first embracing the people on the south side of the "Youghiogena," to vote at Spark's fort, and the second embracing the people on the north side of said river, to vote at Hannas Town.[1] The judges appointed to hold the election at Hannas Town were James Barr, John Moore, and Clement McGeary. Those appointed to serve at Spark's fort were George Wilson, John Kile, and Robert McConnel.

The time appointed for the election of members of the convention was the 8th day of July, 1776, and the election was on that day held at the places designated. It is possible that the voters as they were assembled at Spark's fort may have heard that four days before the Declaration of Independence had been passed and promulgated, for the minutes of the Council of Safety, which had taken the place and assumed the executive duties of the proprietary and his Council, show that on July 5, 1776,

"The President of the Congress this day sent the following Resolve of Congress, which is directed to be entered on the Minutes of this Board:

"'In Congress, 5th July, 1776:

"'Resolved, That Copies of the Declaration be sent to the several Assemblies, Conventions, and Councils of Safety, and to the several Commanding Officers of the Continental Troops, that it be proclaimed in each of the United States, and at the Head of the Army.

"'By order of Congress,

"'JOHN HANCOCK, Presd't.'

"In consequence of the above Resolve, Letters were wrote to the Counties of Bucks, Chester, Northampton, Lancaster, and Berks, Inclosing Copy of the said Declaration, requesting the same to be published on Monday next, at the places where the Election for Delegates are to be held."[2]

The date of the meeting of the convention was also determined by the conference, to wit, July 15, 1776, and after some action recommendatory of the organization of the militia, an "Address of the Deputies from the Committees of Pennsylvania, assembled in Provincial Conference, to the People of Pennsylvania" was prepared and adopted, and a "declaration on the subject of the independence of this colony of the crown of Great Britain" was approved "with the greatest unanimity of all the members," signed at the table, and ordered to be delivered in Congress, when the Provincial Conference, on June 25, 1776, adjourned.

At the election held as provided for on July 8, 1776, for members of the Provincial Convention, James Barr, Edward Cook, John Carmichael, John McClellan, James Smith, John Moore, James Perry, and Christopher Lavingair were returned as elected the representatives of Westmoreland County.

The convention, which was to form a new government "in this province on the authority of the people only," met at Philadelphia at the time appointed, July 15, 1776, and from the instant of its organization assumed the whole political power of the State. It appointed delegates to Congress, and imposed upon them instructions and restrictions designed to preserve the dignity and independence of the new government, but not until Saturday, September 28th, was the great labor of forming the Constitution of 1776 terminated.[3] One provision of the plan or frame of government provided by this constitution may be here quoted as worthy of preservation from oblivion:

"SEC. 36. As every freeman, to preserve his independence (if without a sufficient estate) ought to have some profession, calling, trade, or farm whereby he may honestly subsist, there can be no necessity for, nor use in establishing offices of profit, the usual effects of which are dependence and servility, unbecoming freemen, in the possessors and expectants; faction, contention, corruption, and disorder among the people. But if any man is called into public service, to the prejudice of his private affairs, he has a right to a reasonable compensation. And whenever an office, through increase of fees or otherwise, becomes so profitable as to occasion many to apply for it, the profits ought to be lessened by the Legislature."

The Revolutionary Judicial System.—The changes made in the organization of the courts of justice by the provisions of this our first Constitution will at present be designated only so far as is indicated by certain provisions of an act of the new Assembly, passed Jan. 28, 1777. It will of course be understood that by the Declaration of Independence and the adoption of a frame of Camp at Amboy in August, 1776, and the term is used constantly that year. But in the fall of 1776 the Continental line of Pennsylvania was formed, and in 1777 the Associators are succeeded by the "Militia." In other words, revolution having been inaugurated, the people rose in their own capacity in a military association, held the State until their own representatives, elected under the authority of their own organic law (the Constitution of 1776), were in their seats and had the reins, when the "Associators," as did the California Committee of Vigilance of 1849, subsided and government moved on.

[1] Spark's fort was near Burns' ford, in what is now Perry township, Fayette County. Observe how that the residents west of the Monongahela were disregarded, either as supposed to be within the power of Virginia at that time, or were treated as living south of the Youghiogheny.

government of their own construction the people of Pennsylvania had stricken down all courts and offices established and held under the proprietary government. It was necessary therefore that these courts and offices should be re-established. The act referred to met this requirement, and portions of it, sufficient for our purpose, are as follows:

"WHEREAS, by the unconstitutional power claimed by the British King and Parliament over the American Colonies, and the cruel and oppressive measures which the said King and Parliament have pursued to establish that power, it became necessary for the Colonies to declare themselves Free and Independent States, which was accordingly done pursuant to a resolve of the Continental Congress; Whereupon all authority being in any person under the said King consequently ceased, and the laws enacted by his Representatives here became of no force or effect, although the same were for the most part suited to the circumstances of the people: And whereas, it is absolutely necessary for the well governing every State, that Laws properly adapted to the circumstances of the inhabitants be at all times in force;

"Be it therefore enacted, and it is hereby enacted, by the Representatives of the Freemen of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in General Assembly met, and by the authority of the same, That each and every one of the Laws or Acts of General Assembly that were in force and binding on the inhabitants of the said Province on the fourteenth day of May last, shall be in force and binding on the inhabitants of this State from and after the tenth day of February next, as fully and effectually to all intents and purposes as if the said Laws and each of them had been made and enacted by this General Assembly: and all and every person and persons whosoever, are hereby enjoined and required to yield obedience to the said Laws, as the case may require, until the said Laws or Acts of the General Assembly respectively shall be repealed or altered, or until they expire by their own limitation; and [to] the Common Law and such of the Statute Laws of England as have heretofore been in force in the said Province, except as is hereafter excepted.

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That Courts of Quarter Sessions and Goal Delivery, and Courts of Petty Sessions, Courts of Common Pleas, Orphans Courts, and Supreme Courts, Courts of Oyer and Terminer and General Goal Delivery, shall be held and kept in each respective County in this State at the times and places directed and appointed by the said Laws or Acts of General Assembly, and Circuit and Nisi Prius Courts, as directed in and by an Act of General Assembly of the said Province, passed the twentieth day of May One Thousand seven Hundred and Sixty Seven, entitled, 'An Act to amend the Act for establishing Courts of Judicature within this Province, by the Justices and Judges that shall be hereafter elected and appointed;' the same to commence in each County on the same days of the same months respectively appointed by the said Laws for holding such Courts that shall be next after the Judges or Justices of such Courts are qualified to hold the same, and shall have, use, and exercise all the powers, authority of jurisdiction that by the aforesaid Laws, Justices and Judges of such Courts respectively heretofore have had, used and exercised, and the powers of Chancery given to the Justices by the Constitution of this State, agreeable nevertheless with this Act and such other Act or Acts of General Assembly as shall be hereafter made; and every officer of all and every of the Courts in this State that is or shall be appointed shall have, use and exercise the same or like powers that such officer or officers of the same title, character and distinction might, could or ought to have had, used and exercised under the Charter and Laws of Pennsylvania, until displaced. And all Constables, Overseers of the Poor, Supervisors of the High Ways, and the Wardens and Street Commissioners of the City of Philadelphia, that were last appointed or elected in the said Province, are hereby authorized and strictly enjoined and required to exercise their several and respective powers, and execute, do and perform all the business and duties of their several and respective offices, until others are appointed in their stead and places.

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the President and Council shall appoint one of the Justices in each respective County to preside in the respective Courts, and in his absence the Justices who shall attend the Court shall choose one of themselves President for the time being.

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That every action that was in any court in the Province of Pennsylvania, at the last term the said court was held, except discontinued or Satisfied, shall be and is hereby declared to be in the same state, and on the same rule, and may be prosecuted in the same manner in the courts in each respective County, to be hereafter held and kept, as if the Authority of such Court had never ceased; and if any recognisance has been taken and not returned, it is hereby declared good and valid in Law, and shall be returned and prosecuted as the Laws direct, saving the stile; and where any person had obtained a judgment before any Justice of the Peace, for any debt or sum of money, and such judgment not discharged, the person in whose favor the judgment is may (on producing a transcript of such judgment to any Justice of the Peace in the County where the defendant dwells or can be found) demand and obtain an execution for the money mentioned in such judgment, which shall be of the same force and effect as if the judgment was obtained before the justice that granted the execution."

Westmoreland Courts Reorganized.—Under this act of Assembly were the courts of Westmoreland County reorganized. The last term under the old order of things was held, as has been seen, in April, 1776. The act before referred to was passed the 28th of January, 1777, and on June 11th[1] following, a new commission was issued appointing as justices the following persons among those returned as having been elected, to wit: Edward Cook, John Guthrey, Charles Forman, John Moore, James Marshall, Christian Truby, Philip Rogers, Joseph Huston, Robert Adams, James Bair, Hugh Martin, James McGarraugh, John Beard, Andrew Robb, and Robert Richey. The first term held, however, under the new arrangement was on Jan. 6, 1778, before "Edward Cooke, Esq., President," etc.; no business, however, was done. Nor was there any session in April. 1778.

At July sessions a grand inquest attended, but no trials were had, though there were recognizances for future appearances, one defendant, William Downward, being bound over on a charge of "Misprison of Treason."

At October sessions, 1778, William Mitchell was indicted and tried for misprison of treason; Francis McGinnis and James Finley were witnesses for the Commonwealth. The defendant was convicted, and

"Judgment, that the one-half of his goods and chattels are Forfeited to this Commonwealth and himself be Imprisoned during the present war."[2]

[1] XI. Col. Records, 220.

[2] There were many Tories in this Western country during the Revolution. On March 28th of the same year when Mitchell was tried, Simon Girty, Alexander McKee, and Matthew Elliot deserted to the British-Indians, and Girty became the "notorious renegade."

Withers, in his Chronicles of Border Warfare, 167, writing of the period 1777-78, says, "There was then, unfortunately for the repose and tranquillity of many neighborhoods, a considerable number of those misguided and deluded wretches, who, disaffected to the cause of the colonies, were willing to advance the interest of Britain by the sacrifice of every social relation, and the abandonment of every consideration save that of loyalty to the King. . . . A conspiracy for the murder of the Whigs and for accepting the terms offered by the Governor of Canada to those who would renounce their allegiance to the United States and repair to Detroit by the relenting of one individual was prevented being carried into effect. . . . Scenes of licentiousness and fury followed upon the discovery of the plot. . . . The head only of this fiendish league lost his life, but many depredations were committed on the property of its members. . . . A court for the trial of the conspirators was held at Redstone Fort, and many of them were arraigned at its bar. But as their object had been defeated by its discovery, and as no further danger

At this term John McGrew and Joseph Brouster were held by recognizance on a like charge of misprision of treason, and Joseph Hill was tried for assault and battery, and fined one hundred dollars and costs.

Nothing of moment occurred at the sessions of January and April, 1779. At July sessions, 1779, the grand inquest contained inter alia the 1779. names of Daniel Carmichael, John Reed, John Carmichael, John Vanmetre, and Thomas Scott, names with which we will meet again. Joseph McGarrah, Esq., presided at this term, Edward Cook, the usual president, being himself a defendant in a criminal prosecution. It appears that one Joseph Jones was a reprobate like Andrew Link in the early courts of Washington County, always a defendant in some charge or other. He is now a prosecutor of the president judge in the latter's own court. An act of Assembly had been passed prohibiting the distillation of whiskey or other spirits from malt wheat, rye, or barley, or other grain, flour, etc., so that the army might not be deficient in subsistence. The following record, which a lawyer will read between the lines, will hence explain itself:

"On motion of Michael Huffnagle, Esq., whether the court will order David Sample, Esq., attorney for the state in this court, to prefer a Bill of Indictment against Edward Cook, Esq., for the distilling of whiskey contrary to the Act of Assembly, and whether Mr. Sample is under the Jurisdiction of this Court in ordering him so to do,—the said Mr. Sample in reply says, he is under the Jurisdiction of this court but refuses to prefer a bill for these reasons, that it did appear to him that the prosecution was founded in spite, and he submits to the Court whether they will order him to prefer a Bill. The Court examining the complaint of Joseph Jones made to Charles Foreman, Esq., the day of aforesaid, on which the motion is founded, and finding that the said Joseph Jones hath not said in his oath that the said Edward Cook, Esq., had or did distill whiskey or other spirits from Malt Wheat, Rye, Barley, or from other grain or from any meal or flour, or that the said Edward Cook, Esq., had used or mixed or caused, or procured to be used or mixed any of the same enumerated articles contrary to the Act of Assembly aforesaid, and the Court also calling for the said Jones and examining him on his oath, and he, the said Jones, answering on his oath aforesaid that he cannot say that the said Edward Cook, Esq., used any of the articles above enumerated in order for the making or distilling whiskey or other spirits; for which defect in the complaint aforesaid the Court will not order the Indictment aforesaid to be preferred."

At this term of court an indictment for Forcible Entry and Detainer was found and process awarded against George McCormick, James Wood, Dorsey Pentecost, Benjamin Vanatre (Vanata), John Crow, Michael Springer, and Jonathan Johnston. There being no place west of the Monongahela for the administration of justice, contests as to land titles seem to have sometimes resulted in breaches of the peace. All these defendants were from what is now Washington County.

At January sessions, 1780, held January 4th, "The constables being called and none attending, the court remit the fines on account of the severity of the weather." No business interesting to the 1780. present residents of Washington County was transacted at this or any subsequent term until, perhaps, the January sessions, 1781, when

"On motion the Court do hereby erect that part of West Moreland County Included within the following Boundaries into a township; that is to say, Beginning at the west side of the Monongahela river, at the mouth of Peters creek, thence up the said creek to the head thereof, thence with a straight line to the head of Saw Mill creek, thence down Saw Mill creek, thence up the Ohio River to the mouth of the Monongahela, and thence up this last river to the place of Beginning; and do hereby name the same Wharton."

It will be observed that the whole of this new township lay west of the Monongahela River, in what is now Washington and Allegheny Counties. When Washington County was soon afterward erected it was obliterated.

January term, 1781, was the last session of the Court of Quarter sessions of the Peace for Westmoreland County prior to the erection of Washington County, but at April sessions, 1781. 1781, at which time our courts had not been organized, the Westmoreland County court continued an order for the view of a road from "Washington's Mill to Capt. Van Swearingen's ferry on the Monongahela River and thence to Catfish Camp," and appointed Hezekiah McGrudin, Peter Reasoner, William Morgan, Jacob Vanmetre, Joseph Morehead, and Alexander Morehead viewers. Gen. Washington's mill was at the present Perryopolis, in Fayette County, and Van Swearengin, who afterward became the first sheriff of Washington County, was then just was apprehended from them, they were released, after having been required to take the oath of allegiance to the United States and to bear with the injuries which had been done their property. Those who were suspected for the murder of the chief conspirator were likewise arrainged for that offense, but were acquitted."

At the October sessions, 1779, of the Virginia Legislature, that State then claiming jurisdiction over this part of Pennsylvania, passed an act which is quoted from 10 Hening, 195: "Whereas divers evil disposed persons on the frontiers of this Commonwealth had broke out into an open insurrection and conspiracy, and actually levied war against the commonwealth, and it is represented to the General Assembly that William Campbell, Walter Crockett, and other liege subjects of the commonwealth, aided by detachments of the militia and volunteers from the county of Washington and other parts of the frontiers, did by timely and effectual exertions suppress and defeat such conspiracy, and whereas the necessary measures taken for that purpose may not be strictly warranted by law although justifiable from the immediate urgency and imminence of the danger, be it therefore declared and enacted, that the said William Campbell, Walter Crockett, and all other persons whatsoever concerned in suppressing the said conspiracy and insurrection, or in advising, issuing, or executing any order or measures taken for that purpose, stand indemnified and clearly exonerated of and from all pains, penalties, prosecutions, actions, suits, and damages on account thereof, and that if any indictment, prosecution, action, or suit shall be laid or brought against them, or any of them, for any act or thing done therein, the defendant or defendants may plead in bar, or the general issue, and give this act in evidence."

These three facts—the trials in the Westmoreland County court for misprision of treason, the conspirators brought to bar at Fort Redstone (Brownsville), with the killing of their leader and the Virginia act for the indemnification of the persons named in it—evidently bear an intimate relation to each other; but we have hitherto been unable to discover data sufficient to inform us as to the details of the treasonable conspiracy and who was its leader who lost his life. The court referred to as having been held at Redstone must have been a sitting of magistrates on a preliminary hearing. No court for jury trials was ever held at that place.

opposite Greenfield, at which point he maintained a ferry.

A reference to the early records of the Courts of Common Pleas of Westmoreland County would not disclose matters of public interest to our citizens. There can be but little importance attached to the ordinary civil causes of a court of justice after so long a time has elapsed, although for illustrations of the character of a people there can be but few better resources than to their courts of criminal jurisprudence. For this purpose have the records of the Quarter Sessions of Westmoreland County been so fully abstracted. However, there is one record in the Common Pleas which may perhaps be of interest by way of showing not only the habits then occasionally indulged in, but also the promptitude with which the court whose dignity was insulted took notice of the matter of complaint. The following record is made up at January term, 1774:

"It appearing that F—— D——, one of the attorneys of this court, the duties of his office not regarding, hath of late at divers times and places within the jurisdiction of this court been publicly and notoriously guilty of the shameful vice of Drunkenness, at which times and places aforesaid he did publish several malicious passages highly reflecting on several magistrates of this county, and other mischiefs then and there did unbecoming the character and duty & office of an attorney of the court, It is ordered and considered by the court that the said F—— D—— for such his shameful misbehavior be suspended, and he is hereby suspended and precluded from further using the office, duty & business of an attorney of this court."

It is a singular fact that in the records of Westmoreland County courts, either in the Quarter Sessions or in the Common Pleas, there is to be found but one transaction which can be connected with the Boundary Controversy. The records of the Virginia courts, hereafter to be examined, are full of causes relating to that contention. The single record referred to is the following, found at No. 76, July term, 1775:

"Robert Hanna, Esq.,	Capias Case C. C. C. & Co. October, Ended says Plff.; Plff. for Defdt's App. accepted fees, Clerks fees 12–6."
v.
John Connolly.

The defendant in this action for damages was the Dr. John Connolly who has ever been notorious as the chief agent of Lord Dunmore in the exercise of his Virginia jurisdiction upon the Monongahela. Robert Hanna, the proprietor of Hanna's Town, the seat of justice for Westmoreland County until after Washington County was erected, was one of the county trustees or commissioners and also a justice, and was soon brought into contact with Lord Dunmore's officials. The special subject matter of the action will doubtless hereafter be observed.

Omitting further references to the records of these old Hanna's Town courts, the reader has now been carried in our judicial history to the month of January, 1781. At this time the western boundary line of the State has been established, though not yet actually marked, and it is found that west of the Monongahela River there is room for another new county of magnificent proportions, soon afterward to be erected. But, as has already been disclosed, from about 1774 to August, 1780, two governments were in collision, at times in bitter controversy, in an exercise of jurisdiction, by judicial as well as other civil and military officials, over the same territory, embracing Washington County as originally erected.

The reader is now asked to retrace his steps to the period immediately preceding the erection of Westmoreland County, in order that a view may be had of this contest, long known as the "Boundary Controversy."

The Boundary Controversy.—To write the history of the contention called the "Boundary Controversy," the conflict of jurisdiction between Pennsylvania and Virginia over the territory west of the Alleghany Mountains, is an undertaking arduous, not from lack of original material, but from the immense mass of documentary details, full of interest and importance. A volume could be composed with more ease than a chapter. The writer upon the subject is constantly embarrassed with the riches which lie at his hand. His worry is not to find the information, but to select from that before him. Access to this richness of detail, however, is denied to the general reader.

This contest arose over the lands in which the homes of our own ancestors were first established in this western country. It divided a people who were harassed by Indian incursions, and though during the whole of it necessarily subjected to a common danger from a relentless and savage foe, soon were engaged with the additional burden of a war for independence and liberty; a civil contest, accompanied with great bitterness, continuing at the same time with an Indian war and a struggle, at times hopeless and depressing, with the tyrannous ministry of the mother-country. And the participants were our own early settlers, then engaged in conquering a virgin soil from the forest to fertility. Emigrants over the mountains from three governments—Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia—met together in the valleys of the Monongahela and Ohio, and in the hill country adjacent thereto. Different nationalities, the English, Scotch, Scotch-Irish, Irish, Germans, and French, each were represented, and being without government at first, when they came to be organized for governmental protection, and that too in the midst of constant warfare with a savage foe, and of a war for independence of the mother-country, what wonder that bitterness should ensue and hostilities originate not to be ended for almost a generation of men? It will be seen how men became the extreme of partisans, either for Pennsylvania or for Virginia, and that had it not been for a common danger from a common foe which prevented too wide a separation, the establishment of civil government with the protection of courts of justice and the administration of the laws would have been without doubt attended with much bloodshed.

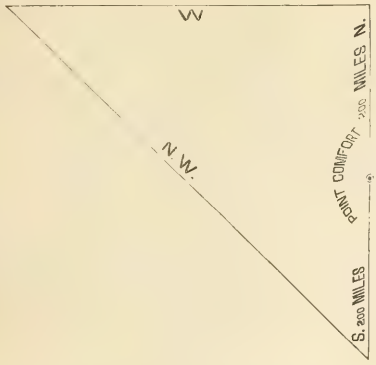
Of the early settlers of Washington County as originally erected it has already appeared that a large majority of them were from Virginia and Maryland, and it will be seen that many of them became the most earnest adherents of the Virginia usurpation; yet, though dissatisfied for a time, some of them, the same persons afterward became of the most honorable of our people, and have left behind them descendants who have always been of our best citizens. The fair-minded reader will therefore make due allowance for partisan prejudice when he meets in the correspondence of early days with such terms as "Banditti," "Mobs," etc., frequently occurring therein; for opprobrious epithets used in political excitements of the present day lose their force and become simply amusing after the heat of the struggle has passed away.

Though the first settlers raised their roof-trees west of the Monongahela as early as 1767, yet not until 1781 did Virginia cease to exercise an active jurisdiction by her courts and judicial officers. Not until that date, or near it, did the settler know whether he belonged to Virginia or to the land of William Penn. And, indeed, in 1774 the proprietary government of Pennsylvania, pending the attempted adjustment of the controversy, proposed to Virginia a boundary line which would have left all of Washington County in her present limits, except a small portion in the neighborhood of West Brownsville, in the Virginia Pan Handle. It is not difficult to conjecture what would have been our fate had this proposition been accepted.

What was the origin of this Virginia usurpation, for usurpation it was? How did it happen that Virginia had any of her territory upon our western border? How did she come to claim jurisdiction over the great Northwestern Territory north and west of the Ohio River, the mother of magnificent States of the Union? An attempt will be made to answer these questions with as much brevity and clearness as possible, and the reader will at once be led into the Boundary Controversy.

The Virginia Title.—The limit to the westward of the province of Pennsylvania was of course definitely known when the charter was granted, although the line itself was not established and marked for a whole century afterwards. To know, then, upon what the claims of the colony of Virginia were based, examination must be made of the royal grants in which she was concerned. The first charter or patent was by Queen Elizabeth to Sir Walter Raleigh in 1583, and it had neither name nor bounds. 1583. Upon Raleigh's return the name Virginia was given to the whole country. All to the southward of the Chesapeake, as low as the Gulf of Mexico, was called South Virginia, and all to the northward North Virginia. But the settlers under this patent, partly from misconduct, the opposition of the Indians, and other calamities, abandoned their efforts, and the patent became extinct.[1]

In 1602, James I. succeeded Elizabeth, and in 1606 issued a new patent incorporating two companies, called the South Virginia Company and the North Virginia Company, afterwards 1606. commonly called respectively the London Company and the Plymouth Company. The South Virginia, or London Company, was not to go below 34°, nor the Virginia, or Plymouth Company, above 45°, but when they made their choice each was to be limited by a square of one hundred miles backward from the sea. The London Company, as it will now be called, settled at Cape Henry, and hence the one hundred miles square warranted by that patent could not have extended to the eastern base of the Blue Ridge. But in 1609 the London Com- 1609. pany received a new patent with the boundaries of their grant enlarged in the following terms:



"All those lands, countries, and territories situate, lying and being in that part of America called Virginia, from the point of land called Cape or Point Comfort, all along the sea-coast to the northward two hundred miles, and from the said Point or Cape Comfort all along the sea-coast to the southward two hundred miles: and all that space and circuit of lands lying from the sea-coast of the precinct aforesaid up into the land throughout, from sea to sea, west and northwest; and also the islands lying within one hundred miles along the coast of both seas of the precinct aforesaid."[2]

The terms of this grant are full of ambiguities, the chief of which is in the words "up into the land throughout, from sea to sea, west and northwest," as containing directions for the northern and southern boundaries. Shall the west line be drawn from a point two hundred miles north of Point Comfort, and the northwest line be drawn from a point two hundred miles south of Point Comfort? If so, then the London Company was limited to a triangle, the western point of which might reach, perhaps, to the Monongahela River, but at a point above and south of Morgantown, extending to no territory adjoining our western boundary, as indicated by the following diagram:

But the interpretation of the ambiguous clause always claimed by Virginia to be the true one was, that the west line should be drawn from the southern end of the four-hundred-mile coast-line, and the northwest line from the northern end of the same, thus:

One will see that, if the latter interpretation were correct, the northwest line would run through the heart of Pennsylvania, passing east of Lake Erie; while the southern boundary running due west, the two would never meet, and Virginia would have owned the greater part of the whole continent. In considering this astounding result, however, in the view of this interpretation, it must be remembered that when the charter or patent to the London Company was granted it was supposed that the South Sea (Pacific Ocean) was much nearer to the Point Comfort coast-line than it really is; for not long before this Sir Francis Drake, from a mountain in the Isthmus of Darien,[1] had seen both the South Sea (Pacific) and the Atlantic, and in 1608, when the London Company were soliciting their patent, an expedition was organized to find a passage to the South Sea by sailing up the James River. And Capt. John Smith was once commissioned to seek a new route to China by ascending the Chickahominy.[2] Without discussing further the propriety of either interpretation of the antiquated ambiguities of this ancient patent, let it be said that, as will perhaps appear hereafter, Virginia always while yet a colony and when she had become a State, referred chiefly to this charter of 1609 as authorizing her jurisdiction, not only over the Monongahela and Ohio Valleys, but also as giving to her an ownership of the entire Northwest Territory. This jurisdiction over the Northwest Territory she refused to cede to the United States, though her refusal endangered the confederation, until in 1781, when, no longer able to resist the influence of other States, especially that of Maryland, she finally gave way so far as to abandon her claims over lands north of the Ohio River, with a condition, however, that the United States would guarantee her right to the territory south and east of the Ohio. This guarantee the Congress of the United States refused, and in 1784 the condition was withdrawn and the cession made absolute.[3] The reader who will examine fully the history of the cession made by Virginia of her jurisdiction over the Northwest Territory will be struck with this fact, that no sister State or government, nor the Congress of the confederation, ever at any time recognized her right to such jurisdiction. Only for the sake of perfecting the Union, such as it then was, was there any respect paid at all to her pretensions.

This absence of respectful recognition was doubtless owing to another matter of fact in the colonial history of Virginia, to which reference may be made as rendering unnecessary any discussion of the ambiguous terms of the charter or patent of 1609. That fact was that in 1624, prior to the grant of Maryland to Lord Baltimore, as well as prior to the grant of Pennsylvania to William Penn, the charter to the London Company was dissolved in the English courts by a writ of quo warranto,[4] and from a proprietary colony, somewhat like that of William Penn, Virginia from that time became a crown colony. On March 22, 1622, the Indians had made a preconcerted attack on the white settlers scattered through distant villages on both sides of James River, and massacred three hundred and forty-seven men, women, and children.[1] "Some time after this massacre," says Oldmixon, as quoted by Thomas Paine,[2] "several gentlemen in England procured grants of land from the company, and others came over on their private accounts to make settlements; among the former was one Captain Martin, who was named to be one of the Council. This man raised so many differences among them that new distractions followed, which the Indians observing took heart, and once more fell upon the settlers on the borders, destroying without pitying either age, sex, or condition. These and other calamities were chiefly imputed to the mismanagement of the proprietors, whose losses had so discouraged most of their best members that they sold their shares, and Charles I., on his accession to the throne, dissolved the company, and took the colony into his own immediate direction. He appointed the Governor and Council himself, ordered all patents and process to issue in his own name, and reserved a quit-rent of two shillings sterling for every hundred acres."

Thus Virginia became a crown or royal colony, and ever after until the Revolution so remained. And the distinction between a colony and a province, such as was Pennsylvania, is well known. Whatever rights are secured to the proprietor of a province cannot be infringed or altered by the crown without the consent of the proprietor, nor abrogated unless by judgment of law founded on some act of commission working a forfeiture or dissolution. But a royal colony is a mere creature of the royal will; its boundaries, all its machinery of government, may be modified, altered, or annulled at the royal pleasure and discretion.[3]

Now, merely adverting to the fact that, in case of a colonial government, possession and settlement alone could give title against a like colony (though 1763. not against a province such as Pennsylvania), about the last act of the English king affecting the limits imposed upon Virginia was the royal proclamation of Oct. 10, 1763. It commences by reciting that by the late treaty with France the crown had received valuable and extensive acquisitions of territory in America; that letters patent had been issued for the establishment within the countries ceded to the crown of "four distinct and separate governments, styled and called by the names of Quebec, East Florida, West Florida, and Grenada." It then marks out the boundaries of these governments, after which it proceeds to annex certain new districts of country to the province of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and Georgia; but the country between the Alleghanies and the Mississippi is not included in any of these. Without annexing the territories lying upon the Monongahela and Ohio, the proclamation contains the following provisions, which in effect confine Virginia beyond the Alleghany Mountains:

"And whereas it is just and reasonable, and essential to our interest and the security of our colonies, that the several nations or tribes of Indians, with whom we are connected and who live under our protection, should not be molested or disturbed in the possession of such parts of our dominions and territories, as, not having been ceded to, or purchased by us, are reserved to them or any of them as their hunting-grounds; we do therefore, with the advice of our privy council, declare it to be our royal will and pleasure that no governor or commander-in-chief in any of our colonies of Quebec, East Florida, or West Florida, do presume upon any pretence whatever, to grant warrants of survey, or pass any patents for lands beyond the bounds of their respective governments, as described in their commissions. As also that no governor or commander-in-chief of our colonies or plantations in America, do presume, for the present, and until our further pleasure be known, to grant warrants of survey, or pass patents for any lands beyond the heads or sources of any of the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean from the west and northwest, or upon any land whatever, which not having been ceded to or purchased by us, as aforesaid, are reserved unto the said Indians or any of them."

Undoubtedly this, a royal decree, limited Virginia to the ridges of the Alleghanies. True, its force was "for the present and until our further pleasure be known," yet no subsequent decree removed the limitation. True, by the treaty of Fort Stanwix, in November, 1768, the lands west of the Alleghanies were purchased from the Indians, and true, also, that subsequent to that treaty Lord Dunmore granted warrants and passed patents for lands west of those mountains; but it is also true that for these unauthorized official acts the Virginia Governor was reproved by Lord Dartmouth, the English Sec- 1776. retary of State.[4] Virginia, thus limited, so remained until the colonies became American States. Her occupation of lands upon the waters of the Monongahela and the Ohio was therefore an usurpation.[5]

It is admitted that Pennsylvania, being a proprietary province, could not have been, and hence was probably not intended to be, affected in the right to make settlements upon the western waters by the proclamation referred to. Though she could not have been deprived summarily of the right, her policy had constantly been not to permit settlements on lands not purchased from the Indians, and when that disability was removed by the treaty of Fort Stanwix, she

[5] At December term, 1845, of the General Court of Virginia, was heard the case of the Commonwealth of Virginia v. Peter M. Garner et al, for an alleged abduction of slaves.

The defendants had met the slaves at the water's edge on the Ohio side of the Ohio River, and were aiding them from their boat, when they were seized by Virginians in ambush upon the bank. The place of the commission of the offense was laid to be in the State of Virginia, that State claiming that all that river to the top of the northwest bank was within its jurisdiction; and that question was about the only one before the court. Hon. Samuel F. Vinton appeared for the defendants, having been appointed by the government of Ohio, and in an able argument, which was printed and is preserved, the whole subject discussed in these pages was exhaustively examined. The final decree of the court was that the offense complained of was not committed within the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia.

immediately extended her active sovereignty to the Ohio. On Feb. 26, 1769, she publicly announced the opening of her land-office for the sale of lands in the new purchase, and on the day of its opening, April 3, 1769, as has been seen, warrants of survey were issued for lands lying in Washington County. But not until 1774 did Virginia presume to pass like orders with regard to lands in the Monongahela valley.

The Penn Title.—The charter granted by Charles II. to William Penn for his province of Pennsylvania was dated March 4, 1681. Section I., in its provisions in respect of the boundaries of the grant, is as follows:

"All that tract or part of land in America, with the Islands therein contained, as the same is bounded on the east by the Delaware river, from twelve miles distance northwards of New Castle town unto the three and fortieth degree of northern latitude, if the said river doth extend so far northward; but if the said river shall not extend so far northward, then by the said river so far as it doth extend; and from the head of the same river the eastern bounds are to be determined by a meridian line, to be drawn from the head of the said river unto the said three and fortieth degree. The said land to extend westward five degrees in longitude to be computed from the said eastern bounds; and the said lands to be bounded on the north by the beginning of the three and fortieth degree of northern latitude, and on the south by a circle drawn at twelve miles distance from New Castle northward and westward, unto the beginning of the fortieth degree of northern latitude, and then by a straight line westward to the limits of longitude above mentioned."[1]

It seems to be made plain by the language quoted from the charter that Pennsylvania was in her limits a province of three degrees of latitude and five degrees of longitude, extending from the fortieth degree, i.e., line 39°, to the beginning of the forty-third degree, i.e., line 42°; and in the absence of an interference with any prior grant, doubtless no other position would ever have been entertained. But in 1632, forty-nine years before the date of Penn's charter, Charles I. had granted a province to Lord Baltimore, which was named Maryland, and of which the bounds were:

"All that part of the Peninsula or Chersonese lying in the parts of America between the ocean on the east and the bay of Chesapeake on the west; divided from the residue thereof by a right line drawn from the promontory or headland called Watkin's Point, situated on the bay aforesaid, near the river Wighco on the west, unto the main ocean on the east; and between that boundary on the south, unto that part of the bay of Delaware on the north, which lyeth under the fortieth degree of north latitude from the equinoctial, where New England is terminated; and all that tract of land within the metes underwritten (that is to say) passing from the said bay, called Delaware Bay, in a right line by the degree aforesaid, unto the true meridian of the first fountain of the river Potowmack, thence verging towards the south, unto the further bank of the said river, and following the same on the west and south, unto a certain place called Cinquack, situate near the mouth of the said river, where it disembogues into the aforesaid bay of Chesapeake, and thence by the shortest line unto the aforesaid promontory or place called Watkin's Point."[2]

It does no violence to a fair construction of this charter to interpret the clause "which lyeth under the fortieth degree of north latitude from the equinoctial" as establishing the point whence the due west line forming the northern boundary of the grant was to be drawn, upon the line 39°, i.e., under or south of the fortieth degree, a degree of latitude being a portion of space lying between two parallels. The first degree of north latitude begins at the equator, and ends at the line 1°. So the fortieth degree begins at line 39°, and ends at line 40°. A point under the fortieth degree of latitude, "where New England is terminated," surely would not be a point in that degree. Therefore Penn's charter may properly have carried him down to parallel 39°, where he would have met Lord Baltimore's grant. Had that parallel been actually made the line between the two provinces, Baltimore would have been a Pennsylvania city, and our southern boundary would have nearly reached to the District of Columbia.[3]

But it was destined that our southern boundary should be neither at 39° as claimed by Penn, nor at 40° as claimed by Lord Baltimore. Of the fortieth degree, divided into two, Pennsylvania got the smaller portion.

Mason and Dixon's Line.—It is not proposed to write of the controversy which arose with Maryland almost as soon as the colonists of William Penn, the proprietor, arrived, although the details of that contest, its strifes, its captures and reprisals, the war waged upon the Susquehanna, and, perhaps above all, the scientific triumph for that day of the running of the line itself, comprise a most interesting part of Pennsylvania history.[4] Suffice it to say that not until Aug. 4, 1763, did the proprietors of Pennsylvania and Maryland, being together in London, agree with Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon, "two mathematicians or surveyors," to run and mark the boundary line between the two provinces. Mason and Dixon arrived at Philadelphia on Nov. 15, 1763, and proceeded at once with their task, but not until 1765 had they completed their work upon the circle and the tangent and got upon the parallel. The completion of that line, henceforth to be known as Mason and Dixon's line, to a point thereon at a crossing of Dunkard Creek, on the southern boundary of Washington County as originally erected, is graphically described by Mr. Latrobe as follows:

"In 1767 the surveyors began operations on the parallel of latitude late. A negotiation with the Six Nations was necessary,[5] which Sir William Johnson had promised to conduct, and this was not concluded before

[3] The writer is aware that Mr. Veech, in his Monongahela of Old, 219, and in his reprint, Mason and Dixon's Line, 18, holds a different opinion, and speaks of the "absurdity of this construction" which would carry Penn's grant to parallel 39°. The most that will be admitted as to his view is that, when the controversy between Penn and Lord Baltimore arose, it was a fair case for a compromise, as the lawyers would say.

[5] Because the lands they were about to pass upon had not yet been purchased from the Indians.

May, so that it was not until the 8th of June that the surveyors reached their halting-place of the preceding year, on the summit of the Little Alleghany. On the 14th of June they had advanced as far as the summit of the Great Alleghany, where they were joined by an escort of fourteen Indians, with an interpreter, deputed by the Chiefs of the Six Nations to accompany them. And so the Indian becomes their protector against the Indians as they mark the boundary of the sovereignties that before long are to obliterate the very memory of their aboriginal possessors. And the escort seems to have had some vague apprehensions in regard to the results of all this gazing into the heavens and measuring upon the earth, and to have become restless and dissatisfied, and on the 25th of August the surveyors note that 'Mr. John Green, one of the chiefs of the Mohawk nation, and his nephew leave them, in order to return to their own country.' The roving Indians of the wilderness, regardless of the escort, begin also to give the party of white men uneasiness; and on the 29th of September, twenty-six of the assistants quit the work for fear of the Shawnees and Delawares. Mason and Dixon have now but fifteen axemen left with them; but, nothing disheartened, they send back to Fort Cumberland for aid, and push forward with the line. At length they reach a point two hundred and forty-four miles from the river Delaware, and within thirty-six miles of the whole distance to be run. And here in the bottom of a valley, on the borders of a stream marked Dunkard Creek on their map, they come to an Indian war-path, winding its way through the forest. And here their Indian escort tell them that it is the will of the Six Nations that the surveys shall be stayed. There is no alternative but obedience, and retracing their steps they return to Philadelphia, and reporting all these facts to the commissioners under the deed of 1760, receive an honorable discharge on the 26th of December, 1767."[1]

The line thus run and marked was 39° 43′ 26″ north latitude. Extending as it did westward beyond the meridian of the first fountain of the Potomac, which meridian formed the western limit of Maryland, as to that extension it was ex parte, and, of course, could not affect the rights of Virginia. Why the surveyors did not stop at the meridian referred to is a mystery, "for there," says Mr. Veech, "their functions terminated. But they pass it by (unheeded, because unknown) resolved to reach the utmost limit of Penn's five degrees of longitude from the Delaware, for so they were instructed." And why were Mason and Dixon stopped in their line at the second crossing of Dunkard Creek? Because by that point passed the Warrior Branch of the old Catawba or Cherokee trail, along which traveled the war parties of the Northern and Southern Indians, and across it the Indian escort would at that time allow not even an imaginary barrier to be drawn.

Thus, as late as the fall of 1768, the southwestern corner of the province of Pennsylvania had not been marked, and her western boundary, whether an irregular line or a meridian, was as yet unknown. The boundary of a tract of land, even of small dimensions, is of the wildest uncertainty until it has been run out by courses and distances and marked upon the ground. One can easily see what results would be brought about by this gap in the boundaries between the province of Pennsylvania and Virginia.

[1] On the eastern half of the line the surveyors planted at the end of every fifth mile a stone graven with the arms of the Penns on the one side and of the Baltimore family on the other, marking the intermediate miles with smaller stones, having a P. on one side and an M. on the other. The stones with the arms upon them were all sent from England. The writer stood beside one of them in June, 1881; one hundred and fourteen years had not obliterated the inscriptions. For want of wheel transportation over the mountains a different and less permanent mode of marking was adopted.

Beginning of the Boundary Contention.—In 1748, Thomas Lee, of the King's Council in Virginia, formed the design of effecting settlements on the wild lands west of the Alleghanies through 1748. the agency of a corporation called the Ohio Company. Lawrence Washington and Augustine Washington, brothers of George Washington, were interested in the scheme. A grant was obtained from the king for five hundred thousand acres of land, to be taken chiefly on the south side of the Ohio, between the Monongahela and Kanawha Rivers. Two hundred thousand acres were to be selected immediately, and to be held for ten years free from quit-rents or taxes, on condition that the company should seat one hundred families on the lands within seven years, and build a fort and maintain a garrison sufficient to protect the settlements.

The object of the company was not only to form settlements, but also to carry on upon a large scale a trade with the Indians, which hitherto had been mostly in the hands of the Pennsylvanians. In 1749 a cargo of goods suited to that trade arrived from London, another to follow the next spring, the whole amounting in value to four thousand pounds sterling. In 1751, Christopher Gist was sent out as the agent to explore the lands, and in 1752 he attended a treaty with the Indians, with whom the French were then tampering.

This treaty was held at Logstown. Col. Joshua Fry and two other commissioners represented the colony of Virginia.

Governor Dinwiddie, of Virginia, became one of the London Company's proprietors, and in 1753 he sent George Washington, then but a youth, as a messenger to the French commandant at Venango to ascertain the purpose of the threatened encroachment. Then followed in 1754 the attempted erection of the fort at the "Forks of the Ohio," in pursuance of its recommendation in Washington's journal as the most eligible place, its capture by the French, and the erection of Fort Du Quesne in its stead, and the inauguration of the French and Indian war. All this was brought about without the agency of Pennsylvania.[2] How this trespass, committed by the colonies of Virginia upon her western limits, called the attention of Pennsylvania to the necessity of a settlement of her western boundary, will presently appear.

Let us now go back to the year 1749. Remember that this was but about five years subsequent to the time when Peter Chartier,[3] from a 1749. Pennsylvania Indian trader, went over to the [2] For an account of the Ohio Company see Sparks' Writings of Washington. Washington's Journal of his tour upon the Ohio in 1753 is published in full in I. Olden Time, 12.

[3] One Chartier in 1717 received a warrant for five hundred acres where "he had seated himself on the Susquehanna River, above Conestoga Creek, including within the survey the improvement then made by him, for which he agreed, on behalf of his son, Peter Chartier, in whose name he desired the survey to be made, to pay for the same."—Rupp's

French. On Nov. 22, 1749,[1] Thomas Lee (heretofore mentioned), president of the Virginia Council, wrote to Governor Hamilton, of Pennsylvania, announcing the formation of the London Company, the purpose to build a fort for the protection of trade with the Indians, in order to retain them from the French and "engage them in affection to his Majestie's subjects," and stating that the Pennsylvania traders were prevailing with the Ohio Indians to believe that the fort was to be a bridle for them, and that the roads which the company were to make were to let in the Catawbas upon them to destroy them, etc., whereby "the carrying the King's Grant into execution is at present impracticable." The letter closed with a request that measures be taken "to put a stop to these mischievous Practices." Another letter from Mr. Lee followed, dated Dec. 20, 1749, wherein he states that he had found it necessary "to write to the Lords of the Treasury, desiring their Lordships to obtain the King's Order for running the dividing Line betwixt this Colony and Yours, else many difficulties will arise upon seating the Large Grants to the Westward of the Mountains." Governor Hamilton, on Jan. 2, 1749, replied in a letter from which is copied:

"As you have mentioned the large grant his Majesty has lately been pleased to make to some gentlemen in Virginia of Lands on the Branches of the Ohio, I am induced to desire your opinion whether it may not be of use that the Western Bounds of this Province be run by Commissioners to be appointed by both Governments in order to assure Ourselves that none of the Lands contained in that Grant are within the Limits of this Province. If you should join with me in Sentiment that the work is necessary to be done I shall at all times be ready to appoint Commissioners,[2] etc."

Again on May 6, 1753, Governor Hamilton wrote to Robert Dinwiddie, who had become Governor of Virginia, acquainting him of hostilities by 1753. Ottawa Indians upon the Allegheny, that information had been received of a threatened invasion by a body of French and Indians, and proceeded:

"I should be well pleased to know whether it be intended by Your Colony to erect any kind of Fort on the Lands granted to the Ohio Company, and my reason for desiring this Information is that I have received Directions from the Proprietors of Pennsylvania to enter into any reasonable measures to assist You in any design of that Sort, only taking Your Acknowledgment that this settlement shall not prejudice their Right to that Country, and further that I may assure The Settlers they shall enjoy the lands they bona fide settle on the common Quit Rent, etc."[3]

To this letter no reply is at hand from Governor Dinwiddie, but on Nov. 24, 1753, the latter wrote that he had "sent a person of Distinction to the Commander of the French Forces on the Ohio to know his Reasons for this unjustifiable Step in invading our Lands." He also said, "We have several workmen gone out to build a Fort at the Forks of the Monongialo with the approbation and desire of the Indians." This "person of distinction" was George Washington.[5]

It has appeared that Governor Hamilton had promised co-operation with Governor Dinwiddie in the expulsion of the French, who had already established themselves upon the upper waters of the Allegheny, but the Assembly, by whom the money was to be supplied, refused it. This body, the representatives of the people, was then in a controversy with the Governor and Council, who represented the proprietors, with respect to the taxation of the unsold lands of the latter, their manors, etc., insisting that their private estate should bear its share of the burden with the property of the people. Neither side would yield, and it followed, which is now stated once for all, that in the French and Indian war Pennsylvania contributed little if anything in men or money save only the supplies and transportation sold and hired by the Germans of the middle and older counties during the period of Braddock's march to his defeat. An excuse was made, in good faith perhaps too, of conscientious scruples, and at the time now under consideration a doubt was also expressed on the part of the Assembly whether the lands on the Ohio were really within the province at all or not. This suggestion brought about on the part of the Governor and Council an examination as carefully made as could then be done. An ascertainment of the distance to the "Forks of the Ohio" by the usual route across the mountains was obtained; a Mr. West was examined, who said "that Col. Joshua Fry, one of the Virginia commissioners (at the treaty at Logstown referred to), who had the Reputation of an excellent Mathematician, with a Quadrant of eighteen Inches Radius, took an Observation of the Sun on the 16th of June, 1752, at a place about a Mile North of Shannopin's Town," and ascertained the latitude of that place to be 40° 29′.[6]

The Governor then communicated to the Assembly, March 2, 1754:

"By these it would have appeared to you that Logstown, the Place where the French propose to have their Head-Quarters, is not at the Distance of Five Degrees of Longitude from the River Delaware, and not to the Southward of Fifteen Statute Miles South of this City, 1754. and that the Course of the Ohio from that Place to Weningo [Venango], which the French have taken Possession of, and from whence they have driven away our Traders, is to the North-East, and consequently nearer to us."[7]

Lancaster County, 120, 121. Peter Chartier was licensed as an Indian trader by the Lancaster court Nov. 3, 1730.—Ibid., 253. In 1739 there was surveyed to him a tract of six hundred acres in Paxton Manor, Lancaster, embracing land afterward the site of New Cumberland. A few years after this survey he settled on or near the Allegheny River, at what was called Old Town or Chartiers Old Town, about forty miles above Pittsburgh. In 1744 he accepted a military commission under the French, and prevailed upon some of the Shawanese Indians of Old Town to move to the French settlements on the Mississippi.—Rupp's Cumberland, 436. He gave his name to the creek flowing northward through one of the most beautiful valleys of Washington County.

On March 13, 1754, Governor Hamilton, having made the examinations stated, wrote to Governor Dinwiddie:

"The Invasions lately made by the French on Parts of his Majesty's Dominions having engaged me to inquire very particularly into the situation of their Forts, and likewise into the Bounds and Extent of this Province to the Westward. I have from thence the greatest Reason to believe not only the French Forts, but also the Forks of Mohongialo (where You propose to erect one and to grant away Two hundred Thousand Acres of Land to such as shall engage in the Intended Expedition to Ohio), are really within the limits of Pennsylvania. In duty to my Constituents therefore, I cannot but remind You of what I had the Honor to write you some time ago upon this subject."[1]

Dinwiddie had previously issued a proclamation of the tenor stated in the foregoing letter. On March 21, 1754, his reply to Governor Hamilton is written, in which are catalogued what had been done by way of men, means, arms, etc., for the expedition, but there is perfect silence as to the chief matter of interest in Governor Hamilton's communication. But in the next letter, of the same date, he says,—

"Your private letter of the Thirteenth Currant I have duly read and am much mislead by our Surveyors if the Forks of the Mohongialo be within the Limits of Your Proprietor's Grant. I have for some time wrote home to have the line run, to have the boundaries properly known that I may be able to keep Magistrates on the Ohio (if in this Government) to keep the Traders and others in good order, and I presume soon there will be Commissioners appointed for that service.

"In the mean time, that no Hindrance may be given to our intended Expedition, I think it is highly reasonable if these Lands are in your Proprietor's Grant that the Settlers thereon should pay the Quit Rents to Mr. Penn, and not to his Majesty, and therefore as much as lies in my power I agree thereto, after the time granted them by my Proclamation to be clear of the Quit Rents ceases; but surely I am from all Hands assured that Logs Town is far to the west of Mr. Penn's Grant."[2]

Attention is called to these letters to and from Governor Dinwiddie, in view of what is to appear hereafter, when many years are elapsed. About the time they were written the fort at the Forks of the "Mohongialo" was being erected, but on April 17, 1754, Ensign Ward was compelled to surrender his incomplete fortification which was to protect the Ohio Company's settlers and the trade with the Indians, to M. Contrecœur, "who fell down from Weningo with a Fleet of Three Hundred and Sixty Battoes and Canoes, with upwards of One Thousand Men and Eighteen Pieces of Artillery, which they planted against the Fort;" so wrote "Your Honours most obedient and very humble Servant, G. Washington," in a letter to Governor Hamilton, received on the 3d of May.[3] After this calamity Governor Dinwiddie was not so sure as to his jurisdiction over Logstown. The Maryland Assembly had not been much more liberal than that of Pennsylvania, and on April 27, 1754 (perhaps, however, before he had heard of Ensign Ward's surrender), in a letter to Governor Hamilton, he complains:[4]

"I cannot help observing that Two Proprietary Governments should distinguish themselves on this exigency of our affairs, in not contributing their assistance agreeable to his Majestie's commands, and more so from your Province when it is in doubt if the Land we are going to possess is not in your Grant."

This was the last official correspondence upon the subject for about twenty years, and now the first acts of the government of Virginia, in which jurisdiction over the Monongahela and Ohio valleys was claimed, have been here disclosed. Hitherto and throughout, the controversy has been courteous and peaceable. When it is again renewed it partakes of the very bitterness of partisan strife. But following Ensign Ward's surrender, the establishment of Fort Du Quesne at the confluence of the Ohio and the Allegheny, the first battles of young Washington in the territory now of Fayette County, and Braddock's defeat, was a long period of relentless and bloody Indian warfare, during which there was no opportunity for a conflict of civil jurisdiction west of the Alleghany Mountains.

Dr. John Connolly.—From 1764 to 1774, however, there was peace with the tribes, the pioneers being disturbed only at times by the occasional depredations of savages intent upon plunder more than moved by the havoc of war. Col. George Washington, then unemployed in military affairs, turned his attention to the acquisition of lands west of the mountains, with Capt. William Crawford to aid him in their selection. In October, 1770, he went upon a journey by way of Capt. Crawford's settlement on the Youghioghena River, and the latter accompanied him down the Ohio to the Kanawha for the purpose of examining lands in which he was interested at that place. On the 17th of that month, with Dr. Craik,[5] who had been his companion in arms at the battles of the Great Meadows and of the Monongahela, Capt. Crawford, and others, he arrived at Fort Pitt. "We lodged," he says in his journal,[6] "in what is called the town, distant about three hundred yards from the fort, at one Semple's,[7] who keeps a very good house of public entertainment. The houses, which are built of logs and ranged in streets, are on the Monongahela, and I suppose may be about twenty in number, and inhabited by Indian traders." On the 21st of November, Washington on his return left the Ohio at the Mingo town, just below where Steubenville now is, and came across the country over the lands he soon afterwards owned in Mount Pleasant township to Fort Pitt again. "22d. Stayed at Pittsburgh all day," his journal continues; "invited the officers and some other men to dinner with me at Semple's, among whom was Dr. Connolly, nephew to Col. Croghan, a very sensible and intelligent man, who had traveled over a good deal of this western country both by land and water." This Dr. Connolly, now introduced to the reader by no less a personage than George Washington, is soon to play an important part in the civil history of the country west of the mountains. Though born in Lancaster County, therefore in interest and relationship a Pennsylvanian, he seems early to have become an adventurer upon the waters of the lower Ohio, and at last appeared at Fort Pitt, as stated. In a subsequent page will be given a sketch of him from the pen of one who knew him well. He remained, as will be seen, at Fort Pitt until 1775, during which period he was probably the most noted man of the western border.

Controversy Opened.—Upon the erection of Bedford County, March 9, 1771, Fort Pitt still being a post garrisoned by the king's soldiers, the residents in the Monongahela valley were called upon to contribute their shares of the taxes necessary to maintain the county government, whereupon, the mass of them having come from Maryland and Virginia, and being doubtful in the absence of an established western boundary under which government they dwelt, resistance to the collection of these taxes followed of course. Indicating this condition of feeling and establishing the fact that the very first active opposition to the Pennsylvania jurisdiction of which we have any account came from the settlers in the Monongahela valley, and that, giving Dunmore and Connolly their just dues, the Virginia usurpation of 1774 was not a sudden inspiration, but, on the contrary, was suggested by the attitude, if not the petitions, of our early settlers themselves, contemporary letters written at the scene of conflict will now be produced.[1]

One George Wilson, Esq., a justice of the Bedford County court, residing at the mouth of Georges Creek, now Fayette County, near New Geneva, then 1771. in Springhill township of Bedford County, wrote the following letter to Arthur St. Clair, then also a justice of the same court, and as well the prothonotary of the Common Pleas, clerk of the Orphans' Court, recorder of deeds, and register of wills of the same county;[2]

[2] George Wilson, known generally as Col. Wilson, had come from old Augusta County, Va., into Pennsylvania in 1768 or 1769. Notwithstanding the place of his immigration, he was always loyal to Pennsylvania in the "intestin Broyls" which are to be narrated. In 1775, as will hereafter appear, he was arrested by the Virginia authorities for aiding the "capture" of Dr. Connolly. He died as the lieutenant-colonel of the Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment in the war of the Revolution at Quibbletown, N. J., in February, 1777. See X. Penn. Arch., 2d S. 648. He was the grandfather of Lawrence L. Minor, of Waynesburg, Greene Co., and the great-grandfather of Hon. W. G. Hawkins, now judge of the Orphans' Court of Allegheny County. Is not his character set out unintentionally in the letter quoted?

On September 24th, Arthur St. Clair, writing from Bedford to Joseph Shippen, Jr., the secretary of the Provincial Council, says: [2]

"I am sorry the papers I now enclose will contradict the favorable account I have given of our country; indeed, I am apprehensive there will be a good deal of trouble in our frontier.

"A ridiculous story that Mr. Cresap[3] has spread with much industry that this Province did not extend beyond the Allegheny mountains, but that all to the west of it was the King's Land, and together with Mr. Croghan's claims and surveys[4] has put numbers in a doubtful situation, and will probably make it very difficult to carry the laws into execution. . . . You will see by Col. Wilson's letter that he has been active in suppressing a commotion in his neighborhood, and I hope you will be so good as to represent it to the Council in its proper light."

In a letter dated at Fort Pitt, June 4, 1772, George Croghan wrote to Arthur St. Clair,[5] inclosing him a copy of a letter from "Col. Cresap to the Inhabitance" at Redstone, in which an argument is made that "the Western bounds of Pennsyl- 1772. vania Could Not Come Any Distance on this Side y^e Hills," and "I may venture to say you will be of opinion that if any objections be made to the Laws and Taxes it will be Intirely owing to y^e meshurs Taken by Pennsylvania in not ascertaining the true limits of thire Durediction, and publishing it to the people." On July 18th of the same month, St. Clair wrote to Mr. Shippen from Bedford:[6] "A day or two ago a petition in the name of the people living to the westward of Laurel Hill; signed by two hundred and twenty persons, was presented to our court. It charged the Government and the officers of the court with great oppression and injustice, and prayed that directions might be given to the sheriffs to serve no more process in that country, as they apprehended it was not in Pennsylvania." Alarm was expressed at the consequences impending. It was stated that "Col. Cresap"[7] appeared openly as a prime mover in the matter, and Mr. Croghan was strongly suspected of giving it much encouragement privately. The letter proceeds,—

"The petition was presented by a Mr. Brent, a gentleman from Maryland, who practices in our county. He offered nothing in support of it, but the uncertainty where Pennsylvania ends, and the hardships it was on the people to live under authority that was perhaps usurped. He

[3] Michael Cresap here mentioned was the son of Thomas Cresap, who lived at Old Town, on the Potomac, south of Cumberland, and who, in the boundary controversy between Pennsylvania and Maryland in earlier years, was famous as a bold partisan of the latter province. As early probably as 1770, Michael Cresap became a trader at Redstone Old Fort, and in the spring of 1774, while with a party of land-jobbers on the Ohio looking after lands, became involved in the killing of the Indians, followed by Dunmore's war. On his way home after the skirmish at Grave Creek he stopped a while with William Huston, then living at Catfish Camp; he was at Catfish Camp later in the summer with a body of militia. On the breaking out of the Revolution he led his company of militia into the Continental service at Boston, but soon after, on Oct. 18, 1775, died in New York City at the early age of thirty-three years. He was the Col. Cresap charged by Logan with the murder of his kindred, but the authenticity of that celebrated speech has for many years been seriously questioned.

[4] George Croghan (pronounced Crohon) is said to have been a native of Ireland. He first settled upon the Susquehanna and engaged in the Indian trade. He built a fort at what is now Shirleysburg, Huntingdon Co.; was at first captain in the provincial service, but subsequently became deputy superintendent of Indian affairs under Sir William Johnson, and established himself near Lawrenceville, above Pittsburgh, where he afterward lived and died. On Aug. 2, 1749, Croghan had obtained a deed executed by Iohonorissa, Scarrooyaddy, and Cossowantinecea, chiefs of the Six Nations, conveying to him in fee "a certain tract or parcel of land situate lying and being on the South side of the Monongahela River, Beginning at the mouth of a Run nearly opposite to Turtle creek, and then down the said Monongahela River to its Junction with the River Ohio, Computed to be Ten Miles; then Running down the Eastern Bank or side of the said River to where Raccoon creek empties itself into the said River; Thence up the said Creek ten miles, and from thence on a direct line to the Place of beginning; Containing by Estimation One hundred thousand acres, be the same more or less." On the 4th of November, 1768, as Croghan recited in his grants out of this land to purchasers from him, this deed was confirmed by the Six Nations "unto his most sacred Majesty George the Third by the Grace of God King of Great Britain, France and Ireland, & his heirs and successors, for the Use benefit and behoof of the said George Croghan, . . . as by the said Deed Pole Recorded in the Office for recording of Deeds in the City of Philadelphia, in Book I, Volume the fifth, Page 239, &c., may more fully and at large appear." In 1771 Croghan was running the lines of his tract, and claimed also to have another one-hundred-thousand-acre tract to lie south of the foregoing. He was then also negotiating with Col. Washington, through Capt. William Crawford, for the sale of certain parcels (see the Washington and Crawford Letters, 16, 20, etc.). Having run his lines, in 1772 and afterward he made a number of conveyances, of which the following are recorded in the deed-book of the old Augusta County Court: to Bernard Gratz, of Philadelphia, 10,129 a., 2 r., 30 p., on the West Branch of Raccoon Creek; to same, 14,013 acres on the western side of Chartiers Creek; to same, 31,485½ acres on the waters of Robinson's Run and Raccoon Creek; to Joseph Simons, of Lancaster, 10,580 acres on Raccoon Creek; to Edward Ward, of Fort Pitt, 3863 acres on the south bank of the Ohio; to Jacob Bausman, of Fort Pitt (in 1770), 308 acres on the west side of Chartiers Creek; to Benjamin Tate, of Fort Pitt, 384 acres on the east side of Chartiers Creek; to Thomas Lawrence, of Philadelphia, 18,580 acres on the southwest side of the Ohio,—all of which tracts nearly are described by courses and distances and adjoinders. It is said that our old surveyors were often annoyed by striking a marked tree on one of "Geo. Croghan's lines."

Croghan's position in the boundary controversy was a doubtful one. He was a Pennsylvanian by sympathy, though in interest he was a Virginian, for the apparent reason that he thought that if his "claims" fell within the limits of Pennsylvania his title was invalid as against that province, a result which actually followed when the line was run. All of his immense grant, coveriug so much of northern Washington County as originally erected, was wiped out of existence.

[5] I. St. Clair Papers, 262.

[7] The reader of the controversy as to the genuineness of the Logan speech will recollect the point made against it, that the Cresap named as "Col. Cresap" was not a colonel, but a captain. Here is seen the fact that Cresap was called colonel in 1772, two years before the speech was delivered.

was answered by Mr. Wilson, and I assure you the Proprietaries and the people are very much obliged to him. In a very handsome speech of about an hour, he opened the Constitution of the Province, compared it with that of the neighboring colonies, and pointed out where it excelled them. . . . I think it was lucky it was spoken so publicly, as many people from the doubtful part of the country were present and seemed so pleased with the conduct of the court in rejecting the petition."

Soon afterwards, but without date, another letter was written by Capt. St. Clair to Mr. Shippen,[1] in which the good effect of Mr. Wilson's speech was again referred to:

"However, there is still a number of people, abetted chiefly by Mr. Croghan, that refuse to submit to the jurisdiction of this Province, and very lately the sheriff has been very ill treated by a number of them; about twelve waylaid him and come upon him and one of his deputies stark naked, and threatened to put them both to immediate death, but after much abuse they consented to let them go at that time, but swore in the most dreadful manner, that if ever they returned to attempt to serve process, they would sacrifice them or follow them to their own houses and put them to the most cruel death. The sheriff knew several of them, particularly Abraham TeaGarden and William TeaGarden the younger, who are the ringleaders of the gang of villains, John Death, Andrew Gudgell, and Michael Cack; and they were all well armed with guns, tomahawk, pistols, and clubs; and the sheriff is of opinion that only for a pocket pistol which he produced he would certainly have met with extreme ill usage if he had escaped with his life.

"I have said these people are chiefly abetted by Mr. Croghan, and I think I have reason to say so; for no longer ago than Friday last, the collector and the constable, whom he had called to his assistance to levy his (Mr. Croghan's) taxes, were drove off by his people, and that Mr. Croghan himself threatened to put any or all of them to death if they attempted to touch any of his effects, for that he was not within the Province by twenty miles."

If Crogban were assessed with his 100,000-acres tract on the south side, described in the note to a preceding page, his interest would lead him to protest vigorously against the payment of the provincial taxes; but to show that the opposition to the jurisdiction was not wholly attributable to a dislike of all governmental restraint and burden, there is a letter from Robert Lettis Hooper, Jr., to William Franklin, the Governor of New Jersey, dated at Fort Pitt, Sept. 15, 1772:

"Sir,—A few days ago I was at Redstone, when I had an opportunity of knowing the sentiments of the People of that Part of the Country with Respect to the Western Boundary of Pennsylvania, and find a great Number of them are determined to pay no respect to the Institution of the Court of Bedford. They believe the Western Boundary of Pennsylvania will not extend so far as Redstone Settlement, and say it is an imposition to oblige them to pay taxes for Building Court-Houses, &c., in Bedford County when there is the greatest probability of their being obliged to contribute to publick Uses in the New Colony.[2]

"These sentiments do not proceed from Licentiousness in the People, nor from a desire to screen themselves from Law as some would represent, but from believing themselves out of Pennsylvania and being burthened with exhorbitant Taxes and Mileage, which they are unwilling to pay till it is absolutely determined whether they are in Pennsylvania or not."[3]

There is not at hand any documentary evidence that the notice received by the Provincial Council resulted in any immediate action on the part of the government. Why cannot now be stated, unless that the outbreaks of which information had been given were regarded simply as to be expected in the early period of the establishment of a new county organization over a settlement of pioneers. But Fort Pitt is now to cease as a garrisoned post, and events are to ripen for more trouble upon the western border.

Fort Pitt Abandoned by the British.—Fort Pitt, erected by Gen. Stanwix in 1759, at a cost of £60,000 sterling, was occupied by the British forces thenceforward continuously until the 10th of October, 1772, on which date by order of Gen. Gage, then commander-in-chief in North America, Maj. Charles Edmonstone, in command at Fort Pitt, sold to Alexander Ross and William Thompson "all the pickets, bricks, stones, timber, and iron which are now in the building or walls of the said fort" for fifty pounds, New York currency,[4] and soon afterwards withdrew. A corporal and a guard were left in possession for a time, when, as has appeared by the affidavit printed in a note to a previous page, Edward Ward took possession and retained it for some time.[5]

In the same year in which Fort Pitt was abandoned there arrived a new Governor over the colony of Virginia in the person of John Murray, the fourth Earl of Dunmore, one of the Peers of Scotland. He had been Governor of New York, and on the death of Botetourt was sent as his successor to Virginia. Early in the next year, 1773, he made a visit to Fort Pitt, and stopped on his way at the house of William Crawford, on the Youghiogheny. It had been the intention of Washington to accompany Lord Dunmore on his trip over the mountains, and the former had made all the necessary arrangements to do so, but was prevented by the death of Miss Custis, his step-daughter.[6] At Fort Pitt Lord Dunmore met Dr. John Connolly, heretofore introduced to us by Col. Washington, who had dined with him at Semple's in 1770. 1773.

There is no evidence as to what was the real purpose of this visit of the Virginia Governor, but from the fact that soon afterwards began an active outbreak of the boundary controversy, and in the next year occurred the Indian war known as Dunmore's war, of both of which matters Dr. Connolly was an indefatigable promoter, there is no doubt that it was "to sound the inclinations of the inhabitants as well as the Indians."[1] Most impartial writers have expressed the opinion, after the examination of all the facts, that Lord Dunmore had early information of transactions presaging the rupture with the mother-country, and that in the controversy instituted over the boundary question, as well as in his management of the Indian war of 1774, he was impelled in both by a wish to put the two governments into antagonism with each other. It is most probable that in 1773, when Lord Dunmore met Dr. Connolly at Fort Pitt, which was about the middle of the summer, he selected him as his agent to extend the jurisdiction of Virginia over the Monongahela and Ohio Valleys. It will be remembered also, that on Feb. 26, 1773, Westmoreland County had been erected, and the seat of justice was at Hannas Town, not far from the present Greensburg. In the formation of a new county, with all the attendant jealousies and diversities of interest, when new burdens were imposed upon a people little able to bear them, it was a suitable time successfully to introduce a rival government to receive the adherence of the disaffected.

[4] Equivalent, at eight shillings to the dollar, to one hundred and twenty-five dollars. For the facts concerning this sale see II. Olden Time, 94, 95.

[5] There is an unaccountable discrepancy in the accounts of this matter. The official records of the proceedings of the Virginia convention, Jan. 6, 1776, show the fact of the sale Oct. 10, 1772, of the material of the fort to Ross and Thompson, and that a corporal and a few men were left in charge. Edward Ward's affidavit (1 Calendar, Va. State Papers, 278) states that in 1772 the fort was evacuated, and he took possession and kept it till 1774, when it was seized by Connolly. It must be that Ward was in possession as the agent of Ross and Thompson, the former of whom was "agent" for the contractors for victualing his Majesty's forces in North America.

[6] See letter, Washington to Dunmore, April 13, 1773; Washington and Crawford Correspondence, 27; letter, Washington to Crawford, Sept. 25, 1773, Ibid., 29.

The Boundary Controversy, Continued—Connolly's Assumption of Government—Governor Penn and Lord Dunmore—Connolly at Hannastown—Arrest of Westmoreland County Justices—Commissioners to Lord Dunmore—The Peace Policy Pursued—Counter Proclamations and Subsequent Outrages—The Augusta County Court Opened—The Revolution—Connolly's Power Ended—Address of Delegates in Congress.

Connolly's Assumption of Government.—On Jan. 1, 1774, the following advertisement was posted at Pittsburgh and throughout the vicinity:[2]

"Whereas, his Excellency John, the Earl of Dunmore, Governor in chief and Captain General of the Colony and Dominion of Virginia, and Vice Admiral of the same, has been pleased to nominate and 1774. appoint me Captain, Commandant of the Militia of Pittsburgh and its Dependencies, with instructions to assure his Majesty's Subjects settled on the Western Waters, that having the greatest Regard to their Prosperity and Interest, and convinced from their repeated Memorials of the grievances of which they complain, that he proposes moving to the House of Burgesses the Necessity of erecting a New County, to include Pittsburgh, for the redress of your Complaints, and to take every other Step that may attend to afford you that justice for which you Solicit. In order to facilitate this desirable circumstance, I hereby require and command all persons in the Dependency of Pittsburgh to assemble themselves there as a Militia on the 25th Instant, at which time I shall communicate other Matters for the promotion of public Utility. Given under my Hand. this 1st day of January, 1774.

"John Connolly."

On the 11th of January, Æneas Mackay,[3] one of the justices of Westmoreland County, wrote to Arthur St. Clair:[4]

"Dear Sir,—Here inclosed you will find a copy of Doctor Connolly's advertisement, put up at different parts of this village, the 6th Instant, several copies of which were dispersed through the country at the same time. This imprudent piece will I am much afraid be the means of creating great confusion and disturbance in this county, unless proper steps will be taken to check it in time.

"The Doctor informs us that Lord Dunmore has made application to General Haldiman for a sergeant and twelve men, to be sent immediately to this place, in order to support his authority.

"The captain has already appointed six or seven magistrates, among whom are Major Smallman, John Campbell, and John Gibson; the rest I have not heard their names yet. There is no doubt but all the disaffected and vagabonds that before invaded law and justice with so much art, will now flock in numbers to the captain's standard, if not prevented in time, the consequences of which we have just cause to dread. I think your presence is absolutely necessary at this time.

"P.S. . . . Since I wrote the above, Mr. Espy[5] happened in company with the new captain, to whom Espy said he thought the next court for Westmoreland would be held at Pittsburgh;[6] to which the captain replied in a rage, damn him if he would not oppose it; from which and many other circumstances of the like kind, it appears how determined he will be to carry his designs into execution. It's thought here that 'tis all Colonel Croghan's intrigues."

Upon the receipt of this letter, Arthur St. Clair (who was the prothonotary or "chief clerk") on January 12th sent his own clerk to the Provincial Council, with a letter inclosing the high-sounding advertisement of Capt. Connolly, and stated that what had occurred to him was that previous to the day appointed for the meeting of the militia, he should demand such security of Connolly for his good behavior as he would not be able to procure, and in consequence have him committed, and that he had written to Mr. Wilson for his "council on this thought."[7] The emergency requiring it, Arthur St. Clair, in his capacity of justice, before Governor Penn's reply to his letter was received, issued a warrant for Dr. Connolly's arrest, an account of which, as well as of the occurrences at Pittsburgh on the day of the militia meeting, is contained in his letter to Governor Penn, dated at Ligonier, the place of his residence, on Feb. 2, 1774:[8]

"I am honored with your letter of the 20th of January, which reached me the 28th, and am happy to find the method pursued at Pittsburgh on the 25th did not materially differ from that you had been pleased to direct.

[6] For some time there was a controversy whether the county-seat of Westmoreland should continue at Hannas Town or be fixed at Pittsburgh. Col. George Wilson was in favor of the latter place; Robert Hanna and Joseph Irwin, the other trustees, outvoted him. See his letter, IV. Pennsylvania Archives, 466; and the letter of Arthur St. Clair, Ibid., 471.

"Dr. Connolly was arrested previous to the meeting, by my orders, on his avowing himself the author of the advertisement requiring the people to meet as a militia, and committed on refusing to find sureties for his good behavior till next court.

"I was in hopes the sending him out of the way [i.e., to jail] would have put an end to it altogether; I was mistaken. About eighty persons in arms assembled themselves, chiefly from Mr. Croghan's neighborhood, and, after parading through the town and making a kind of feu de joie, proceeded to the Fort, where a cask of rum was produced on the parade and the head knocked out. This was a very effectual way of recruiting. As a scene of drunkenness and confusion was likely to ensue, I got the magistrates (who attended in consequence of the letter I had sent them) together, and read the inclosed papers,[1] which we had concocted that morning, and at the conclusion, when they were required to disperse, they replied they had been invited there but came with peaceable intentions, and would go home again without molesting any one; on which we left them. However, towards night their peaceable disposition forsook them, and I should probably have felt their resentment, had I not got intimation of their design. I thought it most prudent to keep out of their way. . . .

"Mr. Connolly has most certainly a commission from Lord Dunmore expressly for Pittsburgh and its dependencies; and his subalterns are John Stephenson, a brother of Mr. Crawford,[2] our senior magistrate, William Harrison, a son-in-law of his, and Dorsey Pentecost,[3] who was lately in the commission of the peace here. Mr. Pentecost has, I hear, been down to Mr. Connolly's since his confinement, and taken the necessary oaths to qualify him for his military office, and is to assemble the people at Redstone, and take possession of Fort Burd.[4] I have written to the justices[5] in that part of the country to watch his motions. Mr. McKee is said to be appointed a justice by Lord Dunmore, but I would fain hope without his consent; at any rate he behaved very well on the late occasion, and, as he was doubted, I made a point of having him there under pretense of his being an Indian Agent, but in fact, if he was a friend or abettor of Connolly's measures. . . ."[6]

[1] This paper, printed in IV. Penn. Archives, 478; I. St. Clair Papers, 280; I. Olden Time, 473, is too long to be copied. It was a temperate but dignified and forcible presentation of the propriety of a peaceable obedience to the laws of Pennsylvania. One paragraph, however, was: "The Jurisdiction of Pennsylvania has been regularly extended to Pittsburgh, and exercised there for a number of years, as the records of Cumberland, Bedford, and Westmoreland Counties testify; and you yourselves have acknowledged it, by applying for your lands in that Province. Whether that extension has been legally made or not, can be determined by the Crown alone; but must be submitted to till it is determined. And it must be evident to you that Lord Dunmore, as Governor of Virginia, can have no more right to determine this matter, than one of us, for this plain reason; the charters of Pennsylvania and Virginia, both flowed originally from the Crown; on that footing they are perfectly independent of each other; but they are both parties in this dispute, and consequently neither can be judge."

[2] That is, Wm. Crawford, the presiding justice of the courts; he had one brother, Valentine Crawford, and five half-brothers, one of whom was John Stephenson.

[3] Dorsey Pentecost was then living in the present Rostraver township, Westmoreland County; he did not remove to the East Branch of Chartiers until a later date. His deed to Samuel and Robert Purviance for his mansion tract, "Green Way," on the Youghiogheny, is dated May 16, 1777, but the sale and his removal might have been earlier. The letter in the text, however, clearly indicates that his removal had not yet taken place.

Pentecost was a Virginia adherent from the start; though he had been an official of Bedford County, he was omitted in all the appointments for Westmoreland County.

[4] "Redstone," of course, was the present Brownsville, Fayette Co. In 1759, Col. James Burd had erected there a fort of some strength, called Fort Burd. There were there then the distinct and well-preserved traces of works made by the Mound-Builders, supposed to have been an old Indian fort, but the Indians here when the settlers came never built such fortifications. This old fort, so called, gave the name "Redstone Old Fort," used almost entirely by the early people.

[5] Van Swearingen, a justice, then lived across the river, about opposite Greenfield, Washington Co., and Thomas Scott, also a justice, lived on Dunlap's Creek, near Brownsville. The former became the first sheriff, and the latter the first prothonotary and clerk of Washington County.

[6] This manœuvre as to Alexander McKee did not amount to much. He was a native of Pennsylvania, and trader among the Indians. In 1772 he became a deputy Indian agent. He soon after this letter began to act openly with the partisans of Lord Dunmore, although he had been a justice of Bedford County and was then a justice for Westmoreland County. He became an official of the Virginia courts when organized in the Monongahela Valley, and in the spring of 1778, with Simon Girty, Matthew Elliot, and other renegades, went over to the Indians, who were then allied with the British. He had a fine body of lands at the mouth of Chartiers Creek. In the "Record Book of Surveys made in Yohogania County, A.D. 1780, by William Crawford, Surveyor," is found an entry that on June 15, 1780, Benjamin Johnston "produced a warrant for 500 acres of land, dated 20th May 1780, No. 4925, which he locates & enters on lands whereon Alexander McKee lived at the mouth of Shirtee or Chartiers creek, the said McKee having left the same & gone to the Common Enemy of America, which was located by Dorsey Pentecost, but no warrant being left in the office, the entry became invalid or void." Virginia had ceased then to be a royal colony.

[7] X. Col. Records, 149; I. St. Clair Papers, 277.

[8] In running this due north line to the Ohio, and thence up the river to Fort Pitt, St. Clair had taken a prominent part. It was done by him in connection with Moses McLean in 1771 (I. St. Clair Papers, 9), doubtless to fix some kind of a western boundary to Bedford County. Perhaps the object was merely to find the distance of Fort Pitt due west from the Delaware River, to ascertain if it were within the five degrees of longitude. In this view the willingness in 1774 to adopt the meandering line for the western boundary is clearly indicated, in which case almost all of the present Washington County would have been left with the Pan Handle.

Governor Penn and Lord Dunmore.—In the mean time Governor Penn, who had awakened to the necessity of executive action, on Jan. 31, 1774,[7] had written to Lord Dunmore stating that he had lately received the advertisement set up by Connolly at Pittsburgh and vicinity, and expressed his surprise at the step so sudden and unexpected, and so very alarming to the inhabitants of the western part of the province, who had taken up and improved and hitherto peaceably enjoyed their lands under grants from the proprietaries of Pennsylvania. Affecting to disbelieve that Lord Dunmore would countenance measures injurious to the rights of the proprietaries, and having a tendency to create disturbances within the province, he proceeded,—

"The western extent of the Province of Pennsylvania, by the Royal Grant, is five degrees of longitude from the river Delaware, which is its eastern boundary. In the year 1768 [in 1767] an east and west line was run from Delaware, at the mouth of Christiana creek, to the crossing of Dunkard creek, a branch of the Monongahela by Messieurs. Dixon and Mason, two surveyors of distinction, who were sent over from England to run the division line between Maryland and Pennsylvania. These artists fixed the latitude and extent of that line with the utmost exactness and precision, to the satisfaction of the commissioners on both sides. From the 233d mile-stone on this line a north line hath been since carefully run and measured to the Ohio, and from thence up to Fort Pitt; the several courses of the river having been taken with all possible care.[8] From the line of Dixon and Mason to a known point in the south line of the City of Philadelphia, the true course and distance hath been discovered by actual survey, as also from the point aforesaid to that part of the river Delaware which is in the same latitude as Fort Pitt; and from these several data, the most exact calculations have been made by Dr. Smith, Provost of our College, Mr. Rittenhouse, and our Surveyor General, in order to ascertain the difference of longitude between Delaware and Pittsburgh, who all agree that the latter is near six miles eastward of the western extent of the Province."

Governor Penn inclosed a map made to illustrate the subject. Should his lordship, however, contrary to expectation, still entertain any doubt respecting this matter, it was hoped he would at least think it reasonable, for avoiding those mischiefs which must naturally arise in case of clashing and disputed jurisdictions, to defer the appointment of officers and the exercise of government in that neighborhood, and suffer the people to remain in the quiet and undisputed possession of the lands they held under Pennsylvania till some temporary line of jurisdiction could be agreed on by his majesty in Council, before whom a petition from the proprietaries of Pennsylvania for the settlement of their western as well as other boundaries was then pending. On Feb. 23, 1774, Joseph Spear, a trader residing at Pittsburgh, also a Westmoreland justice, wrote to Arthur St. Clair from that place:[1]

"I am just now informed that the Virginians up the Monongahela have had two or three musters lately; one at Red Stone Old Fort, and one yesterday at Paul Froman's,[2] on the other side of the Monongahela; and am also told they had a meeting at Mr. Pentecost's own house; in consequence of which Mr. Pentecost wrote to Mr. Swearingen to act no longer there as a Pennsylvania magistrate at his peril. I therefore think it would be advisable to endeavor to have a stop put to these proceedings, if possible, as it creates the greatest disturbance, and very much retards the execution of our civil process.

"P.S.—This news has just come to hand; otherwise I would have written you more fully. Dr. Connolly is just now going over the run[3] to Redstone, I know not what for."

How Dr. Connolly, who had lately been committed to jail by St. Clair, came to be at liberty, and what was the purpose of his trip to Redstone, is made apparent by the letter of Æneas Mackay to Governor Penn of April 4, 1774, which gives a history of affairs since Connolly's release.[4] It is stated that Connolly, having been in confinement for but a few days, prevailed upon the sheriff, John Proctor, to permit him to visit Pittsburgh, pledging his honor to return before the next court in April; that he stayed a few days at Pittsburgh, and then, instead of returning to jail as he had promised, he went up to Redstone settlement, where, with the assistance of his friends in that quarter, he assembled about twenty men, who guarded him "from there to or near the frontier of Virginia;" that he returned from Virginia to Pittsburgh on March 28th, and since then "our village is become the scene of Anarchy and Confusion;" that:

"On the 30 of March a party from the Chartee settlement joined the Doctor at this place. On hearing of that circumstance, Sheriff Proctor and the justices, Smith, McFarland, and myself, Repaired to the Fort in order to discover the Doctor's intention, and if we found them anywise tumultuously disposed to Read the Riot Act. There we found about twenty odd Men, some with, and some without arms, and the Doctor before them with two letters in his hand, both of which he said he had just received from Lord Dunmore, with orders to make them (the militia) acquainted with the Contents, and this he immediately did, by reading these Papers to them. In the first of these letters his Lordship greatly applauded the Doctor's Conduct when Taken by the Sheriff for not giving Bail, and Commanded him to Persevere in the prosecution of the plan he began upon, maintaining the possession of Fort Pitt & its dependencies, and to put the militia & other Virginia Laws in force, concluding with a promise of being powerfully supported by his Lordship.

"The other letter the Doctor declared to be a Duplicate of his Lordship's answer to Governor Penn's Letter Relating to the militia muster, when first set on foot at this place last January."

This letter, which is too long to quote entire, then proceeds to state that, after reading the papers, Connolly called the sheriff and his justices to a "barrack-room," and delivered to them a lecture upon the propriety of obedience and acquiescence, and said that "he had not intended to take any step contrary to the Established Rules of law at that place till after the court, which would sit in a few days, when he was determined to deliver himself up, and a Bide by the judg't of the same;" that the next morning Sheriff Proctor served a writ upon William Christy, one of Dr. Connolly's militia lieutenants, on notice of which Connolly caused the sheriff to be arrested upon a king's warrant, and held him in custody for some time, "and ever since that time there are parties of armed men in Constant persute of our Deputy sheriff & Constables, by which means it's impossible for us to do any business. The doctor is now in actual possession of the Fort, with a Body Guard of Militia about him, Invested, as we are told, with both Civil and military power, to put the Virginia Law in Force in these parts," etc. The letter is closed with the remark, "The Indians are greatly alarmed at seeing parties of armed men patrolling through our streets Daily, not knowing but there is hostility intended against them and their country." It was not long, indeed, until an Indian war followed, owing its origin to Connolly and his superior, Lord Dunmore.

Lord Dunmore's reply to Governor Penn's communication, written on January 31st, was delayed until the 3d of March.[5] A copy of his reply, as has been seen, was in Connolly's hands on March 30th, almost as soon as it reached Governor Penn. Doubtless Connolly had been with Dunmore when it was written:

"Williamsburgh, 3 March, 1774.

"Sir,—I have been favored with your letter of the 31st January, 1774, and duplicate of the same, the occasion of which having been the appointment of certain officers by me in a remote district of the county of Augusta,[6] in this Colony, which includes Pittsburgh, which having been

[2] This was Paul Froman, who lived on the East Branch of Chartiers Creek, at the present Beck's Mills, or Linden, in North Strabane township.

[3] This may have been "river" in the original. In 1769, James Hendricks, a deputy surveyor for Cumberland County, wrote to James Tilghman, the secretary of the land-office, under date of September 5th: "I received yours of 28th ult., where you desire I would give my opinion how far the Western Boundary of this Province would reach. As I have never been at the line where it crosseth the Monongahela, I can't pretend to judge, only from the opinion of the people living out there, and as most of them are prejudiced, I can't give any weight to what they say. But as I am very particular in taking the Courses of the Monongahela, I shall be able in the fall to give it you with some exactness; in the meantime, I am inclined to believe that Chartiers Creek must be in the Province, as its junction with the Ohio is but (scarce) four miles from Fort Pitt, about North West, and on going to Redstone, you cross it several times, and I am well assured the mouth of Redstone is several degrees to the Westward of South from Fort Pitt." This would indicate that travelers from Fort Pitt to Redstone came across the river over upon the Chartiers and up the same probably some distance before turning towards the Redstone.

done, as is always my rule, with the advice of his Majesty's Council [of Virginia], I could not till I had an opportunity of laying your letter before them return you an answer, and it is not till now that I am enabled to do so."

The letter then proceeded to suggest that though the calculations relied upon in the plan sent by Governor Penn might be correct, yet that, Virginia not having been a party to them, she was not bound. The transactions of the French and Indian war were cited with respect to the right of that colony to this country. "And it seems to me that the step which I have taken ought not to have been either unexpected or surprising, as you are pleased to say it was to you, when it was well known that formal declarations were made by the Assembly of Pennsylvania that Pittsburgh was not within the jurisdiction of that government at the time that requisitions were made to them for the defense of that place, the burden of which on that account fell on this government." Dunmore then proceeded to avow authority from him to Dr. Connolly for all the latter had done, and insisted upon the most ample reparation for the insult to the authority of his "Majesty's government of Virginia" in his arrest, and "no less can possibly be admitted than the dismission of the clerk (St. Clair) of Westmoreland County, who had the audacity, without any authority, to commit a magistrate in the legal discharge of his trust, unless he (St. Clair) can prevail, by proper submission, on Mr. Connolly to demand his pardon of me."

To this communication Governor Penn replied on March 31, 1774,[1] with an evident degree of impatience that his suggestions for delay in establishing the Virginia jurisdiction until the line could be fixed, either by commissioners to be selected or by steps to be taken upon an order of the king in Council, should have been so rudely disregarded. But, after a little, the communication enters upon a discussion of the proceedings of the Provincial Council and the Assembly in relation to the building of the forts upon the Ohio, beginning with 1752, and extending till 1754, giving an accurate review of all the facts, and quoting the letter of Governor Dinwiddie of March 21, 1754, in which it was said in this the last communication at that time between the two governments upon the subject: "Your private letter of the 13, current, I have duly received, and am much misled by our Surveyors if the forks of Monongahela be within the limits of your Proprietaries' Grant. I have for some time wrote home to have the line run, that I may be able to appoint Magistrates on the Ohio (if in this government) to keep the traders and others in good order, and I presume soon there will be Commissioners appointed for that purpose. In the mean time, that no hindrance may be given to our intended expedition, it is highly reasonable, if their lands are in your Proprietaries' grant, that the settlers should pay the quit-rent to Mr. Penn, and not to his Majesty; and therefore, as much as lies in my power, I agree thereto, after the time granted by my proclamation, to be clear of quit-rents, ceases." Thus successfully meeting the averment that there were any transactions of the provincial government which estopped her from asserting her jurisdiction upon the Ohio, Governor Penn then explains away the position in which he was placed by the Provincial Assembly when they refused to grant supplies to aid in the war referred to. This he does by stating that "unfortunately at this time there was no very good understanding between the Government and the Assembly, and when Mr. Hamilton [then Governor] laid Mr. Dinwiddie's requisition before them, they declined complying with it, and urged for reasons that by the Royal orders to the several Governors they were not to act as principals out of their own Governments; that they (the Assembly) would not presume to determine upon the limits of the Province; and that by papers and evidences sent down to them, and referred to by the Governor, the limits of the Province had not been clearly ascertained to their satisfaction." He then states that at this date, 1754, only the temporary line between Pennsylvania and Maryland had been established, and that only one hundred and forty-four miles from the Delaware. Mason and Dixon's line had not been surveyed and marked. The position of the French forts within the limits of the province had been ascertained by Mr. Hamilton from information from Indian traders, founded on computed distances and mountainous and crooked roads, with which the Assembly was not satisfied. "But if their declarations had been ever so formal or positive, I cannot conceive how any proceedings of theirs would affect the State of the Province, controul the jurisdiction, or prejudice the rights of the Proprietaries." The Governor then served a notice upon Lord Dunmore:

"And to prevent the setting up of claims and making conclusions of right by the Government of Virginia, from the circumstances of settlement on the one side, and non-claim on the other, I must take this opportunity of notifying to your Lordship that the Proprietaries of Pennsylvania do claim, by their said petition [then pending before the king], as part of their Province of Pennsylvania, all the lands lying west of a

had been erected in 1738. Frederick County was erected at the same time, and these two counties embraced all of Virginia west of the Blue Ridge, the range of mountains nearest the coast. Frederick lay south of the western part of Maryland, while Augusta stretched out as far as the settlements proceeded beyond the Alleghanies. The county-seat of Augusta County was Staunton, in the Shenandoah Valley. That part of Augusta lying, as claimed, west of the Alleghany Mountains was afterwards known as West Augusta, or the District of West Augusta. In the year 1775, by the convention assembled to devise a plan for resisting the oppressions of the mother-country, among other proceedings it was determined that "The landholders of the district of West Augusta shall be considered as a distinct county, and have the liberty of sending two delegates to represent them in general convention." Kercheval, in his "History of the Valley of Virginia," 236, says, "This is the first account which the author has been able to find in our ancient statutes in relation to West Augusta as a separate district or county. In fact, it does not appear that we ever had a county legally established by this name. It is presumable that it acquired the name by general usage, from its remote and western locality from the seat of justice." More as to this hereafter.

south line to be drawn from Dixon's and Mason's Line, as it is commonly called, at the westermost part of the Province of Maryland to the beginning of the fortieth degree of north latitude, to the extent of five degrees of longitude from the river Delaware; and I must request your Lordship will neither grant lands nor exercise the government of Virginia within those limits, till his Majesty's pleasure may be known. . . . Mr. St. Clair is a gentleman who for a long time had the honor of serving his Majesty in the regulars with reputation, and in every station of life has preserved the character of a very good worthy man; and though perhaps I should not, without first expostulating with you on the subject, have directed him to take that step [the arrest of Connolly], yet you must excuse my not complying with your Lordship's requisition of stripping him, on this occasion, of his offices and livelihood, which you will allow me to think not only unreasonable but somewhat dictatorial. . . ."

This was the last correspondence between the two Governors for some time upon that subject.

Connolly at Hannas Town.—Dr. Connolly was left on the 30th of March, the day before the last preceding letter was written, in full possession of old Fort Pitt, surrounded by his body-guard of militia, but intending, as he stated to Æneas Mackay, to report as he had engaged to do to the court of Westmoreland County, to be holden the next week, and to submit himself to its order. He did so report, but in a manner entirely unexpected. His proceedings are fully related in a letter written to Governor Penn on April 8th by Capt. William Crawford, the presiding justice of the Westmoreland court, and carried to Philadelphia by Col. George Wilson:[1]

"Sir,—As some very extraordinary occurrences have lately happened in this country it is necessary to write an account of them to you. That which I now give is at the request and with the approbation of the magistrates that are present attending the court. A few weeks ago Mr. Connolly went to Staunton (Va.), and was sworn in as a justice of the peace for Augusta County, in which it is pretended that the country around Pittsburgh is included. He had before this brought from Williamsburg commissions of the peace for several gentlemen in this part of the province, but none of them I believe have been accepted of. A number of new militia officers have been lately appointed by Lord Dunmore. Several musters of the militia have been held, and much confusion has been occasioned by them. I am informed that the militia is composed of men without character and without fortune, and who would be equally averse to the regular administration of justice under the colony of Virginia as they are to that under the province of Pennsylvania. The disturbances which they have produced at Pittsburgh have been particularly alarming to the inhabitants. Mr. Connolly is constantly surrounded with a body of armed men. He boasts of the countenance of the Governor of Virginia, and forcibly obstructs the execution of legal process, whether from the court or single magistrates. A deputy sheriff has come from Augusta County, and I am told he has writs in his hands against Captain St. Clair and the sheriff for the arrest and confinement of Mr. Connolly. The sheriff was last week arrested at Pittsburgh for serving a writ on one of the inhabitants there, but was after some time discharged. On Monday last one of Connolly's people grossly insulted Mr. Mackay, and was confined by him in order to be sent to jail. The rest of the party hearing it immediately came to Mr. Mackay's house, and proceeded to the most violent outrages. Mrs. Mackay was wounded in the arm with a cutlass. The magistrates and those who came to their assistance were treated with much abuse, and the prisoner was rescued.

"Some days before the meeting of the court a report was spread that the militia officers at the head of their several companies would come to Mr. Hanna's, use the court ill, and interrupt the administration of justice. On Wednesday while the court was adjourned they came to the court-house [at Hannastown, Westmoreland Co.], and paraded before it. Sentinels were placed at the door, and Mr. Connolly went into the house. One of the magistrates was hindered by the militia from going into it till permission was first obtained from their commander. Mr. Connolly sent a message to the magistrates informing them that he wanted to communicate something to them, and would wait on them for that purpose. They received him in a private room. He read to them the inclosed paper, together with a copy of a letter to you which Lord Dunmore had transmitted to him, inclosed in a letter to himself, which was written in the same angry and undignified style. The magistrates gave the inclosed answer to what he read, and he soon afterwards departed with his men. Their number was about one hundred and eighty or two hundred. On their return to Pittsburgh some of them seized Mr. Elliott, of the Bullock Pens, and threatened to put him in the stocks for something which they deemed an affront offered to their commander. Since their return a certain Edward Thompson and a young man who keeps store for Mr. Spear have been arrested by them, and Mr. Connolly, who in person seized the young man, would not allow him time even to lock up the store. In other parts of the country, particularly those adjoining the river Monongahela, the magistrates have been frequently insulted in the most indecent and violent manner, and are apprehensive that unless they are speedily and vigorously supported by Government it will become both fruitless and dangerous for them to proceed to the execution of their offices. They presume not to point out the measures proper for settling the present disturbances, but beg leave to recommend the fixing of a temporary line with the utmost expedition as one step which in all probability will contribute very much towards producing that effect. For further particulars concerning the situation of the country I refer you to Colonel Wilson, who is kind enough to go on the present occasion to Philadelphia.

"I am, sir, your very humble servant."[2]

The following letter was also sent along, written by Thomas Smith,[3] who had witnessed the occurrences:

"Westmoreland County, April 7, 1774.

"Sir,—The present transactions at this place are so very extraordinary, that I am persuaded you will be very much surprised at the relation of them, if anything that is absurd and unwarrantable which originates from Lord Dunmore can surprise you. I think I am warranted in this observation by his Lordship's letter to his honor, duplicate of which, together with a letter at the same time to Connolly, we have had just read to us.

"After Connolly was committed to jail in the manner you have been informed, the sheriff let him at large on his word of honor to return at the court. He did return, indeed, in such a manner as might have been expected from his preceding conduct. We heard, when we came up to this court, that he was mustering a large party in order to prevent the court from sitting. We thought that there could not be any foundation for such a report, but at the same time we thought it prudent to order the Sheriff to raise as many men as he could collect, to prevent us from being insulted by a lawless set of men acting under the color of authority. The time was so short that but few were collected on our side, and those few were ill armed, so that we found ourselves in a very disagreeable situation when we received certain intelligence that Connolly was coming down with two hundred armed men. When we found they were at hand the magistrates thought it prudent to adjourn the court, as it was near the time. They soon after came down to the number of one hundred and fifty or one hundred and eighty, with colors flying, and their Captains, &c., had their swords drawn. The first thing they did was to place sentinels at the court-house door, and then Connolly sent a message that he would wait on the Magistrates and communicate the reasons of his appearance. The bench and bar were then assembled in Mr. Hanna's house, where we sent him word we would hear him. He and Pentecost soon came down, and he read the paper which will be sent down to his Honor the Governor, with the bearer of this, and then he read a duplicate of Lord Dunmore to our Governor together with the letter mentioned before.

"The Court told him they would soon return an answer to what he had said. (They did not think it prudent to do it without consulting together and taking the opinion of the bar.) We soon agreed on the terms of the answer, and the gentleman who had the principal hand in forming it, has done it in such a manner as I am persuaded will procure him the thanks of the government. It contains firmness and moderation, and, as far as I am capable of judging, it was not possible to form one more free from exceptions in our present situation. One in any other form might have been the occasion of altercations, which might have produced undue concessions, or been attended with the most fatal consequences; for I have reason to believe that the greatest part of them were wishing for some colorable reason to quarrel. The bench proposed to deliver the answer in the court-house. However, in that particular they counted without their host, for they were refused admittance and Connolly waited for them at the court-house door, where Mr. Wilson, at the request of the Court, delivered it, and after exchanging copies they departed more peaceably than might have been expected. However, the consequences of such proceedings are too apparent to need be enumerated; the administration of justice must be entirely at a stand, and, indeed, I cannot help thinking that this mob has collected for that purpose, as I am well assured that amongst all those who assembled there was not one single man of any property; on the contrary, the greatest part of them were such as are obliged to hide themselves from their creditors, or such as are under the necessity of taking shelter in this part of the country to escape the punishment of their crimes. It seems Lord Dunmore gave Connolly blank commissions, trusting to his own prudence to fill them up by inserting the names of proper persons. Connolly, in order to be consistent with himself, bestowed one of these commissions on one , an old fellow who has several times been committed for felony. I don't, indeed, know that he has been convicted, because he has always broke the jail. Once I think he was committed to Lancaster jail and escaped. His character is so well known, that those who are the strongest advocates for the present disturbances are ashamed of his being appointed one of their Captains.

He soon afterwards engaged in Dunmore's war, first as a captain, then as a major, and then became an active Virginia partisan. In the next winter he was superseded in his commission as a justice for Westmoreland County. The leader of the expedition against the Indians in 1782, he was burned at the stake at Sandusky on June 11th of that year.

"The people in this part of the country who would wish to enjoy the benefits of society, and would submit to any form of government, are in the most disagreeable situation imaginable; their property, their liberty, and their lives are at the mercy of a lawless desperate banditti! In such a situation they look for and have the utmost reason to expect, the protection of that government under which they have settled. What is the most proper method to be taken it would be presumption in me to suggest. There are but two ways; the one to agree on a temporary line of jurisdiction until the matter can be finally settled; the other, to establish a sufficient garrison at Fort Pitt to withstand the rabble, who act under Lord Dunmore's commission. It would have been a happy thing for this part of the country, if this last measure had met with success when it was first recommended to the Legislature; and, indeed, sensible people in this part of the country, who are well affected to this government, cannot help drawing conclusions from the opposition which that measure met with, which I am persuaded could never be the motives of those who may have made the opposition to it.

"The conduct of Lord Dunmore is really the most extraordinary, in the light in which the people of this part of the county are obliged to view it, that can be imagined. To establish the jurisdiction of a different province over the people who have purchased, and settled, and lived for a considerable space of time, peaceably under this; to establish this jurisdiction by a military force, is such an absurd measure, that I believe it will be difficult to suppose any in his senses would have adopted It.

"I hope you will excuse this incoherent scrawl, when I inform you that it is written in a small room amidst the clamor and confusion of a number of people. Excuse the imperfections.

"I am, sir, your most humble servant,

"THOMAS SMITH.[1]

"JOSEPH SHIPPEN, Esquire."

[1] Thomas Smith, the writer of this letter, was the brother of Dr. William Smith, the provost of the College of Philadelphia, now the University of Pennsylvania. They were natives of Scotland. Thomas was early a settler at Bedford, and became a celebrated lawyer. In 1775 he was appointed colonel of militia, and the next year was a member of the Pennsylvania Constitutional Convention. In 1781 was a member of the Continental Congress. From 1790 to 1794 he was president judge of the Mifflin, Huntingdon, Bedford, and Franklin County district, and was justice of the Supreme Court from 1794 to 1809, when he died.

He practiced at the bar of Westmoreland at the date of the text. In the account of the burning of Hannastown by the Indians on July 13, 1782, published in the Greensburgh Argus in 1836, written by Judge Coulter, it is said, "Thomas Smith, Esq., afterwards one of the judges of the Supreme Bench, brought quarterly from the east, the most abstruse learning of the profession to puzzle the backwoods lawyers." He was admitted to the bar of Washington County at its second term, and was the attorney of Gen. Washington in his ejectment suit for his lands in Mount Pleasant township.

With the foregoing letters was Connolly's address to the Westmoreland County magistrates, as follows:

"GENTLEMEN: I am come here to be the occasion of no Disturbances, but to prevent them. As I am countenanced by Government, whatever you may say or conceive, some of the justices of this Bench are the cause of this Appearance and not me. I have done this to prevent myself from being illegally taken to Philadelphia. My orders from the Government of Virginia not being explicit, but claiming the Country about Pittsburgh, I have raised the Militia to support the Civil Authority of that Colony vested in me.

"I have come here to free myself from a Promise made to Captain Proctor, but have not conceived myself amenable to this Court, by any Authority from Pennsylvania, upon which Account I cannot apprehend that you have any right to remain here as justices of the Peace constituting a Court under that Province; but in order to prevent confusion, I agree that you may continue to act in that capacity, in all such Matters as may be submitted to your determination by the acquiescence of the People, until I may have instructions to the contrary from Virginia, or until His Majesty's Pleasure shall be further known on this subject."

The answer of the magistrates to this act of military domination was as follows:

"The jurisdiction of the Court and officers of the County of Westmoreland rests on the legislative Authority of the Province of Pennsylvania, confirmed by His Majesty in Council. That jurisdiction has been regularly exercised, and the Court and Officers will continue to exercise it in the same regular manner. It is far from their intention to occasion or foment Disturbances, and they apprehend that no such intentions can with Propriety be inferred from any part of their conduct; on the contrary, they wish and will do all they can to preserve the public Tranquility. In order to contribute to this very salutary Purpose, they give Information that every step will be taken on the part of the Province of Pennsylvania to accommodate any differences that have arisen between it and the Colony of Virginia, by fixing a temporary line betwixt them."[2]

Westmoreland County Justices Arrested.—But the capture of the Westmoreland County court-house and the impertinent interference with the justices by Dr. Connolly and his body-guard of militia were not enough. The same day of the date of William Crawford's letter the court rose, and Æneas Mackay, Devereux Smith, and Andrew McFarlane, three of the justices residing at Pittsburgh, returned to their homes at that place. On the next day, April 9, 1774, all three were arrested upon the order of Dr. Connolly. Andrew McFarlane gave the particulars in a letter to Governor Penn, written just before being carried away, in which he said,—

"When Justice Mackay, Smith, and I returned from attending the Court last evening, we were informed that Dr. Connolly was determined to Issue Kings Warrants for us, which was served on the above-named Gentlemen and myself this day by Mr. Connolly's Sheriff, and an infamous Constable who took me prisoner by the Sholder and Told me I must go to the Fort to Capt. Connolly to receive my sentence which I was Obliged to Do. The Crime which we are Charged with is for the answer we gave Dr. Connolly, in writing, by the Concurrence of the Court at Westmoreland, a Copy of which was enclosed to your Honor, per favor of Colo. Wilson. Connolly insisted much that we should give Bail for our appearance at Staunton[3] Court, in Virginia, which the other gentlemen and myself refused,[1] so that we are to go to jail this Day, where we intend to remain until your Honor's Pleasure is known, which we make no Doubt will be in a short Time. They have taken two other Prisoners, one of which is Clark to Joseph Spear, Esquire, at this place, for assisting the under Sheriff of Westmoreland, to take one of their Virginia Captains. I am Taken at a very great Inconveniency as my Business is suffering much on account of my absence. But I am willing to suffer a great Deal more rather than Bring a Disgrace on the Commission which I bear under your Honor. I understand we are to be Guarded by a great Number of Militia to Staunton Goal, where we are to be kept in Close Confinement."[2]

The three justices refusing to acknowledge the usurped jurisdiction were led under guard towards the valley of Virginia. After they had traveled one day together, Mackay obtained leave to proceed to Williamsburg, "in order to lay Connolly and his Militia's conduct before my Lord Dunmore," while Smith and McFarlane proceeded with the officer to the Staunton jail. Arriving at Williamsburg, Mackay laid his story before Dunmore, who heard him to the end, and then told him "that Connolly was authorized by him as Governor of Virginia to prosecute the claim of that Colony to Pittsburgh and its Dependencies, and as to taking of prisoners, he Connolly only imitated the Pennsylvania officers in Respect to Connolly's imprisonment by them." However, Dunmore permitted the justices to return home, which they did at once.[3]

Commissioners to Lord Dunmore.—In the mean time information of the interruption of the court at Hannas Town, communicated by the letters of William Crawford and of Thomas Smith, with information also of the arrest of the justices, Mackay, Smith, and McFarlane, was received by Governor Penn at Philadelphia on April 19th, and on the 21st, the communications being laid before the Council, it was at once resolved to appoint commissioners "to go as soon as possible to Williamsburgh, in order to represent to the Government of Virginia the ill Consequences which may happen to the Persons and Properties of his Majesties Subjects, if an immediate stop be not put to the Disorders and violent proceedings which have been begun and are now carrying on, under the Authority of that Government,[4] &c." James Tilghman and Andrew Allen, members of the Governor's Council, men distinguished in their day (the former the father of William Tilghman, the eminent chief justice of Pennsylvania), were appointed the commissioners with written instructions, first, to prevail upon Lord Dunmore to unite with the proprietaries of Pennsylvania in a petition to the king to appoint commissioners to run and mark the boundary line, the expense to be equally borne by the two colonies; second, whether he should so agree or not, they were to use every possible argument to induce him to agree to a temporary line until the permanent boundary could be established; but the commissioners were not to accede to any temporary line which would give to Virginia jurisdiction over any lands lying to the eastward of the Monongahela.[5]

The commissioners arrived at Williamsburg on the 19th of May, 1774, and on the 21st had an oral conference with Lord Dunmore, in which the latter expressed his willingness to join in a petition to the king to appoint commissioners to settle the boundary, but stated that Virginia would not bear any part of the expense. He suggested that the communications should be in writing, which method was adopted, and the different propositions and discussions are preserved.[6]

For the reason that, as will be seen, the mission was entirely unsuccessful, let it suffice to state that on the part of Pennsylvania the commissioners proposed as a temporary boundary that Mason and Dixon's line be extended to the distance of five degrees of longitude from the river Delaware, and the courses of that river having been ascertained north from said line, that from the end of the said five degrees a line or lines drawn to the Ohio, as nearly as may be at the distance of five degrees of longitude in every part from a corresponding part of the Delaware River in the same latitude, this to be taken as the line of temporary jurisdiction until the true western line was established.[7]

In reply to this suggestion, Lord Dunmore would not accept a line of jurisdiction "of such an inconvenient and difficult to be ascertained shape," and contended that by a proper construction of William Penn's charter the western boundary was to be a meridian at five degrees of longitude from the Delaware run south from the parallel of forty-two degrees latitude, imagining that the course of that river was to the northeast continuously to that parallel, and hence that such a meridian would fall east of Pittsburgh, in which he was much mistaken.

The Pennsylvania commissioners then, rejecting the suggestion of Lord Dunmore, made another proposi-

[2] IV. Pa. Archives, 488. See X. Col. Records, 176. On the 25th of April, 1774, the deposition of Ephraim Hunter, deputy sheriff of Westmoreland County, taken before the mayor of Philadelphia, stated that on the 10th of April, on his return from court, he stopped at the house of William Elliot, living about seven miles from Pittsburgh, to refresh himself and horse; that suddenly five or six men appeared, armed with rifles, which they presented and required him to surrender; that he knew them immediately to be a party of militia raised by Dr. Connolly, and refused; that he ran into the house and there he saw Æneas Mackay, Devereux Smith, and Andrew McFarlane, Esquires, magistrates, etc., in custody of a certain Francis Brown, who calls himself deputy sheriff of Augusta County, in Virginia, and a guard over them; that the next day he saw the magistrates twelve miles from Pittsburg, on their way to Virginia, who wished to send letters by him, but were not permitted.

[7] Is it not probable that in this first proposition made by the commissioners, one at least of whom was an eminent lawyer, all was asked for that was supposed to belong to Pennsylvania? If so, it would indicate that the proprietaries would have been content with a boundary corresponding with the meanderings of the Delaware, which would have left almost all of the present Washington County in the Pan Handle.

tion in the interest of harmony and peace: "And for that valuable purpose we shall be willing to recede so far from our Charter Bounds as to make the River Monongahela, from the Line of Dixon and Mason downward, the Western Boundary of Jurisdiction, which would at once settle our present Disputes without the great Trouble and Expense of running Lines, or the inconveniences of keeping the jurisdiction in suspense. This, We assure your Lordship, is the farthest we can go in Point of Concession, &c."

The sur-rejoinder of Lord Dunmore, determined as he was from the start not to abandon his usurpation, was made an easy matter for him after the communication with the clause last quoted was received. He becomes cross and proceeds: "And what were your proposals to reconcile these difficulties? Why, in your first you propose that every Thing in dispute shall be given to Pennsylvania, and in your second that Virginia shall be content without having any Thing given up to it; at least I conclude from both the Proposals, but that no real intention is meant to avoid the great and reciprocal Inconveniences of a doubtful Boundary, &c. . . . and your Resolution with respect to Fort Pitt, (the jurisdiction over which Place I must tell you at all Events, will not be relinquished by the Government without his Majesty's Order,) puts an entire stop to further Treaty, &c."[1]

[1] Since the foregoing was written, the following proceedings have been found, confirmatory of the suspicion expressed on a previous page, that the Virginia usurpation was not upon the mere motion of Lord Dunmore, but was petitioned for by the inhabitants of the Monongahela valley themselves:

"On the 13th of May, 1774, his Excellency the Governor ordered the following petition, with several Papers relative to the imprisonment of Mr. John Connolly by the officers of Pennsylvania, while he was acting as a Magistrate under the authority of this Government, to be laid before the House of Burgesses:

"'To his Excellency John, Earl of Dunmore, his Majesty's Lieutenant and Governor General of the Colony and Dominion of Virginia and Vice Admiral of the same, and the Honorable the Council and House of Burgesses:

"'The Petition of the Inhabitants settled on the Waters of the Ohio showeth:

"'That the major part of your petitioners have formerly lived in his Majesty's Colony of Virginia, and preferring the mild, easy, and equitable Government thereof, to the expensive administration of justice in Pennsylvania, which, being a limited and Proprietary Government, hath extended an unlimited, and (as we think) illegal jurisdiction over his Majesty's subjects, settled many miles west of their bounds, which is oppressive to the poor and burthensome to all, particularly in trying titles to land, and in recovery of small debts, wherein their officers' fees are so disproportioned that they seem rather calculated for enriching individuals than the public good; their practicing attornies being left at liberty to exact such fees as they may choose, in all land trials, and will not plead against their jurisdiction, however far west it may be extended. Officers of Government being generally at the disposal of the Proprietaries' Governor, who will neither appoint nor continue any but those who adhere strictly to their master's interest, however contrary to the good of the settlers, his Majesty's subjects; add to this, a heavy Provincial tax, which they likewise exact, a great part thereof being swallowed up by the officers who lay and collect the same, to the great grievance of the subject.

"'From the aforesaid several grievances, and the farther ill-provided defence of the country in cases of emergency, we humbly conceive our lives and properties in imminent danger, from our contiguity to the faithless and barbarous natives, whose treaties, alliance, and sincerity, are never to be relied on, as well as a hearty conviction that the present Government is usurped.

"'We humbly entreat your Lordship and Council, and the Honorable House of Burgesses, to make such provision for us, in our present distressed situation, as to you shall seem meet; and your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.'

"Signed by 587 Inhabitants."

Nothing remained for the commissioners but to return to Philadelphia.

The Peace Policy Directed.—And so there was to be no amicable settlement of the boundary controversy. This side the great sea there was no superior power with jurisdiction to determine the dispute upon the application of either party. The adherents to either side, if there were any who were not fond of strife, must have contemplated the prospect of the acquisition of peaceful homes in the new West with a degree of hopelessness. The negotiations terminated on the 27th of May, 1774.

On the 22d of April, the next day after the appointment of the commissioners, the failure of whose negotiations has just been narrated, Governor Penn wrote to William Crawford and his associates, justices of Westmoreland County:[2]

"Gentlemen:

"The present alarming Situation of our Affairs in Westmoreland County, occasioned by the very unaccountable Conduct of the Government of Virginia, requires the utmost Attention of this Government, and therefore I intend, with all possible Expedition, to send Commissioners to expostulate with my Lord Dunmore upon the Behavior of those he has thought proper to invest with such power as hath greatly disturbed the peace of that Country. As the Government of Virginia hath the power of raising militia, and there is not any such in this Province, it will be in vain to contend with them, in the way of Force; the Magistrates, therefore, at the same time that they continue with steadiness to exercise the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania with respect to the distributions of Justice and the punishment of Vice, must be cautious of entering into any such contests with the Officers of my Lord Dunmore, as may tend to widen the present unhappy Breach; and therefore, as Things are at present circumstanced, I would not advise the Magistracy of Westmoreland county to proceed by way of criminal prosecution against them for exercising the Government of Virginia."

This letter of instructions gives the key to the absence of retaliatory measures on the part of the Westmoreland County authorities. The records of the courts of that county show but a single case, and that of a civil action at a later date, wherein any of the Virginia partisans were defendants, while the records of the Virginia courts, soon to be noticed, are full of such cases,—criminal proceedings against officers acting under Pennsylvania authority. These instructions also account for the long continuance and outrageous character of the Connolly domination. The doctor was suffered to proceed unpunished.

Thus was the power of Lord Dunmore established in the valley of the Monongahela. Fort Pitt was rebaptized by Connolly under the name of Fort Dunmore,[3] which, henceforward until the Revolution had well advanced, was its Virginia name. Connolly's energies had full play. His conduct was, if possible, of a more outrageous character than it had been.

On June 25, 1774, the adherents of Pennsylvania residing at Pittsburgh addressed a long memorial to Governor Penn, in which additional ill treatment on the part of Dr. Connolly was set forth, and, after several specific acts of a violent character, it was stated,—

"That your Memorialists are of the opinion that Mr. Connolly has taken all the pains in his power to foment the disturbance between us and the Indians, for several reasons; particularly when a number of the Traders arrived here lately from the Shawanese Towns, escorted by three Shawanese Chiefs, who were sent to the care of Col. Croghan, 'till a handsome present was made for them by the Traders for their fidelity, Dr. Connolly ordered out forty-one of his militia to take them at all events, and to send them to his Guard-House; which hellish plot being discovered, Mr. Butler and some other Friends conveyed the Indians and their presents over the River just as the Guard surrounded Mr. Croghan's House, for which Mr. Butler has been severely threatened."[1]

Accompanying the memorial from which this extract is made is a document of "Remarks on Dr. Connolly's proceedings," closing a long schedule of his misdeeds with the sentence: "These are but a few of the many Distresses we labor under, and without Protection and Speedy Redress, we cannot long support ourselves under such Grievous Persecution & Tyranny."

Dunmore's War.—To intensify the troubles of the pioneers of this time, hostilities broke out on the part of the Indians, as intimated in the memorial cited. Early in the spring occurred the massacre of Logan's party at Baker's, opposite the mouth of Yellow Creek, and the attack on others at Grave Creek, in which Cresap's men were engaged.[2] Then Logan broke loose with his party of revenge, ravaged the Upper Monongahela, and sent his war parties into the Ten-Mile region. A panic followed, which drove the settlers living west of the Monongahela across into the neighboring and more densely populated regions, some of them not stopping this side of the mountains. The Yellow Creek massacre occurred on Saturday, April 30, 1774; on May 7th, Valentine Crawford, brother of William, residing in what is now Fayette County, wrote to George Washington:[3] "This alarm has caused the people to move from over the Monongahela, off Chartiers and Raccoon, as fast as ever you saw them in the year 1756 or 1757 down in Frederick County, Va. There were more than one thousand people crossed the Monongahela in one day at three ferries that are not one mile apart." Arthur St. Clair writes Governor Penn, June 12th,[4] "A fresh report of Indians being seen near Hanna's Town, and another party on Braddock's Road, set the people a going again yesterday. I immediately took horse and rode up to inquire, and found it, if not totally groundless, at least very improbable; but it was impossible to persuade the people so, and I am certain I did not meet less than one hundred families, and I think two thousand head of cattle, in twenty miles' riding."

The war, of the terrors of which these scenes formed a part, and which was called Dunmore's war, was not ended until the treaty at Camp Charlotte, in now Pickaway County, Ohio, in October. Dunmore himself was with that part of the army which came across the mountains and descended the river by way of Pittsburgh,[5] and himself arranged the terms of the treaty under circumstances which hitherto have been unaccountable except upon the supposition that for reasons known to him he designed to preserve the Indians in the interest of the British government. The war had been entirely with the Virginians, or "Long Knives," as the Indians called them. No incursions had been made upon soil admittedly of Pennsylvania. And to show a well-settled belief always entertained that Dunmore's war and Dunmore's usurpation of jurisdiction in the West were each parts of one plan by which to set two American governments by the ears, a quotation is made from Jacobs' "Life of Michael Cresap," p. 63:[6]

"And we have seen from the preceding pages how effectually he (Dunmore) played his part among the inhabitants of the western country. I was present myself when a Pennsylvania Magistrate of the name of Scott [Thomas Scott, see post.] was taken into custody and brought before Dunmore at Redstone Old Fort; he was severely threatened and dismissed, perhaps on bail, but I do not recollect now. Another Pennsylvania Magistrate was sent to Staunton Jail. And I have already shown in the preceding pages that there was a sufficient preparation of material for this war in the predisposition and hostile attitude of our affairs with the Indians; that it was consequently no difficult matter with a Virginia Governor to direct this incipient state of things to any point most conducive to the grand end he had in view, namely, weakening our national strength in some of its best and most efficient parts."

It must be remembered in this connection that the ill feeling towards the mother-country had reached that state that conventions of representative men were being held in all the colonies. The meeting of the provincial deputies chosen by the several counties in Pennsylvania began in Philadelphia on July 15, 1774, and the condition of affairs leading to such conventions could not have been unknown to Lord Dunmore.

Counter Proclamations.—While at Pittsburgh, on his way down the river with the division of his army under his own command, Lord Dunmore issued a proclamation,[7] dated at Fort Dunmore, Sept. 17, 1774:

"A PROCLAMATION.

in this quarter; And whereas the Province of Pennsylvania have unduly laid claim to a very valuable and extensive quantity of his Majesty's territory, and the executive part of that government, in consequence thereof, has most arbitrarily and unwarrantably proceeded to abuse the laudable advancements in this part of his Majesty's dominions by many oppressive and illegal methods in the discharge of this imaginary authority; And whereas the ancient claim laid to this country by the colony of Virginia, founded in reason, upon pre-occupancy and the general acquiescence of all persons, together with the instructions I have lately received from his Majesty's servants, ordering me to take this country under my administration, and as the evident injustice manifestly offered to his Majesty by the immediate strides taken by the proprietors of Pennsylvania in prosecution of their wild claim to this country demand an immediate remedy, I do hereby in his Majesty's name require and command all his Majesty's subjects west of the Laurel Hill to pay a due respect to this my proclamation, strictly prohibiting the execution of any act of authority on behalf of the province of Pennsylvania at their peril in this country; but, on the contrary, that a due regard and entire obedience to the laws of his Majesty's colony of Virginia under my administration be observed, to the end that regularity may ensue, and a just regard to the interest of his Majesty in this quarter, as well as to the subjects in general, may be the consequence. Given under my hand and seal at Fort Dunmore, Sept. 17, 1774.

"DUNMORE.

"By his Excellency's command.

"God save the King."

Counter to this Governor Penn issued his proclamation on Oct. 12, 1774:[1]

"A PROCLAMATION.

"Whereas, I have received information that his Excellency, the Earl of Dunmore, governor general in and over his Majesty's colony of Virginia, hath lately issued a very extraordinary proclamation, setting forth [here is recited the substance of Governor Dunmore's proclamation of the 17th of September]; And whereas, although the western limits of the province of Pennsylvania have not been settled by any authority from the Crown, yet it has been sufficiently demonstrated by lines accurately run by the most skillful artists that not only a great tract of country west of the Laurel Hill, but Fort Pitt also are comprehended within the charter bounds of this province, a great part of which country has been actually settled, and is now held under grants from the proprietaries of Pennsylvania, and the jurisdiction of this government has been peaceably exercised in that quarter of the country till the late strange claim set up by the Earl of Dunmore in behalf of his Majesty's colony of Virginia, founded, as his Lordship is above pleased to say, 'in reason, pre-occupancy, and the general acquiescence of all persons;' . . . In justice, therefore, to the proprietaries of the province of Pennsylvania, who are only desirous to secure their own undoubted property from the encroachment of others, I have thought fit, with the advice of the council, to issue this, my proclamation, hereby requiring all persons west of Laurel Hill to retain their settlements as aforesaid made under this province, and to pay due obedience to the laws of this government; and all magistrates and other officers who hold commissions or offices under this government, to proceed as usual in the administration of justice, without paying the least regard to the said recited proclamation, until his Majesty's pleasure shall be known in the premises, at the same time strictly charging and enjoining the said inhabitants and magistrates to use their utmost endeavors to preserve peace and good order. Given under my hand and the great seal of the said province, at Philadelphia, the twelfth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-four, and in the fourteenth year of the reign of our sovereign Lord George the Third, by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, and so forth.

"By his Honor's command.

"God save the King."

Thus the contest had advanced another step, to a war by proclamations.

The Indian war having closed by the treaty in October, Lord Dunmore returned to Virginia, again stopping, however, at Pittsburgh, when he was once more brought into personal communication with his Virginia adherents. He then proceeded to Redstone (Brownsville), at which place he had Thomas Scott brought before him for the offense of acting as a Pennsylvania magistrate. The scene which occurred is well given in the language of a letter by St. Clair to Governor Penn, dated Dec. 4, 1774:[2]

"SIR,—The war betwixt the Indians and Virginians is at last over. . . . But our troubles here are not yet over. The magistrates appointed by Lord Dunmore in this Country seem determined to enforce the jurisdiction of Virginia, and have begun with arresting one of your Honour's Officers.

"The 12th of November Mr. Connolly sent a warrant for Mr. Scott to appear before him, or the next justice, to answer for a number of Offences committed by him under a pretended Authority from Pennsylvania. The Warrant Mr. Scott did not Chuse to pay any regard to, and the same Evening a number of armed men came to his House to take him by Force to Fort Burd. There he found Lord Dunmore, Mr. Campbell, and Mr. Pentecost, ready to sit in judgment upon him. Much passed amongst them, but the event was that he was obliged to enter into Recognisance, with two Sureties, to appear at the next Court, to be held at Pittsburgh, for the county of Augusta, on the 20th day of December, if the Court should happen to be held there that Day, or at any further Day when the Court should be held there, to answer for having acted as a Magistrate of Pennsylvania, contrary to Lord Dunmore's Proclamation, or be committed to Goal. He chose the recognizance, the Circumstances of his Family and Health rendering the other very Inconvenient. . . .

"I account it a fortunate Circumstance that they began with Mr. Scott, who, with a great deal of firmness, possesses a good share of natural Understanding. In the course of an Examination, which continued near two Hours, he told Lord Dunmore that he had only one short answer to all his Questions, which might save his Lordships a good deal of Trouble; 'that he acted under Commission from your Honour and in Obedience to your Proclamation.' His Lordship was pleased to reply, that you had no right to give any such Commission or Authority to issue such Proclamation. Mr. Scott told him that was a Matter of which he was not a proper Judge, and would abide by the Consequences. . . ."[3]

The reader will observe in this letter the first reference to the intended establishment of a court of justice for Augusta County, Virginia, at Pittsburgh, or Fort Dunmore, as the Virginians called it. It seems to have been arranged that the first term should be held at that place on Dec. 20, 1774, for on December 18th, St. Clair writes to Governor Penn:[4] "The Court it is said will certainly be held at Pittsburgh on the 20th. I am personally threatened, but I promised Mr. Scott to be there at the time to give him some countenance at least, if I cannot give him assistance at his trial."

The Pennsylvania magistrates having been instructed to maintain the jurisdiction of their province, regardless of Dunmore's proclamation of Sept. 17, 1774, but with information that Pennsylvania was not in condition to contest that fact by military force, the Westmoreland County justices endeavored to execute the laws as was required of them, but, as has been seen, with trials and tribulation. Their difficulties will further appear from the following among other papers laid before the Provincial Council:[5]

"Given under my Hand, at Fort Dunmore, this 30th Day of December, 1774.

"JOHN CONNOLLY."

The Augusta County Court.—The Augusta County court had not been opened at Fort Dunmore on December 20th, as had been determined, but on the 12th of December, 1774, a writ had been issued by Lord Dunmore, tested in the name of his Majesty, adjourning the county court of Augusta County from Staunton to Fort Dunmore, accompanied with a new commission of the peace, embracing, with the old justices of the parent county, the names of such of the adherents in the Monongahela valley as were regarded as proper persons for Virginia magistrates.[1] Their first term of court was held at Fort Dunmore on Feb. 21, 1775, at which time George Croghan, John Campbell, John Connolly, Thomas Smallman, Dorsey Pentecost, John Gibson, George Vallandigham, and William Goe appeared, took the qualifying oaths, and occupied their seats as justices. And see the policy observed even here. Croghan, during the Dunmore war, had become quite a Pennsylvanian; he is now made the presiding justice, and this brought him back among the Virginia partisans. And from this date there were not only two different sets of magistrates, with their subordinate officers, assessors, and commissioners, over the same people in the Monongahela Valley, but within a few miles of each other had been established two different courts, regularly (or irregularly) administering justice under the laws of two different governments!

On the very next day after the first sitting of the Fort Dunmore court, on Feb. 22, 1775, Robert Hanna and James Caveat, justices, were both arrested for the performance of their duties as Pennsylvania magistrates and confined at Pittsburgh, where they remained for about three months, vainly endeavoring to obtain a release.[2] After fruitless efforts to obtain relief from the Governor and Council, then probably employed with affairs of a most auspicious nature, the sheriff of Westmoreland County aided by a posse of an effective strength proceeded to the place of their incarceration the latter part of June, and set them at large, carrying Dr. Connolly along with them. Just when they were released does not appear, but to July term, 1775, of the Court of Common Pleas of Westmoreland County there is found an action of Capias in Case indicating an arrest for damages, brought by Robert Hanna, Esq., v. John Connolly. The writ is returned, C. C., that defendant is arrested. This cause, the only one in the records of Westmoreland County having a reference to the Virginia controversy, is marked, "October, ended, says Plff.," which is probably explained by a letter from Valentine Crawford to George Washington, dated June 24, 1775,[3] from which is extracted as follows:

"We have chosen committees out here, and are raising an independent company, regulating matters the best we can; but an unhappy confusion happened the other day. The Pennsylvanians came to Fort Pitt with the Sheriff and about twenty men, and took Major Connolly about midnight, and carried him as far as Ligonier, the very night before we were to have the talk with the Indians. . . . On Major Connolly being taken, the people of Chartiers came in a company and seized three of the Pennsylvania magistrates, who were concerned in taking off Connolly,—George Wilson, Joseph Spear, and Devereux Smith. They were sent in an old leaky boat down to Fort Fincastle[4] under guard. Our court, however, had no hand in this. It was done by a mob or set of Connolly's friends on Chartiers Creek. The members of our committee wrote a very spirited letter to the gentlemen of the Pennsylvania committee,[5] demanding Connolly back. All signed it and sent it with an express. On its receipt they immediately sent Major Connolly back."

The Revolution.—In the foregoing letter there are references to a new condition of things. A crisis in the affairs of the colonies had been reached. The 19th of April, Lexington and Concord had become famous as the places where the first struggles for independence were made, and it is now to be seen what effect the new order was to have upon the boundary controversy. The astounding news had scarcely reached the Monongahela River when, on the same day, the 16th day of May, 1775, meetings of citizens were held both at Hanna's Town and Pittsburgh, at which separate meetings the two committees—the Virginia and the Pennsylvania committees—referred to by Valentine Crawford were constituted. Extracts from the record of the proceedings of these two meetings are now given:

"COMMITTEE OF AUGUSTA COUNTY, VA.

"At a meeting of the inhabitants of that part of Augusta county that lies on the west side of Laurel Hill, at Pittsburgh, the 16th day of May, 1775, the following gentlemen were chosen a committee for the said district, viz.: George Croghan, John Campbell, Edward Ward, Thomas Smallman, John Cannon, John McCullough, William Goe, George Valandigham, John Gibson, Dorsey Pentecost, Edward Cook, William Crawford, Devereux Smith, John Anderson, David Rodgers, Jacob Vanmetre, Henry Enoch, James Ennis, George Wilson, William Vance, David Shepherd, William Elliot, Richmond Willis, Samuel Semple, John Ormsby, Richard McMahon, John Neville, and John Swearingen.[1]

"The foregoing gentlemen met in committee and . . .

"Resolved, unanimously, That this committee have the highest sense of the spirited behavior of their brethren in New England, and do most cordially approve of their opposing the invaders of American rights and privileges to the utmost extreme, and that each member of this committee, respectively, will animate and encourage their neighborhood to follow the brave example.

"The imminent danger that threatens America in general, from ministerial and parliamentary denunciations of our ruin, and is now carrying into execution by open acts of unprovoked hostilities in our sister colony of Massachusetts, as well as the danger to be apprehended to this colony in particular from a domestic enemy, said to be prompted by the wicked minions of power to execute our ruin, added to the menaces of an Indian war, likewise said to be in contemplation, thereby think to engage our attention, and divert it from that still more interesting object of liberty and freedom, that deeply and with so much Justice hath called forth the attention of all America; for the prevention of all or any of these impending evils, &c."[2]

Measures were taken to collect from the people, in a manner the most agreeable to them, so much money as would be sufficient to purchase half a pound of gunpowder and one pound of lead, flints, and cartridge-paper from every tithable person in the county, which sum was fixed at two shillings and sixpence for each tithable. The resolutions, only a small portion of which are given above, are full of energy and directness:

"COMMITTEE OF WESTMORELAND COUNTY, PA.

"At a general meeting of the inhabitants of the county of Westmoreland, held at Hanna's Town the 16th day of May, 1775, for taking into consideration the very alarming situation of the country, occasioned by the dispute with Great Britain:

"Resolved, unanimously, That the Parliament of Great Britain, by several late acts, have declared the inhabitants of Massachusetts Bay to be in rebellion, and the ministry, by endeavoring to enforce those acts, have attempted to reduce the said inhabitants to a more wretched state of slavery than ever before existed in any State or country, not content with violating the constitutional and chartered rights of humanity, exposing their lives to the licentious soldiery, and depriving them of the very means of subsistence.

"Resolved, unanimously, That there is no reason to doubt but the same system of tyranny and oppression will (should it meet with success in Massachusetts Bay) be extended to other parts of America; it is therefore become the indispensable duty of every American, of every man who has any public virtue or love for his country, or any bowels for posterity, by every means which God has put in his power to resist and oppose the execution of it; that for us we will be ready to oppose it with our lives and fortunes. And the better to enable us to accomplish it, we will immediately form ourselves into a military body, to consist of companies to be made up out of the several townships under the following association, which is declared to be the Association of Westmoreland County."

Then follow the Articles of Association, which provided that the people should form themselves into a regiment or regiments and choose officers to command them, in such proportions as should be thought necessary, and they ended with "No licensed murder! no famine introduced by law!"

End of Dr. Connolly's Power.—The spirit of the Revolution being abroad, the Monongahela valley is soon rid of Dr. John Connolly. His royal chief, Lord Dunmore, had early become alarmed and removed his family on board the "Fowey," a British man-of-war in the Chesapeake, having previously taken away the powder from the magazine in Williamsburg. Patrick Henry, afterwards the illustrious, at the head of a body of armed volunteers, forced him to surrender the powder, and soon afterwards the news of Lexington having come, the last British Governor of Virginia, on the 8th day of June, 1775, follows his family to their refuge, and hereafter is the enemy of his late subjects.[3] As to Connolly himself, it has already been seen from the letter of Valentine Crawford that he had been arrested and carried to Ligonier, where, on the application of the Revolutionary Committee at Pitsburgh, he had been released. Arthur St. Clair wrote to Joseph Shippen, Jr., July 12, 1775:[4] "Whilst Connolly was at my house endeavoring to procure bail, I treated him with a good deal of civility, by which, with the help of a cheerful glass, I got at some of his designs. He is immediately to go to England with White Eyes and some other Delaware chiefs, to solicit for them a confirmation of the country which they now live in, a great part of which is within the bounds of this Province, and Lord Dunmore is to back it with all his interest." But St. Clair's wine was not quite so successful in uncovering Connolly's intentions.

Immediately upon his release, Dr. Connolly proceeded from Pittsburgh to Lord Dunmore, who sent him to Gen. Gage, commanding the British forces at Boston. He left Boston on the 14th or 15th September, and reached Lord Dunmore about the middle of October with instructions from Gen. Gage to Dunmore, who granted him a commission of lieutenant-colonel of a regiment to be raised in the "back parts" and Canada, with power to nominate his subordinate officers. On Nov. 22, 1775, when the new lieutenant-colonel was on his way to Detroit, where he was to meet his commission and instructions as an officer of the British troops to operate against his late fellow-citizens, he was captured at Hagerstown, in Maryland, and amongst the papers found in his possession was the following in his own handwriting, [1] Quite a number of these committeemen were sound Pennsylvanians. Devereux Smith, George Wilson, William Elliott, John Ormsby, and John Swearingen are known to have been, and probably others were. John Swearingen was the father of Van Swearingen, and lived on the Monongahela, below Georges Creek.

evidently a copy of the proposals he had laid before Gen. Gage in the previous September:[1]

"Proposals for Raising an Army to the westward, &c., And for effectually Obstructing a communication between the Southern and Northern Governments.[2]

"As I have, by directions from his Excellency, Lord Dunmore, prepared the Ohio Indians to act in concert with me against his Majesty's Enemies in that quarter, and have also dispatched intelligence to the different Officers of the militia on the frontiers of Augusta County, in Virginia, giving them Lord Dunmore's assurances that such of them as shall hereafter evince their loyalty to his Majesty, by putting themselves under my command, when I should appear amongst them with proper Authority for that purpose, of a confirmation of title to their lands, and the quantity of three hundred acres to all who should take up Arms in support of the Constitution, when the Present Rebellion is subsided; I will undertake to penetrate through Virginia, and Join his Excellency, Lord Dunmore, at Alexandria, early next spring, on the following conditions and authority. . . . [Here followed the several provisions of the plan of his campaign, the supplies, etc., required.] . . . If your Excellency judges it expedient for the good of the service to furnish me with the Authority & other requisites I have mentioned, I shall embrace the earliest opportunity of setting off for Canada, and I shall immediately dispatch Lord Dunmore's armed Schooner, (which now awaits my Command,) with an account of what your Excellency has done, and that I shall be ready, if practicable, to Join his Lordship by the 20th of April, at Alexandria, where the troops under my command may fortify themselves under Cover of the Men of War on that station. . . ."

This paper, found concealed carefully in Connolly's saddle at the time of his arrest, is without date, but is there any further doubt as to the secret purpose of Dunmore and Connolly, by their usurpations within our borders, to handicap the efforts of the colonies in the struggle for independence? But Connolly took none of the leaders of his Virginia forces into the British camp with him. Samuel Semple, his father-in-law; George Croghan, his uncle; Dorsey Pentecost, the chief of his co-workers, were joining in the Revolutionary arrangements of the Augusta County committee, perhaps at the very time he was preparing the Ohio Indians to act in concert with him against his relatives and friends.[3]

[1] For the papers relating to the arrest of Dr. Connolly, the Proposals and his subsequent fate, see IV. Pennsylvania Archives, 681, 682, 654, 695; II. Olden Time, 93, 104, 112, 348. He was turned over to Congress and held until the winter of 1780–81, when he was exchanged. In the summer of 1782, he with one Johnson was at the head of a body of British and Indians at Lake Jadaque (as Chautauqua was then called) threatening an attack upon Fort Pitt, but being deterred by a report of the abundant preparation made, a body of his Indians made the raid on Hanna's Town on July 13th. After the Revolution was over and the treaty of peace made with England, Connolly seems to have settled in Canada, and in 1788 he is found at Louisville, intriguing with the people of Kentucky, who were said to have made overtures to Lord Dorchester to be taken under the protection of the British government. (II. St. Clair Papers, 98, 101.) Kentucky was then still within the State of Virginia. (See also concerning him Jacobs' Life of Cresap, 57, 60.)

[3] Craig's History of Pittsburgh, 134.

As we are now done with the celebrated Dr. Connolly in the text (and has this illustrious individual received too much consideration?), that the reader may know more about his personal history, the following, found on an interleaf of a 'History of the Civil War in America,' in the handwriting of John Ormsby, one of the Augusta County Committee, is added:

"The above Dr. Connolly was born and bred near Wright's Ferry, in Pennsylvania. His father was a jobber among the farmers on the Susquehanna, who found the secret of pleasing an orderly Quaker widow of the name of Ewing, and the jobber was a professed papist. This match, as might be expected, proved very disagreeable, so that he left nothing to commemorate his memory but the villanous doctor. This fellow had traversed the Illinois country till he could subsist there no longer, so that he appeared at Pittsburgh a few years before the commencement of the Revolution. Here he was introduced to Lord Dunmore, who traveled through the western country to sound the inclination of the inhabitants as well as the Indians. Connolly, like a hungry wolf, closed with Dunmore a bargain that he would secure a considerable interest among the white inhabitants and the Indians on the frontier. In consequence of this agreement my lord made him a deed of gift of 2000 acres of land at the Falls of the Ohio, and 2000 more to Mr. John Campbell, late of Kentucky, both of which grants are now owned by the heirs of Col. Campbell. Connolly immediately set himself to work in disseminating his hellish insinuations among the people. He employed an adjutant to drill the militia, and had the audacity to engage artificers to repair the old fort, and in every respect acted the part of a tyrant. He sent runners among the Indians far and near, with large promises of soon supplying them with goods and money. Having thus far paved the way for his atrocious designs, he met Lord Dunmore at Alexandria, where they concerted the infernal scheme of massacring all those on the frontiers who would not join in their work. Matters thus progressed and Lord Dunmore sent Connolly to General Clinton at New York [this should be General Gage, at Boston,—Ed.], who approved the scheme, appointed Connolly a lieutenant-colonel and commander of two or three regiments of whites and Indians, with authority to draw on the paymaster-general for cash. Upon this exaltation, the great and mighty Connolly set out for Baltimore, where he joined the persons who were taken (captured) along with him, and who were no doubt as sanguinary villains as himself. A report was whispered among the minute-men at Hagerstown, etc., of Connolly's schemes, so that they had a sharp lookout for him, and happily succeeded in arresting him and his comrades, and all the commissions for the new regiments, with the general plan of their operations, were found upon him, upon which he was committed to prison. This news, you may be sure, was joyfully received on the frontier and especially at Pittsburgh, where the writer of these lines resided with his family.

"When Lord Dunmore arrived in Pittsburgh (in 1773 or 1774) he lodged at my house, and often closeted me, as he said, for information respecting the disposition of the inhabitants. He threw out some dark insinuations as to my usefulness, in case I would be concerned, but as he found I kept aloof he divulged his plans to Connolly, and I suppose to Campbell, else why give him the aforesaid grant of land which he enjoys and is very valuable? . . . Connolly and Arnold, both of whom merited a halter, are now on half-pay on the British establishment." From II. Olden Time, 93.

It might have been supposed that once the colonies of Virginia and Pennsylvania were united in a common cause of such magnitude as now was pending, the territorial controversy between them would have ceased. Not so. However, it will now be necessary to avoid details and go to generals, showing how that contest continuing the attention of the Colonial Congress as well as the common friends of both peoples became actively involved.

Address of Delegates in Congress.—On July 25, 1775, the date when Connolly reached Lord Dunmore from Gen. Gage at Boston, an address was sent to our people from the delegates from Pennsylvania and Virginia in the Continental Congress. As this paper has been preserved in but few, if in more than one, of the publications in which it is referred to, it is here copied entire:

"To the Inhabitants of Pennsylvania and Virginia on the west side of Laurel Hill:

"Friends and Countrymen: It gives us much concern to find that disturbances have arisen and still continue among you, concerning the boundaries of our colonies. In the character in which we now address you, it is unnecessary to inquire into the origin of these unhappy disputes, and it would be improper for us to express our approbation or censure on either side; but as representatives of two of the colonies united among many others for the defence of the liberties of America, we think it our duty to remove, as far as lies in our power, every obstacle that may prevent her sons from co operating as vigorously as they would wish to do toward the attainment of this great and important end. Influenced solely by this motive, our joint and earnest request to you is that all animosities which have heretofore subsisted among you as inhabitants of distinct colonies may now give place to generous and concurring efforts for the preservation of everything that can make our common country dear to us.

"We are fully persuaded that you, as well as we, wish to see your differences terminate in this happy issue. For this desirable use we recommend it to you, that all bodies of armed men kept up under either province be dismissed, that all those on either side who are in confinement or under bail for taking a part in the contest be discharged, and that until the dispute be decided every person be permitted to retain his possessions unmolested.

"By observing these directions the public tranquillity will be secured without injury to the titles on either side; the period, we flatter ourselves, will soon arrive when this unfortunate dispute, which has produced much mischief, and, as far as we can learn, no good, will be peaceably and constitutionally determined.

"We are your friends and countrymen.

There were no armed men maintained by the Pennsylvania authorities on their side, nor, so far as known, were there any Virginians held in confinement after Connolly had been liberated; whereas the Virginians had a regularly organized militia, and at the date of this communication held George Wilson, Joseph Spear, and Devereux Smith in confinement at Fort Fincastle, "exposed to every species of insult and abuse," unless they were released when Connolly was discharged.[2] Hence the expression as to "either province" and "either side" were doubtless used to avoid making disagreeable distinctions.[3]

CHAPTER XIII.

V.

The Boundary Controversy continued—Proceedings of the Virginia Legislature—Division of the District of West Augusta into Three Counties: Ohio, Yohogania, and Monongalia—Council of War at Catfish Camp—Petition for a new State—Oath of Allegiance to Virginia—Virginia Land Laws—The Baltimore Agreement as to the Boundary Line—Virginia Surveys—Pennsylvania Indignant—Final Ratification of Boundary Agreement.

Virginia Legislative Proceedings.—Henceforward, though deeds of violence between the contending parties were neither so frequent nor of so grave a character, yet there was no disposition on the part of Virginia, now about to become an independent sovereignty, to surrender her foothold in the valleys of the Monongahela and Ohio. Lord Dunmore's power having ceased, her "Convention of Delegates for the Counties and Corporations in Virginia" was held at Richmond, July 17, 1775. 1775. On the 7th of August that convention resolved "that Capt. John Neville be directed to march with his command of one hundred men and take possession of Fort Pitt, and that said company be in the pay of the colony from the time of their marching."[4]

Chapter I. of the General Ordinances passed by this convention was for raising a force for the defense of the colony. Two complete regiments of ten hundred and twenty men each were to be raised. Exclusive of these regiments there were to be two companies, of which that of Capt. Neville was to be one, and another of one hundred and twenty-five men to be raised in West Augusta. By the same ordinance the colony was divided into sixteen districts, "and the inhabitants of West Augusta are to compose one entire District."[5]

Chapter IV.[6] regulated the election of delegates and committee-men in the several counties, and its Section 10 provided that the freeholders of every county and corporation within this colony, "and the landholders in the district of West Augusta, as hereafter described, shall have the liberty and privilege of electing annually twenty-one of the most discreet, fit, and able men, being freeholders, to act as a committee for carrying into execution the association and such other measures as the Continental Congress or General Convention of the colony may direct."

The next Virginia Convention, that for December, 1775, was held first at Richmond, and afterwards by adjournment to Williamsburg, heretofore the State capital.[7] And at Williamsburg (the royal government having ceased to have sway there) was held the convention of May, 1776, at which the Declaration of Rights[8] and the new Constitution was adopted.[9]

Chapter V. of the ordinances of the convention of May, 1776, was "An ordinance[10] to enable the present magistrates and officers to continue the administration of justice, and for settling the general 1776. mode of proceedings in criminal and other cases till the same can be more amply provided for." Section 4 provided:

[4] This Capt. Neville, prior to 1774, had made large entries and purchases under Virginia rights of lands on Chartiers Creek, and was about to remove thither from near Winchester, Va., when the Revolution broke out. He was the Gen. Neville whose residence was burned in the Whiskey Insurrection. This residence was on the right bank of Chartiers Creek, near Woodville, and opposite the present Allegheny County Poor-farm.

Capt. Neville is said to have taken no part in the jurisdictional contest, his presence at Pittsburgh with his command having reference to the protection of the frontiers from the Indians and their preservation from British approach. (I. Olden Time, 445.)

[5] 9 Hening's Statutes, 13, 14. In this ordinance we have the first recognition in the Virginia laws of the district of West Augusta, the jurisdiction of the Fort Dunmore court, as will appear. It is seen that West Augusta as a civil division was never created by law, but simply recognized by this and later ordinances.

"And whereas courts in the District of West Augusta have hitherto been held by writs of adjournment, which writs cannot now be obtained, Be it therefore ordained, That the Justices residing in the said District, on taking the same oath aforesaid, shall have the power and authority to hold a court within the said District, on the third Tuesday of every month, at such place as they may appoint, and shall exercise their office both in court and without, in the same manner as the justices of the several counties are by this ordinance empowered to do."

The reader of the extracts from the records of the Westmoreland County courts will remember that after the April term of 1776 the courts of that county held no sessions until in January, 1778. But the Virginia courts, at Pittsburgh (the name of Fort Dunmore having been abandoned), continued regularly, and, as will hereafter be seen from the records themselves, when the ordinance quoted reached the valley of Monongahela, the justices determined that by its provisions their jurisdiction became independent of that of old Augusta County, and they were entitled to a clerk and other officers of their own appointment,[1] and enabled to remove the seat of justice from Pittsburgh to Augusta Town, just over the ridge west from the present Washington.

The Continental Congress at an early period perceived the importance of securing the friendship of the Indians, at least so far as to prevent their acting in concert with their enemies,[2] and on July 4, 1776, appointed commissioners to hold treaties with them. The commissioners for the Middle Department were Jasper Yeates and John Montgomery from Pennsylvania, and Dr. Thomas Walker and John Harvie from Virginia. These gentlemen met at Fort Pitt soon after their appointment, but were not able to assemble the tribes until in October. While at this place the commissioners doubtless observed the evils arising out of the disputed jurisdiction, probably they had some instructions in the premises, for there is extant a paper in the handwriting of Jasper Yeates, evidently prepared by these commissioners, which is of such interest as to warrant its publication:[3]

"A proposal for accommodating the Disputes between the Counties of West Augusta and Westmoreland until the boundary between them can be settled.

"1st. That the Laws as far as respects the Jurisdiction of the County of West Augusta be exercised on the South side of Youghyogany River and said River be considered as the Boundary between the two Counties in respect to the Jurisdiction of their respective Courts only.

"2d. That the People claiming under the County of Westmoreland may continue to be represented at their Capital as usual and have liberty to choose their Representatives and all other Officers of Government; only their Sheriffs, Magistrates, and Constables shall not act in Office on the South side of said River; Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall tend to invalidate any Judgment in the Courts held heretofore for Westmoreland, but when a boundary is run they may execute such Judgments on their side of the said Boundary anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding.

"3d. That the Inhabitants on the South side of the Youghyogany and East of the Monongahela River as far as the great line shall not pay Taxes to either Government until said Boundary is settled, and all persons associated in the Militia are to serve under the Government they associated under. If these Proposals shall meet the Approbation of the Public the People for West Augusta shall meet at Mr. Martin Kemp's on the 2d Tuesday in November next, and those claiming under Westmoreland at Mr. Edward Cook's, the same Day, to choose six men to be their Trustees to Negotiate and confirm the above Proposals.

"By Friends to both Governments.

"October 18th, 1776."[4]

The suggestions contained in these proposals for the temporary adjustment of the disputed judicial jurisdiction seem to have attracted no attention even. Historical writers heretofore have made no reference to this document, and give no account of any meetings held at the place designated. At least the writer has not been able to find such references.

Division of the District of West Augusta.—The district of West Augusta, with its county-seat at Augusta Town, was not, however, of long duration now, for the Virginia General Assembly of October, 1776, at Williamsburg, Patrick Henry, Governor, made several enactments affecting that jurisdiction. Chapter XLV.[5] was:

"An act for ascertaining the boundary between the county of Augusta and the District of West Augusta, and for dividing the said District into three distinct counties."[6]

[4] The Jasper Yeates who was the writer of this paper (for there had been one or more of that name before him) was a citizen of Lancaster. He was justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania from 1779 till his death in March, 1817. While at Pittsburgh, in 1776, he paid a visit to the scene of Braddock's defeat in company with his fellow-commissioner, Dr. Walker, and wrote a letter (published in VI. Hazard's Register, 104; also in II. Pa. Archives, Sec. S., 740) describing the appearance of that battle-field. Dr. Walker had participated in the scenes upon that field on July 9, 1755, twenty-one years before.

"He pointed out the ford where the army crossed the Monongahela (below Turtle Creek 800 yards); a finer sight could not have been beheld; the shining barrels of the muskets, the excellent order of the men, the cleanliness of their appearance, the joy depicted on every face at being so near Fort Du Quesne, the highest object of their wishes the music re-echoing throughout the mountains. How brilliant the morning! how melancholy the evening!"

[6] The writer has a paper without date, in the handwriting of Col. George Morgan, evidently prepared before the passage of the act in the text. Col. Morgan (afterwards of Morganza) was, by appointment of Congress, Indian agent for the Middle Department, with headquarters at Pittsburgh, from April, 1776, for several years. He was not an adherent of the Virginia power, and therefore could not have been the author of the paper, which is as follows:

"Proposed Division of West Augusta into Three Counties,—Ohio, Youghiogane and Monongahela.

"Ohio County—

"To begin where the Division Line between Maryland and Pennsylvania, continued in the same Course Westward, strikes the Monongahela; Thence the same Course continued to the River Ohio; Thence up the River Ohio & along the several windings thereof to the Monongahela River, and up the said Monongahela River to the Place of Beginning.

"Remarks: This would make a County of a good Figure, nearly square, about fifty Miles long & thirty broad; the whole bounded by Natural Lines except about thirty miles; The Centre of this Tract of Country would be near the Heads of Chartiers Creek, A rich Country thick settled & well watered with fine Springs.

"Monongahela County—

"To begin at the lower side of the Mouth of the litle Kanawha; Thence South-East to the Laurel Hill to where it is crossed by the Bound-

"Whereas it is expedient to ascertain the boundary between the county of Augusta and the District of West Augusta. Be it enacted, &c., That the boundary between the said District and county shall be as follows, to wit: Beginning on the Allegheny mountain between the heads of the Potowmack, Cheat, and Green Briar Rivers; thence along the ridge of mountains which divides the Waters of Cheat river from those of Green Briar, and that branch of the Monongahela called Tygers Valley river to the Monongahela river; thence up the said river and the west fork thereof, to Bingemans creek, on the northwest side of the said west fork; thence up the said creek to the head thereof; thence in a direct course to the head of Middle Island creek, a branch of the Ohio; and thence to the Ohio, including all the waters of the said creek in the aforesaid District of West Augusta; all that territory lying to the northward of the aforesaid boundary, and to the westward of the States of Pennsylvania and Maryland, shall be deemed and is hereby declared to be within the District of West Augusta.[1]

"And to render the benefits of government and administration of justice more easy and convenient to the people of said District, Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the 8th day of November next ensuing all that part of the said District lying within the following lines, to wit: Beginning at the mouth of Cross Creek, thence up the same to the head thereof, thence southeastwardly to the nearest part of the ridge which divides the waters of the Ohio from those of the Monongahela, thence along the said ridge to the line which divides the county of Augusta from the said District, thence with the said boundary to the Ohio, thence up the same to the beginning, shall be one distinct county, and be called and known by the name of Ohio County.

ary Line between Maryland & Pennsylvania extended to the Westward; Thence Westward the same Course as the said Line continued to the River Ohio; Thence down the River Ohio to the place of beginning.

"Remarks: This is nearly a square Figure & contains all the Settlements on the Monongahela above Youghiogane County. It is about fifty Miles Long and near forty broad. The Centre of the Settled part of this Country is at or near the Mouth of the West Fork of Monongahela, a rich, well settled country; and as the Indiana Claim is contained within these Lines, no other County would be involved in a Dispute with the Proprietors.

"Youghiogane County—

"To begin where Ohio County does—viz.: where the division Line between Maryland & Pennsylvania continued in the same Course Westward strikes the Monongahela; Thence down the River Monongahela to the Alleghany River & up the said Alleghany River to the Western Boundary Line of the State of Pennsylvania; thence along the said Western Boundary Line of the State of Pennsylvania to the Southern Boundary Line of the State of Pennsylvania; Thence Eastward along the said Southern Boundary Line of the State of Pennsylvania to the Meridian of the Western Boundary Line of Maryland; thence south to the North West Corner or Boundary of Maryland; Thence West to the Place of Beginning; And whereas it is uncertain where the Western & Southern Boundary Lines of Pennsylvania will fall or be fixed when the Line of Property shall be run; Suppose until then the said Boundary should be pointed out as follows:—To begin at the Mouth of Plum Run & up the same to the head thereof; Thence to the Bullock Penns in Tenure of a certain William Elliott; Thence along the great Road to the Widow Mires; thence along the New Virginia Road & Braddock's old Road (as proposed by the Honble. Convention of Virginia to the Convention of Penna. as a temporary Boundary between the two States,) to the Boundary of Maryland.

"Remarks: This is a very compact figure nearly of the same size as the other two Counties. The Centre of it would be some where about the Mouth of Jacobs Creek, in a very fertile and populous Country. By this division there is no Inhabitants of the three Counties would have to cross any difficult Waters when obliged to attend at Courts or other public Meetings.

"Additional Remarks: The Inhabitants settled between the Laurel Hill and the Alleghany Mountains along Cheat River, Tyger Valley & Green Briar are sufficient for a Fourth County or they might remain in Augusta or be included in Monongahela County, by extending the first Line to the Alleghany Hill. Memm. Every foot of Youghiogane County as above proposed is claimed by Penna. and as the Monongahela is the Extent of their present Claim, the Proceedings in the Courts of the undisputed parts of Virginia would not, should this division be adopted, be interrupted or Party Quarrels arise in them."

[1] This section, it will be observed, simply provided for a dividing line on the southeast and south for the district of West Augusta.

"And all that part of the said district lying to the northward of the following lines, viz.: beginning at the mouth of Cross Creek, and running up its several courses to the head thereof, thence southeastwardly to the nearest part of the aforesaid dividing ridge between the waters of the Monongahela and Ohio, thence along the said ridge to the head of Ten Mile Creek, thence east to the road leading from Catfish Camp to Redstone Old Fort, thence along the said road to the Monongahela River to the said Fort, thence along Dunlap's old road to Braddock's road and with the same to the meridian of the head fountain of the Potowmac, shall be one other distinct county, and be called and known by the name of Yohogania County.[2]

"And all that part of the said District lying on the northward of the county of Augusta, to the westward of the meridian of the head fountain of the Potowmack, to the southward of the county of Yohogania, and to the eastward of the county of Ohio shall be one other distinct county and shall be called and known by the name of the county of Monongalia.

"And for the administration of justice in the said counties of Ohio, Yohogania, and Monongalia, after the same shall take place, Be it enacted, &c., That after the said 8th day of November, courts shall be constantly held every month by the justices of the respective counties, upon the days hereafter specified for each county respectively, that is to say: For the county of Ohio, on the first Monday, for the county of Monongalia on the second Monday and for the county of Yohogania on the fourth Monday in every month, in such manner as by the laws of this commonwealth is provided for other counties, and as shall be by their commission directed."

These acts of the Virginia General Assembly are copied verbatim from the original volumes of Hening, and to illustrate to the eye those parts of Pennsylvania embraced in the original district of West Augusta, as well as within the limits of the counties of Ohio, Yohogania, and Monongalia, a map has for the first time been constructed and expressly for this work.

A subsequent section of the chapter from which the foregoing extracts are made provided that Yohogania County should have jurisdiction to hear and determine all actions and suits, both in law and equity, which should be "depending" before the court of West Augusta at the time the said jurisdiction should take place. And it was further provided:[3]

"And be it further enacted, etc., That it shall and may be lawful for the landholders of the said counties respectively, qualified as aforesaid,[4] to vote for representatives in General Assembly, and they are hereby required to meet at the times and places hereafter mentioned, that is to say: The landholders of the county of Yohogania to meet at the house of Andrew Heath, on the Monongahela, in the said county, on the eighth day of December next; the landholders of the county of Monongalia to meet at the house of Jonathan Corbin (Coburn), in the said county, on the said eighth day of December next, and the landholders of the county of Ohio to meet at the house of Ezekiel Dewit, in the said county, on the said eighth day of December next, then and there to choose the place of holding courts for their respective counties."

Whether the election required to be held at the house of Andrew Heath to choose a place for holding their courts of Yohogania was held at the time and place appointed is not known, but the records of that court show (although there is some obscurity) that when duly organized it held its sessions at the plantation of Andrew Heath, on the left bank of the Monongahela, in what is now Allegheny County, but near the Washington County line. There its business continued to be done until Aug. 28, 1780, after, indeed, the boundary line was established, though before it had been finally run and marked. Jonathan Coburn lived about ten miles southeast of New Geneva, in what is now Fayette County,[1] and the place chosen for the holding of the courts of Monongalia County was the plantation of Theophilus Phillips, about two miles above New Geneva, on the Monongahela River, and here its courts were held until the establishment of the boundary line, when, to get them out of Pennsylvania, they were removed to the plantation of Zachwell Morgan, afterwards Morgantown. The early records of this court were lost in the burning of the clerk's office in 1796. The place fixed for holding the courts of Ohio County was Black's cabin, on Short Creek, now West Liberty, and the first court held there for that county was on Jan. 6, 1777. There these courts continued to be held until 1797, when they were removed to Wheeling.[2]

[2] Here again is had only the southern line of Yohogania County, dividing it from Ohio and Monongalia, permitting Virginia to exercise her jurisdiction as far to the east and north as she could get.

[3] 9 Hening, 264, 265.

[4] The qualifications were, by a preceding section, the possession for the year preceding of 25 acres of land with a house and a plantation, or of 100 acres without a house and plantation, claiming an estate for life in one's own right, or in right of his wife, although a patent had not been obtained; in all future elections of senators the three counties were to form one district.

Council of War at Catfish Camp.—The military as well as the civil power of Virginia was also actively exercised west of the Alleghanies. On the 13th of December, 1776, Patrick Henry addressed a letter to Dorsey Pentecost, then county lieutenant (the officer having charge and direction of the militia) for Yohogania County, apprising him of the certainty of Indian hostilities in the next spring, and advising every possible preparation to be made in anticipation thereof.

In pursuance of the recommendations of this letter, a "council of war" was held at Catfish Camp, now Washington, on the 28th and 29th of January, 1777. This meeting was attended by the several county lieutenants and field-officers of the three counties, and by thirty-two captains of militia. It would be interesting to know at what spot the council was held.[3]

[1] The Monongahela of Old, 93.

[2] There has long been a tradition that an old Virginia court-house stood just west of Washington, one account placing it at Razortown (Jacobs' Life and Times of Patrick Gass, 229), which was a collection of houses on the farm now of Hon. John Hall, a short distance northwest; another placing it upon the farm of William Gabby, about one mile immediately west of that borough; and our older historians (Dr. Smith's Old Redstone, 32, 113, and 129, and Dr. Creigh's History of Washington County, 137) would place the court-house of Ohio County, Va., at one or the other of these places. The writer, aided by the statements of old citizens, after a close study of the records of Augusta County and of the Yohogania County courts, has come to the conclusion that there was a log court-house and jail sixteen by twenty-four feet on Mr. Gabby's farm, and that it was the court-house of Augusta County, Va., just before Yohogania County was organized, at which place business was done for two or three monthly terms in the fall of 1776. (See note to the Centennial Celebration of Washington County, 39, and the records of the Augusta County Court hereafter.)

Petition for a New State.—The reader has now seen the establishment over the territory west of the Alleghanies of both the civil and military power of Virginia, and it must be apparent that by the winter are here printed from the originals, presented by D. T. Morgan, Esq., from the papers of his grandfather, Col. George Morgan:

"Sir,—The more I consider of the state of things in your quarter, the more I am convinced of the Necessity there is to prepare for hostilities in the Spring; and although Continental Troops will be stationed on the Ohio, yet the Militia must be the last great Resource from which your safety is derived. In order to form something resembling Magazines, for the Present I have ordered about six Tuns of Lead for West Augusta; and that this article may be deposited in the Proper places, I wish you to summon a Council of Field Officers and Captains, and Take their Opinions which places are the fittest places for Magazines in the three countys of Yohogania, Monongalia, and Ohio, and Transmit the result to me. I wish you would please to find out where Capt. Gibson's Cargo of Powder is, and let me know. In the Council of Officers I would desire it should be Considered whether the Militia with you want any articles Government can furnish and what it is, for be assured it will give me great pleasure to Contribute to your safety. I am of the opinion that unless your People wisely Improve this winter you may probably be destroyed. Prepare then, to make resistance while you have Time. I hope by your Vigorous Exertions your frontier may be defended, and if necessity shall require some assistance be afforded to Combat our European Enemies, I have great Expectations from the number and known Courage of your Militia, and if you are not wanting in foresight and preparation they will do great things. Let a plan of Defence be fixed and settled beforehand; I mean principally the places of Rendezvous and the Officers who are to act, as well as to Provide Speedy and certain Intelligence. Let the Arms be kept in constant repair and readiness, and the Accoutrements properly fixed. It will be proper to send out Scouts and Trusty Spies Toward the Enemies Country to bring you accounts of their movements. I wish great care may be used in the Nomination of Military Officers with you, as so much depends on a proper appointment. You will please to give Strict attention to the great Objects here recommended to you, and I shall be Happy to hear of the safety of your people, whose Protection Government will omit Nothing to accomplish.

of 1776–77, at which time the Revolution had fairly begun, and the settlers were in terror and distress from anticipated Indian barbarities, already too well known to them in all their horrors,—that by this period many of the inhabitants had become weary of the contest, apparently without an end to it, and had begun to feel the want of a State government with its power nearer to them than that either of Pennsylvania or Virginia. To illustrate that feeling a paper is now given which has never appeared in print,[1] and which cannot fail to interest by its peculiar style, as well as by the vigorous setting forth of the evils under which our early settlers lived:

"Colonel Dorsey Penticost was unanimously chosen President of this Council, whereupon Col. Morgan and Col. Shepherd Conducted him to his seat.

"Col. David McClure was unanimously chosen Clark.

"The President Informed the Council of the Importance of the business for which he had convened them and Concluded with Recommending Deliberation in their Councils, Decency and decorum in their Debates, and then Produced Letters from his Excellency the Governor, dated the 9th and 13th of December last, Signifying the Necessity of Spedy and Vigorous Exertion of the Militia, and putting them in a proper State of Defence &c. &c.

"Upon Motion made Resolved, That Col. Dorsey Pentecost, Col. Shepherd, Col. Morgan, Col. Cannon, Cap. Richey, Col. McClure, Maj. Evins, Cap. Mitchel & Cap. Martin be appointed a select Council to Consider of the before Mentioned Letters and make their Report to this Council, to be then Reconsidered, and the Council adjourned until Tomorrow at 10 O'Clock.

"January 29, 1777.

"The Council met according to adjournment, and Col. Isaac Cox was unanimously Chosen Vice President. Col. Pentecost from the Select Council delivered the following Resolutions which he read in his place and then sent to the Clark's Table where they were read a Second Time, and

"Resolved, that it is the opinion of your Committee, That the following is proper Places for Magazines in the District of West Augusta (viz) the House of Gabriel Cox in the County of Yohogania, the House of John Swearingen in the County of Monongalia & the House of David Shepherd in the County of Ohio; and that the Six Tunns of Led to be sent to this district mentioned in his Excellency's letter of the 13th of December last, addressed to Col. Pentecost, be divided in the following manner and deposited at the before mentioned places, (viz) for Yohogania County 2½ Tunns, for the Monongalia County 2¼ Tunns & for the Ohio County 1¼ Tunns, being (as this Committee Conceives) as equal a Division of the said Led and other Ammunition that may be sent to this District, according to the number of People in each County as may be.

"Resolved, That his Excellency, the Governor, be requested to send with all Convenient Expedition, Powder Equivalent to the before Mentioned Led, which agreeable to the Rifle use is one pound of Powder to two pounds of Led, with Ten Thousand flints.

"Resolved, That in Consequence of his Excellency's Requisition that it is highly Necessary and it is accordingly Strongly recommended to Col. Pentecost to send a Capt. and 50 Men down the Ohio to find out if Possible where Capt. Gibson's Cargo of Powder is, & Conduct it up to the Settlements and that it is the Opinion of this Council that the Officers and Men to be employed in the Business Deserves double Wages.

"Resolved, As the Opinion of your Committee, That upon the best Information they can at this Time Collect, that one-third of the Militia of this District is without Guns, Occasioned by so many of the Regular Troops being furnished with Guns out of the Militia of this District, and that one-half of the remaining Part wants repairs.

"Resolved, Therefore, that Government be requested to send up to this district one Thousand Guns, these Rifles, if Possible to be had, as Muskets will by no means be of same Service to defend us against an Indian Enemy.

"Resolved, For the Purpose of Repairing Guns, Making Tommehocks, Sculping knives, &c., that proper Persons ought to be Employed in each County at the Public Expense, and that Thomas and William Parkeson be appointed in the County of Yohogania, and that they Immediately Open Shop at their House on the Monongahela River for the above purpose, and that they make with all possible Expedition all the Rifle Guns they can, and a Sufficient number of Tommehocks, Sculping knives, &c., and that the County Lieut. Reseve them, or Direct the Distribution thereof.

"Resolved, That Robert Curry be Employed for the above Purpose in the Monongahela County, and that he Open Shop at his own Dwelling-House in the forks of Cheet.

"Resolved, That Thomas Jones (or some other proper person to be appointed by the County Lieut.) be appointed for the above purpose in the Ohio County, to Open Shop at the House of Col. Shepherd.

"Your Committee having Maturely & Deliberately Considered the Truly Critical and Distressed Situation of this Country, and with the deepest Anxiety have viewed the very recent Cruel Depredations Committed on our people by our relentless Neighbor, the Indians, and with the utmost regard have Considered his Excellency's Recommendation to prepair for Hostilities in the Spring, and to prepair to make Defense while we have time, and to form a plan of Defense for this Country, are of opinion that if no field Officer appear to take the Command of Troops, now raised and raising in this District at the next meeting of the different Committees, that the said Commanders forthwith order the 8d Troops to such places on the Frontiers as they shall think proper, for the Present Protection of the Inhabitants, and at least one hundred of 8d Troops be ordered to Grave Creek Fort,—and in case the said Troops are not stationed as aforesaid, then the County Lieut. of Yohogania County is requested to order a Lieut. and 25 men to Baker's Fort, and a Lieut and 25 men to Isaac Cox's on the Ohio, and that the County Lieut. of Ohio County order a Lieut. and 25 men to Beech Bottom, and a Lieut. and 25 men to the Grave Creek Fort, and that the County Lieut. of Monongalia County order a Capt. and 50 men to be stationed at the House of Capt. Owen Davis's, the head of Dunkard Creek, and a Lieut and 25 men to Grave Creek to augment that Garrison to 50 men, those men to be ordered at such time as the County Lieut. shall think Proper and the Exergency of the times Require; and that Militia be Drafted, officered, and (held in Constant Redines) to Rendezvous at the following places and in the following Manner—(Here is meutioned the active officers, the places of Rendezvous in each County, which are the places of the Magazines, the drafts and who heads them from each company, which is 15 Privates, one Sarjt. and a Commissioned officer, making in the whole about 1100 men.)

"Resolved, unanimously, That upon the first hostilities being Committed on our Settlements, that the County Lieutenant in whose County the same may Happen, Immediately call a Council of the three Countys as Proper measures may be pursued for the Chastisements of the Cruel Perpetrators."

"WILLIAMSBURGH, Feb. 28, 1777.

"SIR,—You are forthwith to send one hundred men properly Officered in order to escort safely to Pittsburgh the powder purchased by Capt. Gibson. I suppose it is at Fort Louis, on the Mississippi, under the protection of the Spanish Government.

"The Canoes necessary for the voyage, the provisions, and every other matter must be provided, and the officers' orders must be to lose not a moment in getting the powder to Fort Pitt. If the present Garrison leave that Fortress, you are to order two hundred militia to guard it till further orders; let necessary repairs be forthwith done that it may be put in good posture of defense. I've ordered four 4-pound Cannon to be cast for strengthening it, as I believe an attack will be made there ere long. Let the Ammunition (Lead included) be stored there, & let it be defended to the last extremity; give it not up but with the lives of yourself and people. Let the provisions be stored there and consider it as the Bulwark of your Country. No Militia shall be paid but those on actual duty, & I wonder any one should think otherwise. Let me know the quantity of Ammunition and stores at Pittsburgh; upon any alarm of dangerous Invasion, take care to defend Pittsburgh. Capt. Linn has a good Boat capable of bringing the Powder.

"Your humble servant,

"To the Honourable the President & Delegates of the thirteen united American Colonies in General Congress assembled:

"The Memorial of the Inhabitants of the Country West of the Allegheny Mountains Represents:

"That whereas the province of Pennsylvania and Virginia have set up Claims to this large & extensive Country which for a considerable time past have been productive & attended with the usual Concomitants & pernicious and destructive effects of discordant and contending jurisdictions, innumerable Frauds, Impositions, Violences, Depredations, Feuds, Animosities, Divisions, Litigations, Disorders, & even with the Effusion of human Blood to the utter Subversion of all Laws, human & divine, of Justice, Order, Regularity & in a great Measure even of Liberty itself & must unless a timely and Speedy Stop be put to them in all Probability terminate in a Civil War, which how far it may effect the Union of the Colonies & the General Cause of America we leave to your wise, prudent, impartial, & Serious Consideration:—And whereas (exclusive of & as an Addition and further aggravation to the many accumulated Grievances & Oppressions we already labor under in consequence of the aforesaid Claims & the Controversies &c thereby occasioned, the Fallacies, Violences & fraudulent Impositions of Land Jobbers, Pretended Officers & Partisans of both Land Offices & others under the Sanction of the jurisdiction of their respective Provinces, the Earl of Dunmore's Warrants, Officers & Soldiers Rights & an Infinity of other Pretexts in which they have of late proceeded so far as in Express Contradiction to the Declaration of the Continental Commissioners made on the ninth day of October 1775 at a Treaty at Fort Pitt to make encroachments on the Indian Territorial Rights by improving, laying Warrants & Officers Claims on & Surveying some of the Islands in the Ohio and Tomahawking (or as they term it) improving in a variety of places on the Western side of said River, to the great imminent & manifest danger of involving the Country in a Bloody, ruinous, and destructive War with the Indians, a People extremely watchful, tenacious, & jealous of their Rights, Privileges and Liberties, and already it is to be doubted, too much inclined to a Rupture and Commencement of Hostilities from the Persuasions and Influence of British Emmissaries, Agents & Officers & the little attention unfortunately hitherto paid to them by the American Confederacy in Conciliating their affections, Confidence and Friendship;) there are a number of private or other claims to Lands within the limits of this Country equally embarrassing & perplexing; George Croghan Esquire in various Tracts, Claims Land by Purchase from the Six Nations in 1748 and confirmed to him at the Treaty of Fort Stanwix in 1768 to the amount by Computation of 200,000 Acres on which are Settled already 1500 or 2000 Families; Major William Trent on Behalf of himself and the Traders, who suffered by the Indian Depredations in 1763, another large Tract Containing at least 4,000,000 of Acres by Donation & Cession of the Six Nations aforesaid at the aforesaid Treaty of Fort Stanwix in 1768, on which 1500 or 2000 Families are already settled; and there was on the 4th day of January 1770 a certain Contract & Purchase made by the Honourable Thomas Walpole and associates (including the Ohio Company & the Officers & Soldiers in the Service of the Colony in the year 1754) under the name of the Grand Ohio or Vandalia Company, with and of the Lords, Commissioners of the Treasury on Behalf of Crown for an Extensive Tract of Country within the Purchase & Cession from the aforesaid Six Nations and their Confederates at the said Treaty of Fort Stanwix aforesaid made and by his Majesty's Special Command & Directions notified to the Indians of the Western Tribes at the aforesaid Confederacy on the 3rd day of April 1775 by Alexander McKee, Esqr., Deputy Agent of the Western Department for Indian Affairs on the Plains of Scioto, who by their Answer of the 6th of the same Month, expressed their approbation thereof and Satisfaction & Acquiescence therein, at the same Time justly observing that it was as necessary for prudent People to govern the white settlers, as for the Indians to take Care of their foolish young men.

"This is a country of at least 240 miles in Length, from the Kittanning to opposite the Mouth of Scioto, 70 or 80 in Breadth, from the Alleghieny Mountains to the Ohio, rich, fertile and healthy even beyond a Credibility & peopled by at least 25,000 Families since the year 1768 (a population we believe scarce to be paralleled in the Annals of any Country) Miserably distressed & harrassed and rendered a scene of the most consummate Anarchy & Confusion by the Ambition of some, and avarice of others, and its wretched Inhabitants (who through almost insuperable Difficulties, Hardships, Fatigues & Dangers at the most imminent Risque of their lives, their little all and everything that was dear and valuable to them, were endeavoring to secure an Asylum & a Safe Retreat from threatening Penury for their tender numerous families with which they had removed from the lower Provinces and settled themselves in different Parts of the aforesaid Lands & Claims agreeable to the usual Mode of Colonization & an Ancient Equitable & long established Custom & Usage of the Colonies, the Rights of Pre-Emption whenever those Lands could be rightfully & legally conveyed & disposed of:) after surmounting every other Obstacle to the Hopes, their Expectations & wishes, now unhappily find themselves in a worse & more deplorable Situation than whilst living on the poor, barren rented Lands in their various respective Provinces below: through Party Rage, the Multiplicity of Proprietary Claims & Claimants & the Precariousness & Uncertainty of every kind of Property from the forecited Causes, the want of Regular Administration of Justice & of a due and proper Executive and Exertion of a system of Laws & regulations, and Mode of Polity & Government, adapted to their peculiar Necessities, local Circumstances and Situation, and its Inhabitants, who tho' neither Politicians nor Orators, are at least a rational and Social People inured to Hardships & Fatigues, & by experience taught to despise Dangers & Difficulties, and having immigrated from almost every Province of America, brought up under and accustomed to various different & in many respects discordant & even Contradictory Systems of Laws & Government & since their being here from the want of Laws & Order Irritated and exasperated by Ills & urged & Compelled by Oppressions & Suffering and having imbibed the highest and most extensive Ideas of Liberty, as the only pure efficient source of Happiness and Prosperity will with Difficulty Submit to, the being annexed to or Subjugated by (Terms Synonymous to them) any one of those provinces much less the being partitioned or parcelled out among them, or be prevailed on to entail a state of Vassalage & Dependence on their Posterity, or Suffer themselves who might be the happiest & perhaps not the least useful Part of the American Confederacy as forming a secure, extensive & Effectual Frontier & Barrier against the Incursions, Ravages & Depredations of the Western Savages, to be Enslaved by any set of Proprietary or other Claimants, or arbitrarily deprived & robbed of those Lands & that Country to which by the Laws of Nature & of Nations they are entitled as first Occupants, and for the Possession of which they have resigned their All & exposed themselves and families to Inconveniences, Dangers & Difficulties, which Language itself wants Words to express & describe, whilst the Rest of their Countrymen softened by Ease, enervated by Affluence & Luxurious Plenty & unaccustomed to Fatigues, Harishipts, Difficulties or Dangers, are bravely contending for and exerting themselves on Behalf of a Constitutional, national, rational, & social Liberty.

"We the Subscribers Inhabitants of the Country as aforesaid therefore by Leave by —— hereby plenarily, amply & specially delegated, interested, authorized & impowered to act & to do for us on this occasion as our immediate Representatives, Solicitors, Agents, & Attornies, Humbly to represent to you as the Guardians, Trustees, Curators, Conservators & Defrees of all that is dear or valuable to Americans, that in our Opinion no Country or People can be either rich, flourishing, happy, or free (the only laudable, rightful, useful, warrantable & rational ends of Government,) or enjoy the sweets of that Liberty, the Love & desire of which is radically impressed on, Self-Existant with & animates & actuates, every brave, generous, humane and honest soul, and for which every American Breast at this time pants and glows with an unusual Flow of Warmth and Expectation & with redoubled zeal and Ardor: whilst annexed to or dependent on any Province whose seat of Government is those of Pennsylvania & Virginia four or five hundred miles distant and separated by a vast, extensive & almost impassable Tract of Mountains, by Nature

"As this petition recites the treaty of Pittsburgh, in October, 1775, it is probable we may fix its date (for it has none) to the latter part of 1776 or 1777. I rather think the latter, not only from my own recollection of the circumstances of that period, but especially from the request in the petition to be erected into a new State, which certainly would not be thought of before the Declaration of Independence." But it is now possible to fix the date of this remarkable petition with more certainty by other papers, for which the writer is indebted to Mr. Cranmer, to wit, a letter from Jasper Yeates to James Wilson, Esq., dated Pittsburgh, July 30, 1776, with a P.S. of date Aug. 1, 1776, in which latter the petition is mentioned as then being circulated and intended for Congress and its contents described, and another paper, being "The Address and Memorial of the Committee of West Augusta County" to the Speaker of the Lower House of the Virginia Assembly, praying that the "Hon'ble House will take such steps in the premises & make such necessary Regulations to ensure Union to the Inhabitants in these times of public Calamity, etc., in which also the petition is mentioned, and the bounds of the 14th state described, "Beginning on the Eastern Bank of the Ohio, opposite the mouth of the Scioto, etc."

itself formed and pointed out as a Boundary between this Country & those below it, that justice might be both Tedious and Expensive, the Execution of the Laws dilatory & perhaps mercenary, if not arbitrary; Redress of Grievances precarious and Slow and the Country so situated without participating of any of the Advantages suffer all the Inconveniences of such a Government & be continually exposed, as we already too well know, by Dear bought and fatal experience to the violence, Frauds, Depredations, Exactions, Oppressions of interested, ambitious, designing, insolent, avaricious, rapacious & mercenary Men & Officers— And pray, that the said Country be constituted, declared & acknowledged a separate, distinct & independent Province & Government by the title & under the Name of 'The Province & Government of Westsylvania,' be empowered & enabled to form such Laws & Regulations & such a System of Polity & Government as is best adapted & most agreeable to the peculiar Necesities, local Circumstances & Situation thereof and its Inhabitants invested with every other Power, Right, Privilege & Immunity, vested or to be vested in the other American Colonies; be Considered as a Sister Colony & the fourteenth Province of the American Confederacy, that its Boundaries be:—Beginning at the eastern Branch [bank] of the Ohio opposite the mouth of the Scioto and running thence to the top of the Allegheny Mountains, thence with the Top of the said Mountain to the Northern Limits of the Purchase made from the Indians in 1768, at the Treaty of Fort Stanwix aforesaid, thence with the said Limits to the Allegheny or Ohio River and thence down the said River as purchased from the said Indians at the aforesaid Treaty of Fort Stanwix, to the Beginning.

"And that for the more effectual Prevention of all future and further Frauds & Impositions, being practiced upon us, thereby all Proprietary or other Claims or Grants, heretofore by or to whomsoever made of Lands within the aforesaid Limits of the said Province, with & under the approbation & Sanction of the General Congress or Grand Continental Council of State of the United American Colonies:

"And your Memorialists, as by all Ties of Duty, Interest and Honor bound, as American Brethren & Associates, embarked with you in the same arduous & glorious Cause of Liberty and Independency shall ever pray, that your Councils and Endeavors for the Common Good, may be continually attended, blessed and crowned with a never ceasing and uninterrupted series of Success, Happiness and Prosperity."

Perhaps it would be a work of supererogation to proceed beyond the production of the foregoing extraordinary paper, by way of illustrating the results of the contention between the two sovereignties. That petition was actually circulated and filed with the Continental Congress, but without any result whatever, for at that time the United States had no territorial jurisdiction. Not until 1784, when the Atlantic States had ceded their claims to the territory west of their several grants, was there a national commonwealth established. If, therefore, the Congress had had the wish to grant the prayer of this petition it did not have the power.

Oath of Allegiance and Fidelity to Virginia.—Early after the colonies had declared their independence of the mother-country, and when the Revolution was well under way, the States enacted laws
1777. requiring oaths of allegiance to the new sovereignty and a renunciation of the old. At the May sessions, 1777, of the General Assembly of Virginia the following law was enacted:[1]

"Whereas allegiance and protection are reciprocal, and those who will not bear the former are not entitled to the benefits of the latter; Therefore be it enacted, etc., That all free-born male inhabitants of this State, above the age of 16 years, except imported servants during their term of service, shall, on or before the tenth day of October next, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation before some one of the justices of the peace of the County, city, or borough, where they shall respectively inhabit; and the said justice shall give a certificate thereof to every such person, and the said oath or affirmation shall be as followeth, viz.: "I, ——, do swear or affirm, that I renounce and refuse all allegiance to George the Third, King of Great Britain, his heirs and successors, and that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to the commonwealth of Virginia, as a free and independent state, and that I will not, at any time, do, or cause to be done, any matter or thing that will be prejudicial or injurious to the freedom and independence thereof, as declared by Congress; and also that I will discover and make known to some one justice of the peace for the said State, all treasons or traitorous conspiracies which I now or hereafter shall know to be formed against this or any of the United States of America."[2]

The act then proceeded to require that the justices should keep registers and transmit returns to the county clerk; that within one month after the passage of the act the court of every county should appoint certain ones of their number "to make a tour of the county and tender the oath or affirmation aforesaid" to the persons of whom it was to be demanded, and that in the certificate directed to be returned of those who take the oath or affirmation "shall be mentioned the names of such as refuse;" that a list of the recusants should be delivered by the justice to the county lieutenant or chief commanding officer of the militia, "who is hereby authorized and directed forthwith to cause such recusants to be disarmed;" and such recusants were made incapable of holding any office in the State, of serving on juries, of suing for any debts, of voting or of being elected, and of buying and holding lands. The last section provided that the act should be read publicly by the sheriff of the county at the door of the court-house of his county on or before the 3d day of next September, "and also by every minister of the gospel, or reader, immediately after divine service, on some Sunday within the said time."

The records of the court of Yohogania County show that on Aug. 26, 1777,—John Campbell, John McDowell, Isaac Cox, Richard Yeates, John McDonald, William Goe, Zachariah Connell, George Vallandigham, Thomas Freeman, and John Canon, justices present,—gentlemen were appointed to make the "Tour of the Different Districts hereafter mentioned and Tender the Oath of Allegiance and Fidelity to this Commonwealth,[3] &c." To each appointee was assigned his district, over which he was to travel and tender the oath provided, making and returning his lists of those who took it and the recusants.

Virginia Land Laws.—Well may be supposed, as would appear from the action of Pennsylvania and

[1] Chapter III., 9 Hening, 281.

[2] A law with a like preamble, enactment, and oath of allegiance was passed by the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, June 13, 1777, excepting, however, the counties of Bedford and Westmoreland from its provisions, for the obvious reason, without doubt, that in the then existing conflict of jurisdiction the danger of open collision would become more imminent. The text shows how the law was enforced by Virginia in the very territory which Pennsylvania had exempted. (See III. Penn. Archives, Sec. S., 6.)

Virginia, respectively, with reference to the oaths of allegiance to the new State governments, that the Pennsylvania jurisdiction was scarcely exercised at all in the Monongahela valley. Indeed, long before, on Feb. 13, 1775, Robert Hanna, W. Lochry, John Carnahan, and Devereux Smith had united in a letter to Governor Penn,[1] in which they said, "We are sorry to repeat our complaints so often, but William Crawford, Esq., and Dorsey Pentecost hath each opened a Land Office, and assumed the Title of Deputy Surveyors to execute their entries. The people in general hath already given up, and what can we do to support Government, there now being writs granted for almost every acting Officer in this County, and we are every day expecting Confinement." [2]

It is, however, known that by far the greater part of the lands lying in Washington County, as originally erected, were occupied by persons claiming under Virginia titles. Settlement rights had been acquired, of course, when the settlements began, and such rights were always of much importance. There is evidence that as early as 1770 surveys had begun to be made, and during the time of Lord Dunmore a number of patents were granted. But not until the act hereinafter quoted was there a regular and continuous system of granting legal titles to lands west of the Alleghanies.[3]

But in 1779, Virginia, recognizing the fact probably that her jurisdiction "upon the western waters" must sooner or later come to an end, and her necessi-1779. ties also doubtless requiring the revenue which might be made available, enacted a law which, being the basis of so many of the land titles of Washington County, is of sufficient importance to demand a clear account of it, buried as it is from the sight of all but antiquarians.

Chapter XII. of the acts of the General Assembly of Virginia, in the session of May, 1779,[4] was "An act for adjusting and settling the titles of claimants to unpatented lands under the present and former governments previous to the establishment of the Commonwealth's Land Office.

"Section IV. And whereas, great numbers of people have settled in the country upon the western waters,[5] upon waste and unappropriated lands, for which they have been hitherto prevented from suing out patents or obtaining legal titles by the King of Great Britain's proclamations or instructions to his governors,[6] or by the late change of Government,[7] and the present war having delayed until now the opening of a land office and the establishment of any certain terms for granting lands, and it is just that those settling under such circumstances should have some reasonable allowance for the charge and risk they have incurred, and that the property so acquired should be secured to them, Be it enacted, etc., That all persons who at any time before the first day of January, in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, have really and bona fide settled themselves or their families, or at his, her, or their charge have settled others, upon any waste or unappropriated lands on the said western waters, to which no other person hath any legal right or claim, shall be allowed for every family so settled four hundred acres of land or such smaller quantity as the party chooses, to include such settlement. And where any such settler hath had any survey made for him or her since October 26, 1763, in consideration of such settlement for less than four hundred acres, such settler, his or her heirs, may claim and be allowed as much adjoining waste and unappropriated land as together with the lands so surveyed will make up the quantity of four hundred acres."

Section V. made special provisions for such as had settled in towns and villages, and then provided that upon the production of certificates from the commissioners to be appointed under the act to the county surveyors, the latter was required to enter them in his books, and to proceed to survey the land so entered according to law, "and upon due return to the Land Office of the surveys, with the certificates from the commissioners," patents from the commonwealth were to issue.

"And if any such settlers shall desire to take up a greater quantity of land than is herein allowed them, they shall on payment to the Treasurer of the consideration money, required from other purchasers, be entitled to the pre-emption of any greater quantity of land adjoining to that allowed them in consideration of settlement, not exceeding one thousand acres, and to which no other person hath any legal right or claim.

"And to prevent doubts concerning settlements, it is hereby declared, That no family shall be entitled to the allowance granted to settlers by this act, unless they have made a crop of corn in that country, or resided there at least one year since the time of that settlement.

"All persons who, since the said first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, have actually settled on any waste or unappropriated lands on the western waters to which no other hath a just or legal right or claim, shall be entitled to the pre-emption of any quantity of land, not exceeding four hundred acres, to include such settlements, at the State price to other purchasers.

"And all those who, before the said first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, had marked out or chosen for themselves any waste or unappropriated lands, and built any house or hut, or made other improvements thereon, shall also be entitled to the pre-emption upon the like terms, not exceeding one thousand acres, and to which no other person hath any legal right or claim; but no person shall have the right of pre-emption for more than one such improvement."

By Section VI. the composition money, which seems to mean the "State price," was fixed at ten shillings for every one hundred acres.

Section VIII. allotted the country on the western waters into districts: Monongalia, Yohogania, and Ohio Counties into one; Augusta, Botetourt, and

[1] X. Col. Records, 234.

[2] Thomas Lewis was the county surveyor for Augusta County, Virginia. During the year 1774, Crawford surveyed and returned to his office 4153 acres for different persons. He surveyed Washington's Mount Pleasant lands, 2813 acres, in April or May, 1774. On May 8, 1774, he writes to Washington, "Sir,—Inclosed you have the drafts of the Round Bottom and your Chartiers land, finished agreeable to Mr. Lewis' direction."—Washington-Crawford Letters, 46. These lands were patented to Washington by Lord Dunmore on July 5, 1774. Dorsey Pentecost was running lines in the neighborhood of the Henry Taylor tract as early as 1772, and surveyed for George Croghan on the Chartiers to the extent of 30,000 acres in 1773.—Washington-Crawford Letters, 38.

[3] For the reason that after the final running of the boundary line the holders of Virginia titles and rights protected themselves generally by obtaining surveys and patents from Pennsylvania, our records do not show in but few cases what lands were held originally from Virginia. The Washington tract in Mount Pleasant and Cecil and the Hugh Stephenson tract in Cross Creek are two instances in which the lands never were patented by Pennsylvania.

[5] Of course this meant down in the present Kentucky and Tennessee, as well as upon the Monongahela.

Greenbriar into another; Washington and Montgomery into another; and Kentucky into another, and the last.

The Governor with the advice of his Council was to appoint four commissioners for each district, any three of whom might act, to settle and adjust claims to unpatented lands, and provisions were made for the oath of the commissioners, the method of hearing, the registry to be kept, etc.

At the same session (May, 1779) was enacted the law establishing the Land Office.

Section 3 of Chapter XIII.[1] made the following provisions respecting the office of county surveyor:

"A surveyor shall be appointed in every county, to be nominated, examined, and certified able by the president and professors of William and Mary College, and of good character, commissioned by the Governor, with a reservation in such commission to the said professors, for the use of the college, of one-sixth part of the legal fees which shall be received by such surveyor, for the yearly payment of which he shall give bond," etc.

The foregoing is believed to contain a full account of the land laws of Virginia, upon which are founded so many of the titles in the Monongahela valley. The commissioners to settle and adjust the claims of settlers in the district of Monongalia, Yohogania, and Ohio Counties were Francis Peyton, Philip Pendleton, Joseph Holmes, and George Merriweather, the latter of whom, however, did not attend when their duties were performed. But before an account is given of the transactions of these land-title commissioners, their certificates to settlers, and the surveys following, made within the limits of our county under these Virginia laws, it is proper for sake of clearness first to narrate the history of the final determination of the boundary line, for, as will appear, even the settlement of the contention as to the locality of that line was not an end by any means to the exercise of jurisdiction by Virginia within our county.

The Baltimore Agreement as to the Boundary Line.—Early in the year 1776, and before the May session of the Virginia Assembly of that year, both States seem to have become anxious for an end to the boundary contention. Hitherto there seemed to have been no opportunity to meet with a chance of 1776. settlement. On Dec. 18, 1776, both houses of the Virginia Assembly agreed upon the following resolution:[2]

"Resolved, That it is the mutual interest of the commonwealth of Virginia and Pennsylvania, that the boundaries between them be speedily settled and ascertained, in the most amicable and indisputable manner, by the joint agreement and concurrence of both. . . .

"Resolved, That as the boundaries expressed in the Pennsylvania charter may admit of great doubt, and a variety of opinion may arise on its construction, and it is expedient and wise to remove as much as possible all cause of future controversy, (. . .) to quiet the minds of the people that may be affected thereby, and to take from our common enemies an opportunity of fomenting mutual distrust and jealousy, this commonwealth ought to offer such reasonable terms of accommodation, (even if the loss of some territory is incurred thereby,) as may be cordially accepted by our sister state, and an end put to all future dispute, by a firm and permanent agreement and settlement.

"Resolved, Therefore, That the Virginia Delegates in Congress be empowered and instructed to propose to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania a final accommodation of our disputed boundaries in the following manner:

"That the meridian line drawn from the head fountain of the Potowmack River, shall be extended from the intersection of the line run between the proprietors of Maryland and Pennsylvania, (commonly called Mason and Dixon's Line,) due north until it intersects the latitude of forty degrees, and from thence the southern boundary of Pennsylvania shall be extended on the said fortieth degree of latitude until the distance of five degrees of west longitude from Delaware River shall be completed thereon, the same to be ascertained by proper astronomical observations; that from the completion of the said five degrees of longitude, upon said fortieth degree of latitude, the western boundary of Pennsylvania shall be fixed at five degrees of longitude from its eastern boundary, either in every point thereof, according to the meanders of the Delaware River, or, (which is judged easier and better for both,) from proper points and angles on the said Delaware River, with intermediate straight lines between; and whenever said western boundary shall be run, that the degrees of longitude be also fixed by astronomical observations, at proper points and angles on said Delaware River; and from these, that there be straight lines run corresponding as near as may be with the before-mentioned straight or reduced courses of the said river; for which purpose, if the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania shall accept this offer, and whenever they shall have signified their agreement to the boundary herein proposed, the Governor and Council are empowered and desired to appoint commissioners to proceed with a proper mathematical apparatus, and in conjunction with commissioners to be appointed on the part of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to ascertain and run the said Southern or Southern and Western boundary, until the same shall strike the Ohio or Allegheny River, which it is apprehended is as far as it can yet be extended with safety on account of the Indians, saving their private property and rights to all persons who may have acquired titles, under either country respectively, previous to the ascertaining and running such boundary, although they should be found to fall within the other."

Pennsylvania was to assent to this proposed boundary, cutting as it would have done a large corner out of her parallelogram,—almost all of Fayette County, all of Greene County, and quite a portion of Washington County,—when commissioners were to be appointed to run and mark the line. Of course the sister State could not cordially accept the offer, but it appears that during the year 1777 and 1778, at long intervals, negotiations were made through the Virginia delegates in Congress, with such little interest, however, that the papers would become lost![3]

On May 20, 1779, while Virginia was passing her statute relating to lands on the Western waters, her Assembly also resolved "that the Governor be desired to inform the commissioners appointed on the part of Pennsylvania[4] to adjust the boundary between that and this State, that this Assembly will proceed to nominate commissioners for the same purpose, to signify that the place appointed by them is agreeable, but to desire that such meeting may be postponed until the Assembly shall have risen, of which notice will be given them."[5] The commissioners on the part of Pennsylvania were George Bryan, John Ewing, and David Rittenhouse; those on the part of Virginia

OUTLINE MAP
ILLUSTRATING THE BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY BETWEEN PENNSYLVANIA AND VIRGINIA.

were Rev. James Madison, Rev. Robert Andrews, and Thomas Lewis. They met at Baltimore on Aug. 27, 1779. Thomas Lewis, one of the Virginia commissioners, the former county surveyor of Augusta County, did not attend. At their first meeting they produced their respective commissions, when it was determined that their proceedings were to be reported to the Assemblies of their respective States for approval, and that their communications should be in writing. This correspondence, as stated by Mr. Veech in a manuscript correction to his "Mason and Dixon's Line," "was an instructive lesson in diplomatic casuistry. After very stately displays of their respective pretensions, making them as irreconcilable as they could, they advance with rapid strides towards the agreement." Omitting the discussions (confined to the construction of the Pennsylvania charter), a presentation of the propositions from the one side and the other will here be presented.[1]

On the 28th day of August, the Pennsylvania commissioners submitted their position and proposals. After a full and exhaustive discussion of the terms of the charter bearing upon the boundary, and of the right of Pennsylvania to go down west of the Maryland line to parallel thirty-nine degrees, thence west to the limit of five degrees of longitude; but without referring to the western boundary at all, they conclude,—

"Yet, gentlemen, although we have no doubt of the justice and propriety of our claim, as above laid down, but, on the contrary, a full confidence that disinterested judges would allow us the whole of that tract of country which is so expressly contained in the charter, and so fully ceded by the State of Virginia; yet, inasmuch as it might disturb the settlers on the south side of the River Potomack, who have been long accustomed to the laws and government of Virginia; for the sake of peace, and to manifest our earnest desire of adjusting the disputes on amicable terms, we are willing to recede from our just rights, and therefore propose that a meridian be drawn from the head spring of the north branch of the Potomack to the beginning of the fortieth degree of north latitude, and from thence that a parallel of latitude be drawn to the western extremity of the State of Pennsylvania, to continue forever the boundary of the State of Pennsylvania and Virginia."

The communication of the Virginia commissioners, on August 30th, was an argumentative reply to the discussion of the other side, and concluded,—

"Anxious as we are to put an end to the dispute subsisting between the two States, and to remove all grounds of future dissensions by adjusting at this time their boundaries in an amicable manner; yet the undoubted right of Virginia to that tract of country westward of Maryland, and as far northward as the latitude of that point on the Delaware, twelve miles distant from New-Castle northward, together with a regard for the peace of those who have settled in this tract, on the supposition that it was comprehended in the government of Virginia, determine us not to accede to the proposal you have been pleased to make. But, we trust on a further consideration of the objections of Virginia to your claim, that you will think it advantageous to your State to continue Mason and Dixon's line to your western limits, which we are willing to establish as a perpetual boundary between Virginia and Pennsylvania on the south side of the last-mentioned State. We are induced to make this proposal, as we think that the same principle which effected the compromise between Pennsylvania and Maryland should operate equally as strong in the present case."

It is admissible to infer, from the absence of any reference in both these proposals to the nature of the western boundary to be adopted, that both States seemed to assume that that line was to be a line corresponding with the sinuosities of the Delaware. True, it is possible that each party left that matter in the background for a point from which compromise suggestions might originate. At all events, the Pennsylvania commissioners, in their communication made the same day, were not slow to see an opportunity opened; they proceeded to state that they should be under the disagreeable necessity of returning to their constituents with a report of the proposals made for the sake of peace, "unless you can comply with an addition to your proposal which we now make for your consideration," viz.:

"That Mason and Dixon's line should be extended so far beyond the limits of Pennsylvania as that the meridian drawn from the western extremity of it to the beginning of the forty-third degree of north latitude, shall include as much land as will make the State of Pennsylvania what it was originally intended to be, viz.: three degrees in breadth and five degrees in length, excepting so much as has heretofore relinquished to Maryland. . . . And finally, if this proposal be not complied with, it is our intention that it shall not be adduced to prejudice the claim of Pennsylvania hereafter."

Still the point was not yet reached. It was not far away, however. In her answer on the same day, Virginia could not accede to the idea of compensation when she had nothing for which she should pay, and still contemplating the great necessity "that every cause of discord be now removed," on the same day made another advance:

"We therefore propose that a line run due west from that point where the meridian of the first fountain of the north branch of the Potowmack meets the end of the thirtieth minute of the thirty-ninth degree of northern latitude, five degrees of longitude, to be computed from that part of the River Delaware which lies in the same parallel, shall forever be the boundary of Virginia and Pennsylvania, on the southern part of the last-mentioned State. We hope that this proposal will finally meet with your approbation, as it coincides most nearly with the claim of each State."

To this the Pennsylvania commissioners, on Aug. 31, 1779, replied,—

"We will agree to your proposal of the 30th of August, 1779, for running and forever establishing the southern boundary of Pennsylvania in the latitude of thirty-nine degrees thirty minutes, westward of the meridian of the source of the north branch of the river Potowmack, upon condition that you consent to allow a meridian line drawn northward from the western extremity thereof as far as Virginia extends, to be the western boundary of Pennsylvania."

To which the Virginia commissionsrs responded at once,—

"We cannot agree to make that addition to our proposal, . . . but . . . we will make a further proposal, which we think as advantageous to Pennsylvania as that first made by you to us. We will continue Mason and Dixon's line due west five degrees of longitude to be computed from the river Delaware, for your southern boundary, and will agree that a meridian drawn from the western extremity of this line to your northern limit shall be the western boundary of Pennsylvania."

Thereupon the Pennsylvania commissioners closed the negotiations:

"We agree to your last proposal of August 31st, 1779, to extend Mason's and Dixon's line due west five degrees of longitude, to be computed from the river Delaware, for the southern boundary of Pennsylvania, and that a meridian drawn from the western extremity thereof to the northern limit of the State be the western boundary of Pennsylvania forever."

[1] For the full record, see 10 Hening, 519.

And thus followed the final agreement of the commissioners of the two States for the establishment of the southern and western boundaries of Pennsylvania. It was in these words:

"BALTIMORE, 31st August, 1779.

"We, James Madison and Robert Andrews, commissioners for the State of Virginia, and George Bryan, John Ewing, and David Rittenhouse, commissioners for the State of Pennsylvania, do hereby mutually, in behalf of our respective States, ratify and confirm the following agreement, viz.: to extend Mason's and Dixon's line due west five degrees of longitude, to be computed from the river Delaware, for the southern boundary of Pennsylvania, and that a meridian drawn from the western extremity thereof to the northern limit of the said State be the western boundary of Pennsylvania forever.

"In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands this thirty-first day of August in the year of our Lord 1779.

"JAMES MADISON, "GEORGE BRYAN,
"ROBERT ANDREWS, "JOHN EWING,
"DAVID RITTENHOUSE."[1]

Even with this agreement, however, the boundary controversy was not yet determined, for, as it will be remembered, the result of the Baltimore commission was to be submitted to the constituent States. Pennsylvania was the first to act, and

"On Friday, November 19, 1779, agreeable to the order of the day, the House took up the report of the commissioners appointed to settle the boundary line between this State and Virginia, and the same being read and fully considered,

"Resolved, unanimously, That this House do ratify and finally confirm the agreement entered into between the commissioners from the State of Virginia and the commissioners from this State, which agreement is in the following words: [quoting the agreement as printed above.]

"Attested,

"THOMAS PAINE,

"Clerk of the General Assembly."[2]

Thus did Pennsylvania manifest her readiness to accept the action of the Baltimore commission and give "it her unqualified approval, as well she might do," says Mr. Veech,[3] "seeing that it expanded her western limits full half a degree, without any equivalent loss on the south." Virginia, however, held back, and whether from a dissatisfaction with the boundaries as established by the commission, or with an intention to benefit her whilom adherents in the Monongahela valley, her Assembly had no action upon the subject until the following summer. And what occurred in the mean time?

Virginia Surveys in Washington County.—It will be remembered that the General Assembly of Virginia in May, 1779, after the negotiations for the appointment of the Baltimore commissioners had been begun, had passed her act "for adjusting and settling titles of claimants to unpatented lands" upon the western waters, creating districts, with four commissioners to each, to hear proofs of settlement rights and grant certificates to claimants, and that the commissioners appointed for Yohogania, Monongalia, and Ohio Counties were Francis Peyton, Philip Pendleton, Joseph Holmes, and George Merriweather. All this before the Baltimore conference.

These land-title commissioners came to "the western waters" in the Monongahela valley in December, 1779, and in that and the following months sat at Redstone and at Cox's Fort,[4] on the Monongahela, and granted scores of certificates to claimants under Virginia settlement rights.

Col. William Crawford was the county surveyor for Yohogania County. His "Record Book of Surveys" for that county is still extant, and contains numerous surveys made by him, through his deputies, within the present limits of Washington County, upon certificates granted by the said commissioners sitting either at Redstone or Cox's Fort. These surveys are all plotted out, and properly and neatly recorded, and in order to illustrate to the sense of sight this exercise of power by Virginia over lands then known not to be hers, or which at least she was about to abandon, the accompanying map has been made by an able artist simply by connecting a number of contiguous surveys together.

The greatest number made in any one locality was upon the waters of Pigeon Creek. And that the reader may know the extent to which this land jurisdiction was exercised, a list is given, 1780. compiled of the surveys from Col. Crawford's record, made upon lands in the present limits of Washington County. The list will be introduced by a transcript of a survey made of a tract then occupied in whole or in part by Henry Taylor within sight of Washington.[5]

[1] Hon. George Bryan was a Philadelphia delegate of the Convention of 1776, and is said to have been the author of the Constitution of that date; in 1777, vice-president and afterwards president of the Supreme Executive Council; 1780, assistant judge of the Supreme Court; 1783 member of Council of Censors from Philadelphia; the author of the celebrated preamble to the Pennsylvania act of 1780 for the abolition of slavery. He was born in Dublin, Ireland, 1731; died at Philadelphia in 1791.

John Ewing, D.D., born East Nottingham, Md., 1732; died 1802; ancestors from Ireland; tutor in philosophy in Philadelphia College, and became provost of that institution when made the University of Pennsylvania in 1779; had been commissioner on boundary between Pennsylvania and Maryland in 1760; was also pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia.

David Rittenhouse, LL.D., born near Germantown, Pa., 1732; ancestors from Holland; was eminent as a mathematician and astronomer; was engaged upon the boundaries of New York, New Jersey, as well as of Virginia; state treasurer from 1776 to 1789; first director of the U. S. Mint; died at Philadelphia, June 26, 1796.

Right Rev. James Madison, relative of President Madison, at this time president of William and Mary College, Va., afterwards bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Virginia.

Rev. Robert Andrews, was professor of mathematics in William and Mary College, a Protestant Episcopal minister.

[4] Redstone was Brownsville. There has been some doubt as to the locality of Cox's Fort. Mr. Veech calls it "Coxe's Fort, on the west side of the Monongahela." Some of the certificates are dated at Coxe's Fort, others at Cox's Fort, evidently meaning the same place. There was a Cox's Fort just above Wellsburgh, on land about 1785 bought by Van Swearingen, but the locality called by this name in the text is believed to be the station or fort of Capt. Gabriel Cox, in the now Union township.

[5] In an ejectment brought by Judge Taylor in 1782, his title was sustained over that of Richard Yeates, or his assignees, because of a prior settlement. At the date of these Virginia surveys our territory was

Pennsylvania Indignant.—As might have been expected, this exercise of sovereignty created a storm of indignation. "No event in the whole controversy so roused" the people of Pennsylvania. On Nov. 29, 1779, Thomas Scott[9] (still living on Dunlap's Creek, in now Fayette County, and therefore near where the land commissioners held their sessions) wrote to the Supreme Executive Council, of which he was then a [6] Seven months after Washington County was erected!

[7] At this date of the first board of Washington County commissioners!

[8] The first of these surveys to William Askey recites a certificate dated at Cox's Fort, Nov. 20, 1779 (the very day after Pennsylvania had confirmed the report of the Baltimore commission), "That William Askey, assignee of Richard Willis, is entitled to 763 acres of land in Yohogania County, adjoining his settlements made in 1771, lying on the western branches of Robinson's run," part of a pre-emption warrant for 1000 acres.

These are all the Yohogania County surveys in this book (embracing a period from 1780 to 1785, inclusive) which can with any certainty be placed in the present limits of Washington County, including for obvious reasons one probably in Allegheny County north of the Monongahela River. After the early part of June, 1782, when Col. Crawford was burned at the stake by the Sandusky Indians, Benjamin Johnston succeeded him as county surveyor, at first pro tempore, then by commission. The latter lived then on one of the Dorsey Pentecost tracts, in now North Strabane township.

The deputy surveyors during this period were John Brock, G. Green, Thomas Bond, B. Johnston, Daniel Leet John Wells, William Sinclair, William Lowrey, Isaac Greathouse. It should be remembered that this list does not embrace all the Virginia titles in our county, only those made at this period and in that part of Washington County which lay in the old Yohogania County.

member, "respecting the State of Virginia empowering commissioners to sell lands within the bounds of this State, particularly in the county of Westmoreland." This letter is not found, but on its receipt Joseph Reed, the president of the Council, transmitted it to our delegates in Congress[1] with some vigorous preliminary remarks, and "We have therefore thought it our duty to lay this matter before you as the Representatives of Pennsylvania in the great Assembly of America, convened for the purposes of general Union and common Defence, that you might take their Sense thereupon, and that we may avail ourselves of their Judgment and Influence, if they conceive the common Interest of America injured thereby. At the same time we shall make such a Remonstrance to the State of Virginia as the Interest and Honour of this State require; if these should be ineffectual we trust we shall stand justified in the eyes of God and Man, if availing ourselves of the Means we possess, we afford that support and Aid to the much injured and distressed Inhabitants of the frontear Counties which their Situation and our Duty requires."

After receiving the resolution of Congress passed Dec. 27, 1779, recommending to the contending parties not to grant any part of the disputed land, or to disturb the possession of any persons living thereon, and to avoid every appearance of force until the dispute could be amicably settled,[2] the president of the Supreme Executive Council on the next day, December 28th, issued a proclamation,[3] which, after reciting at length the appointment, proceedings, and agreement of the Baltimore commissioners, that that agreement had been at once ratified by the Pennsylvania Assembly, and the ratification duly transmitted to Virginia, that nevertheless the officials of that government had proceeded to Fort Burd (Redstone), and were proceeding to exercise a summary and arbitrary jurisdiction, tending to dispossess the grantees under Pennsylvania, etc., and quoting also the resolution of Congress, closed by requiring of all officers, civil and military, and others, subjects of Pennsylvania, to pay due obedience and respect to the resolution of Congress, and encouraging the several grantees claiming under Pennsylvania to continue in the cultivation and improvement of their several estates, as well as in their allegiance and fidelity, notwithstanding any claims or pretences set up by the State of Virginia. Fifty copies of this proclamation were transmitted to Mr. Scott, with a letter from the President dated Dec. 29, 1779:[4]

"You will see from its import (the Proclamation) that we thought it best to avoid all irritating Measures, and express our Confidence in the Justice and Honour of Virginia to rectify the Measures complained of. . . . We have sent you an attested Copy of the Resolution of Congress, that you may communicate it to the Commissioners if they are yet with you, and we would desire you to do it in form, demanding of them whether they will yield Obedience thereto, and transmitting to us their Answer so Authenticated that, if necessary, we may lay the same before Congress. We shall also remonstrate with the Government of Virginia, etc."

Mr. Scott performed the duties required of him, and on the 20th January, 1780, received the following reply from the Virginia land commissioners still with them on the Monongahela:[5]

"MR. SCOTT:

"Sir,—In answer to your application of yesterday we beg you would inform his Excellency the President of Pennsylvania, that we shall ever pay the greatest respect to a recommendation of Congress, as well as to an application from the executive power of Pennsylvania, consistent with our duty as servants of the State of Virginia.

"We do not conceive an immediate application to us (on the resolution of Congress) consistent with the rules of propriety; we rather think such an application ought to be made to the Governor of Virginia, under whose commission we act. Until that is done and we receive directions to the contrary we think ourselves obliged to continue to act under our commission.

"COX'S FORT [Union tp.],
"January 21st, 1780."

On March 24, 1780, the Supreme Executive Council and the General Assembly[6] submitted a joint address to our delegates in Congress, containing a forcible presentation of the state of affairs in the Western frontiers: "And we now find ourselves reduced to the sad alternative of seeing a number of honest, industrious settlers, who have peaceably purchased, cultivated, and enjoyed their lands for many years, under Titles of this State, now dispossessed and ruined, or enter into a contest which to us is dreadful in contemplation." The address is of great length, and concluded:

"But if Pennsylvania must arm for her internal defence instead of recruiting her Continental Line, if her attention and supplies must be diverted in like manner, if the common enemy encouraged by our division should prolong the War, interests of our sister States and the common cause be injured or distressed, we trust we shall stand acquitted before them and the whole World; and if the effusion of Human blood is to be the result of this unhappy dispute, We humbly trust that the great Governor of the Universe, who delights in Peace, equity, and Justice, will not impute it to us. Confiding in his protection and the justness of our cause, we shall endeavor to defend and preserve the Citizens of this State from further violence, and if necessary repel force with force, with what success we presume not to say. It is sufficient for us that opposition, Tyranny, and injustice are the same from whatever hands they proceed, and that no change or situation can be more disgraceful or distressing."

Pennsylvania for the first time in the boundary controversy was now thoroughly ready for a fight. The peace policy was ready to be abandoned. Men are always prepared for an emergency when they are willing to leave the results with Providence. But of what effect were these belligerent declarations upon Virginia? Her General Assembly met in May, 1780. Chapter IX.[7] of the acts of that session was an act granting further time to obtain warrants upon certificates for pre-emption rights, etc. Of this chapter, Section IV. provided that the further time of eighteen months be given to all persons who may obtain certificates from the commissioners to enter the same,

"Provided that the Court of Commissioners for the district of the counties of Monongalia, Yohogania, and Ohio do not use or exercise any jurisdiction respecting claims to lands within the territory in dispute between the States of Virginia and Pennsylvania, north of Mason and Dixon's line, until such dispute shall be finally adjusted and settled."

Look back now at the list of surveys on a previous page.

The Virginia commissioners may not have granted any certificates to settlers after the passage of this act, in May or June, 1780, but her surveyors and deputy surveyors continued right along to receive entries, make official surveys, and to return the same, of lands within the present limits of Washington County, indeed until as late as June 3, 1782, more than a year after Washington County was erected.[1]

But Virginia was possibly somewhat under the influence of a general sentiment adverse to her policy, and her conduct began to be shaped accordingly. Col. John Proctor, one of the agents for forfeited estates for Westmoreland County, perhaps saw some change for the better when he wrote his letter to President Reed, dated June 1, 1780:[2]

"I havue the Pleashor to inform you that we havue had parfect Quietness from Virginia, the havue laid several new Plans for new Disputs but the People being so often Desaved by them will not fall in with them, and the seem know at their wits end. I have maid several new frends to pennsylvania by telling the People in the Desputed Part that the Comisioners only want'd to fill there own Pockets with money whitch is tackin from the Poor unjustly, and that Pennsylvania will not pay aney regard to aney thing Don by them."

Final Ratification of Boundary Agreement.—But the end of the contest approaches. On June 23, 1780, the Lower House of the Virginia Assembly passed a resolution confirming the Baltimore agreement, with a very important condition attached, to be complied with on the part of Pennsylvania. It was finally passed as amended by the Senate on July 1st, and transmitted at once to Philadelphia. This resolution[3] controverted the reasoning of the Pennsylvania commissioners at Baltimore, disavowed the binding agency of the Virginia commissioners in the execution of the agreement, yet asseverating the wish of that State to prevent future dispute and animosity, and to prove the sincerity of her professions and desire to cultivate and maintain the most cordial harmony with the sister State of Pennsylvania, expressed the willingness of Virginia to ratify the agreement "on the Conditions expressed in the following resolve, corresponding with the reservation in their offer of December 18, 1776:"

"Resolved, therefore, That the agreement made on the 31st day of August 1779, between &c. [naming the commissioners], be ratified and finally confirmed to wit: [quoting the agreement] On Condition that the private property and rights of all persons acquired under, founded on, or recognized by the laws of either Country previous to the date hereof, be saved and confirmed to them, altho' they should be found to fall within the other, and that in the decision of disputes thereupon preference shall be given to the elder or prior right whichever of the said states the same shall have been acquired under, such persons paying to that state within whose boundary their lands shall be included the same purchase or consideration money which would have been due from them to the state under which they claimed the right; and where any such purchase or consideration money hath, since the declaration of American Independence, been received by either state for lands which according to the before recited agreement shall fall within the territory of the other, the same shall be reciprocally refunded and repaid, and that the inhabitants of the disputed territory, now ceded to the state of Pennsylvania, shall not before the first day of December, in the present year, be subject to the payment of any tax, nor at any time to the payment of arrears of taxes or impositions heretofore laid by either state.

"Resolved, That upon the acceptance and full ratification of this condition and agreement on the part of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, the Governor be empowered with the advice of the Council to appoint two Commissioners on behalf of this Commonwealth in conjunction with Commissioners to be appointed by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to extend the line commonly called Mason and Dixon's line five degrees of longitude from Delaware River, as aforesaid, and from the western termination thereof to run and mark a meridian line to the Ohio River, which is as far as the General Assembly conceive the same can at present be extended and marked without danger of umbrage to the Indians;[4] giving the said Commissioners, on the part of Virginia, such instructions therein as the advice of the Council shall judge proper."

Pennsylvania was prepared, for the sake of an end to the controversy, to yield even to these humiliating conditions, clearly disclosing the want of good faith on the part of Virginia, especially in view of the certificates and surveys by the Virginia officials even then continuing within our borders. The General Assembly of Pennsylvania met on the 7th of September; the same day the message of the president of the Council laid before that body the foregoing resolution of the General Assembly of Virginia, stating,[5] "The prospect of an amicable termination of this unhappy controversy cannot but be acceptable to every good man and faithful citizen, and we have no doubt this overture will be improved into a full and final accommodation, consistent with the rights of individuals and the honor of the State." On Saturday, Sept. 23, 1780,[6]

"The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee upon the Determination of the General Assembly of Virginia respecting the disputed Boundary, and having maturely considered the same, it was unanimously agreed to as follows, viz.:

"Resolved, That although the conditions annexed, by the Legislature of Virginia, to the ratification of the boundary line agreed to by the Commissioners of Pennsylvania and Virginia on the 31st day of August, 1779, may tend to countenance some unwarrantable claims which may be made under the State of Virginia, in consequences of pretended purchases or settlements pending the controversy, yet this state, determining to give the World the most unequivocal proof of their earnest desire to promote peace and harmony with a Sister State, so necessary during this great contest against the Common Enemy, do agree to the conditions proposed by the State of Virginia, in their Resolves of the 23d of June last, to wit: [Here is copied verbatim the first resolution of the Virginia Assembly, including the conditions set out.] And we do hereby accept and fully ratify the said recited conditions, and the Boundary Line formed thereupon."

Following the foregoing was a resolution almost word for word with the second of the Virginia resolutions, authorizing the appointment of commissioners, to act in conjunction with those to be appointed by Virginia, to extend Mason and Dixon's line, and to run and mark the meridian from the western termination thereof.[7]

[7] It is not understood why the Legislature passed the act of April 1, 1784: "An Act confirming an agreement entered into between this State and the State of Virginia."—2 Smith's Laws, p. 261.

At last, so far as the legislative power of the two commonwealths was concerned, the contention was at an end. Henceforward the matter was with the respective executive departments. Nothing remained to be done but the running and marking of the line of separation of the two jurisdictions.

How Virginia had clung to the valley of the Monongahela! Her surveyors were still running their lines around "settlements" made by her adherents, by virtue of certificates issued by her commissioners' courts at Redstone and Cox's Fort. But her Yohogania County Court, holding its sessions for the administration of justice under her laws, only closed its records on Aug. 28, 1780, but a month before the passage of the Pennsylvania resolution accepting the terms of settlement imposed by Virginia. Then was the power of Virginia withdrawn.

The exercise of an active jurisdiction on the part of Pennsylvania over lands lying west of the Monongahela River, and soon to be erected into a new county, had been superseded probably since 1774, at least to a very great extent. The Virginia jurisdiction having been withdrawn, the condition of that territory, fully settled by this time, is doubtless well described by the lamentation of Col. Joseph Beelor, of old the provincial county commissioner of Westmoreland County, and later an adherent of the Virginia usurpation. His letter to Col. Daniel Brodhead, then commanding at Pittsburgh, and calling upon the surrounding counties for men and horses, may properly be entitled as "Beelor's Lament."[1]

"Oct. 10, 1780.

"Dear Sir,—I received yours of the 7th inst. this morning,[2] but it is not in my power to give you a just return as you request until the last of this week, for I have been obliged to issue orders to press horses & draught men, as I could not get Volunteers enough, of which I have not got a return yet. I am sorry to inform you that I am afraid we shall come but little speed; I find that the Government of Virginia will not protect me in any thing I do by vertue of the laws of Virg[a], since their last Resolution, & the laws of Pensyl[a] have not as yet taken us under their protection; all this the Country is acquainted with, so that every thing I do is at the Risque of my Fortune unless protected by the States. If it had not been to forward an expedition I should have declinèd acting a good while ago, as no man ever had a more disagreeable time of it than I have at present, having no law to defend me. We are assured of your good intentions for the safety of the Countrey, & are very sorry that we cannot act with that spirit that we ought to do. But hope the laws of Pen[a] will either be extended in a few Days from this time, or the Laws of Virg[a] be kept in force. It is very unhappy for this Countrey that the two contending States has not provided a better way for the defence of this Countrey that to Let it fall between them both until matters are settled between them.

"I have the honour to be with the greatest

VI.

The Running and Marking of the Boundary Line—A Temporary Line Run—The Permanent Line Run and Marked.

The Running and Marking of the Boundary Line.—From this time (the date of Col. Beelor's lament) onward, with the exception of complaints made of delays on the part of the Virginia officials appointed to aid in running and marking of the line, the boundary controversy was at an end as between the States, and confined thereafter to factions, so long separated that a union seemed impossible. By the final action of Pennsylvania on Sept. 23, 1780, accepting the ratification of the Baltimore agreement with the conditions attached by Virginia, where the boundary should be was no longer a question: it only remained now to run and mark it. 1780.

But delays, vexatious and long continued, were to intervene. Thomas Scott wrote to President Reed, Jan. 24, 1781,[3] "I have been big with expectation of the line between us and Virginia being shortly run, and that dispute finally settled, but begin to think I shall be disappointed." On Feb. 25, 1781, Col. Daniel Brodhead, commanding at Fort Pitt, added to a letter a "P. S.—I hope no time will be lost in determining the Boundary Line, for until then the Inhabitants will be in confusion, and I cannot call them out in case of Invasion."[4] But on the 21st of February a step had been taken by the Supreme Executive Council in the appointment of John Lukens and Archibald McClean, of York County, as commissioners on the part of Pennsylvania to run and mark the line, proposing to Virginia the 10th of the next May as the time, and providing that in case of the death, sickness, or inability of either, Alexander McLean, Esq., of Westmoreland County, be substituted.[5] Then on March 20, 1781, President Reed wrote to Thomas Scott,[6] informing him of these steps and also of another important matter, the immediate prospect of the erec- 1781.

tion of a new county. On the 17th of April, 1781, Thomas Jefferson, then the Governor of Virginia, addressed the following to President Reed:[1]

"Sir,—I have been honored with your Excellency's Letter, proposing the actual extension of our mutual Boundary. . . . No mode of determining the extent of the five degrees of Longitude from Delaware River, in the Latitude of Mason's and Dixon's Line having been pointed out by your Excellency, I shall venture to propose that this be determined by Astronomical Observations, to be made at or near the two extremities of the Line, as being, in our opinion, the most certain & unexceptionable mode of determining that Point, which being fixed, every Thing will be easy.

"Should this mode be approved by your Excellency, we have appointed the Rev. James Madison, as a commissioner on our part to execute the work in the Western Quarter, and the Rev. Robert Andrews to perform the office at the Eastern end, in conjunction with the Gentlemen whom you have been pleased to appoint or any others on your part. . . . We will send to the Westward the most necessary Instruments, which we suppose to be a good Time Piece, Telescopes, and a Quadrant, and hope it will be convenient for you to furnish what may be necessary at the Eastern end.

"Our Commissioners will be at their Respective Stations at any time which your Excellency shall think proper to appoint, allowing it to be a month after I shall have received your Pleasure on that Head. . . ."

The important suggestions contained in this communication must have been favorably received by President Reed, and the time changed from that at first proposed, for on May 22, 1781,[2] Governor Jefferson writes the information that his government has been compelled to remove to Charlottesville by the British invasion, and being at a great distance from Williamsburg, where the commissioners of Virginia resided, it would be impossible to proceed with the running of the line on June 12th, the day last set by President Reed, which made necessary a postponement. The establishment of the permanent boundary was then deferred till May 1, 1782.

A Temporary Line Run.—But on June 3, 1781,[3] Governor Jefferson assented to a proposition previously made, to run a temporary line, extending Mason and Dixon's line due west twenty-three miles, or to the Ohio River, and directed the county surveyor of Monongalia County to join in the work with any one whom President Reed should appoint. Soon after the receipt of this letter the Supreme Executive Council appointed as the Pennsylvania artist Alexander McClean, Esq., then living in that part of Westmoreland County now forming Fayette. This appointment and the cause of the interruption of the prospect of the running of the permanent line is set forth in the letter of President Reed to Col. James Marshel,[4] the lieutenant of Washington County, of date July 23, 1781:[5]

"Sir,—I have received two letters from you, one of the 5th, & the other of the 27th June, which I have laid before the Council. We are sorry to hear of the obstructions which have been thrown in your way by ill designing people who keep up unhappy Contests for sinister purposes. We hope the Time will come when these Machinations will be at an end, as we are resolved as soon as the line is run to exert the Power of legal & coercive Authority over all who shall presume to disturb the publick Tranquility & distress the Country by their mal Practices. It was much our wish to run the Line this Spring, but the State of Virginia being invaded [by the British Army], & the affairs of the Government in great confusion, there has not been the Time or Opp'y for that purpose which was necessary. Besides that, upon inquiry we found the Season was too far advanced for those Astronomical Observations which were necessary to run the line with Exactness. We have therefore postponed the grand Operation to next Spring. But as we know it was highly necessary to have a partition of Territory and Jurisdiction, we proposed to Virginia to run a temporary line, beginning at the End of Mason and Dixon's, and measuring 23 miles,[6] what is by common Computation the five degrees of Longitude called for in the Charter of King Charles the 2d. This has been agreed to, and the State of Virginia has sent Orders to the Surveyor of Yeoghegany County[7] to join with one to be appointed by us to that Service. We have appointed Alexander McClean, Esq., and this Express carries up his Commission & Instructions for this Purpose. Should he have Occasion for a Guard or any other Assistance from you, we make no Doubt he will receive it. As soon as they have run the Line & reported their Proceedings we shall send up Proclamations calling upon all those who shall fall into this State to conform to its Laws and Government, and hope you will soon be relieved from the Anarchy and Confusion which has reigned so long in your Country from this unhappy Dispute. . . ."

Washington County had been erected by an act of the General Assembly passed March 28, 1781. It is not the place here to show what were the "Obstructions" producing the "Anarchy and Confusion" referred to in this letter. They will be given at length hereafter. Suffice it to say that, after the organization of the county, the old antagonisms arising out of the disputed jurisdiction continued indeed for several years. Such terms as "Villanous Banditti" were of frequent use on either side, and letters in the State Archives are full of them. Of one party were Col. James Marshel, Hon. Thomas Scott, the principal leaders of the old Pennsylvania adherents, while of the old Virginia partisans Col. Dorsey Pentecost and Col. John Canon were among the most conspicuous. During the year 1781 the new State project was also revived, resulting in much trouble, and the passage of an act, late in 1782, making the advocacy of the scheme a treason. These difficulties at present must be deferred. Their continuance, however, during the year 1781 and later was the occasion of much anxiety for the final establishment of the boundary line.

It appears that Alexander McClean was one of those drafted by the Virginia military officials to serve in Gen. George Rogers Clarke's expedition against the Indians, which left Western Pennsylvania in the summer of 1781, of which fact Archibald McClean, of York County, informed President Reed in a letter dated on Aug. 13, 1781,[8] so that the border troubles as well as the British invasion of Virginia became responsible for delay. But Mr. McClean's services on that expedition seem to have been dispensed with, for on September 13th he addressed a letter to President Reed,[1] giving as an excuse for his inactivity the delays occasioned by the unreadiness of Mr. Madison, who had been appointed to act with him on the part of Virginia, and on October 19th Thomas Scott wrote to President Reed,[2] "We still groan under the difficulty of an unrun boundary line, now occasioned by Mr. Madison, the Virginia commissioner (partly from design in himself, and partly to gratify a small faction still in the county), declining to join with Mr. McClean in that business, and instead thereof he has posted off a messenger to Virginia with prayers, and thinks (as is said) that it may not be done."[3]

[6] In the latitude of their line Mason and Dixon computed the width of a degree of longitude to be 53 miles $167\frac{1}{10}$ perches, and Penn's five degrees of longitude from the Delaware at 267 miles $195\frac{8}{10}$ perches. To their stopping-place on Dunkard, the distance run, they say, was 244 miles, 113 perches, $7\frac{1}{4}$ feet, leaving, as they computed it, 23 miles 83 perches yet to be run.—Veech.

Preparations had already again been made, however, for the running of the permanent line early the next year, for on October 8th the Supreme Executive Council had appointed Rev. Dr. John Ewing and David Rittenhouse, Esq.,[4] commissioners for that purpose, who were desired at once to proceed to provide the necessary instruments and to have everything in readiness to perform said service; yet by reason of the facts already mentioned the much-desired temporary line had not yet been run, and on December 17th, Hon. William Moore, now the president of the Supreme Executive Council, wrote to Brig.-Gen. William Irvine, in command at Fort Pitt:[5]

"... With respect to the line between this state and Virginia, every measure, on our part, has been taken to have had a temporary line run last summer; but it has failed of being effectual by some omissions of the commissioners appointed on the part of that state; and it seems to be impracticable by the lateness of the season, and perhaps unnecessary, now, to push that measure, as preparations are making for running in the Spring a permanent line, founded on astronomical observations...."

But the winter having passed away, on March 1, 1782, a committee of the General Assembly met with the Supreme Executive Council, and after con-
1782. sideration it was resolved that the completion of the permanent line was unadvisable for the present on account of the great expenses necessarily attending it, but "that a temporary line during the continuance of the present War or till times are more settled on the Frontiers may be made and agreed on at a small expense, which will answer every purpose expected."[6] This resolution being communicated to Governor Harrison, of Virginia, it was assented to,[7] whereupon, on April 6th, Alexander McClean was again commissioned[8] and instructions given him as follows:[9]

"You are hereby instructed to be on the 10th of June at the extremity of Mason and Dixon's line, where you'll meet the Commissioners from Virginia, & then continue the said line 23 miles West, then run a Meridian Line till it strikes the Ohio. Shou'd the Commissioners from Virginia not Attend at the time & place, or refuse to perform with you the running of y^e^ above Lines you'll proceed yourself."

Some differences then followed between Governor Harrison and President Moore as to whether or not the commissioners should begin at the extremity of the boundary between Pennsylvania and Maryland, or at the point on Dunkard Creek where Mason and Dixon had been stopped by their Indian escort in 1767;[10] but the matter being referred to the Virginia Assembly, that body, on June 1, 1782, empowered the commissioners to be appointed by the Governor to begin at the extremity of Mason and Dixon's line, thence extend it twenty-three miles, and then run the meridian to the Ohio.[11] But Alexander McClean did as he was instructed to do, and on June 10, 1782, appeared with his escort at the point designated, prepared for the duty enjoined, with the result, however, shown by his report to President Moore, as follows:[12]

"Colo. Cook's,

"On my way from Pittsburgh, 27 June, 1782.

"Sir,—To my great Mortification I am lead to inform you that after every effort which prudence might dictate, I am again prevented from Running the Line. The Circumstances I presume you will be anxious to know. They are as follows, Viz.: Shortly after my Return from Philadelphia an expedition was formed against Sandusky by the Volunteers of both Counties, which drew off a great Number of the Militia and Arms. The Situation of Washington County was very distressing to appearance. I thought it not prudent to call any part of the Guard from thence, altho' Impowered so to do. The Lieut. of the County of Westmoreland furnished me with a guard of one hundred and upward, but had not Arms sufficient to supply them. About Seventy were armed. We proceeded to the Mouth of Dunkard Creek, where our stores were laid in on the tenth day of June, and were preparing to Cross the River that night when a party of about thirty horsemen Armed appeared on the opposite of the River, Damning us to come over, and threatening us to a great Degree; and several more were seen by our Bullock Guard, which we had sent over the river, one of which asked them if they would Surrender to be taken as prisoners and other Language of menacing; and hearing of a great number more who were on their way to their assistance, We held a Council, the Result of which was to appoint a Committee to confer with them on the Causes of their opposition, the result of said Conference you will see enclosed. This Mob or Banditti of Villains are greatly increased since the supply Bill has been published amongst them. . . . In short the Cry against Taxes in Specie is general and in any Mode by a Number of those who formerly adhered to Virginia, and they think the Running of the Line will be a prelude to and increase the power of Collecting them; Together with the Idea of a New State, which is artfully and industriously conveyed (under Coverture) by some of the Friends of that State as the only Expedient to prevent the Running of the Line. I have also to inform you that I have the most finished assurance that they have not the least Desire to settle the Line in any equitable manner, for the Instructions of their Commissioners (if they have appointed any) will doubtless direct them to begin at the end of Maryland, which is not yet ascertained, neither can it be without the concurrence of that State, which I am fully persuaded was thrown in as a barrier to keep the Evil day the further off.

"... Colo. Hayes, who was present on Committee, was Zealous to proceed against all opposition, but all to no purpose, other than to enrage the Mob still more; they proceeded to dare us to trial of their Resolution and intention. I have just now been with General Irwin, who is well disposed to render every Service in his power, but as a Continental Officer he cannot interfere without instructions for that purpose. In short every measure has been taken that might be thought prudent but to no purpose. Their obstinacy is such that they will never submit until destruction overtakes them.

"I have therefore to request that you will devise some mode that it may be accomplished speedily, as the Enemies of this State are daily

The executive of Pennsylvania having received the Virginia resolution of June 1st, and Mr. McClean's report of June 27th, on July 18, 1782,[2] appointed the "4th day of November next to run the line between the States of Pennsylvania and Virginia, agreeably to said resolution, and that a guard of one hundred militia be ordered to attend the Commissioners while on that duty." Governor Harrison on August 1st appointed Col. Joseph Neville[3] as "the surveyor on the part of this State to extend the boundary Line of the two States, agreeable to the Resolution of our Assembly, and [I] have ordered one hundred Militia from the County of Hampshire to attend them as a Guard."

On the appointed day and in the required manner, with "chill November's surly blasts" soughing among the forests and hills along the southern boundary of Washington County, did Alexander McClean and Joseph Neville with their guard of two hundred militia perform the duty assigned them of running and marking a temporary line, according to the terms agreed upon, on the south and west between Pennsylvania and Virginia. Mr. McClean made report of the proceedings on Feb. 19, 1783, and on March 26th following, John Dickinson, the 1783. then president of the Supreme Executive Council, issued his proclamation,[4] giving notice to all persons within the Pennsylvania jurisdiction, no longer in doubt, "to take notice of the proceedings aforesaid, and to pay due obedience to the laws of this Commonwealth."

The Running of the Permanent Boundary.—The General Assembly of Pennsylvania, on March 22, 1783,[5] had approved the report and confirmed the temporary line as run by Messrs. McClean and Neville, which action was communicated by President Dickinson to Governor Harrison on March 27th, the day after the issuance of the foregoing proclamation. One would have thought that the two contending States, having run and marked a temporary line which all perhaps must have known could not have been far from the true boundary as had been agreed upon, the jurisdictional controversy would have ended with peace among the people. Not so. There were two causes still existing productive of continued dissension. One was disputes of the bitterest nature arising out of conflicting claims to the same lands by settlers on account of "improvements" made under the laws of one or the other of the two States. The fierceness of this contention, when the hand of the executive power lay lightly, can easily be conceived. Another serious difficulty was the entry of prosecutions in our courts against the Virginia militia officers, who, with severe rigor, enforced the compulsory service of persons drafted by them for Gen. Clarke's expedition in 1781.[6] Remonstrances were made to the Virginia government by her late adherents complaining that the compact made upon the subject of private rights in the boundary agreement was not observed, and that the Pennsylvania government was persecuting by criminal suits the officers of militia who had but obeyed executive instructions. On June 12, 1783, Governor Harrison wrote to President Dickinson,[7] transmitting the remonstrance and calling attention to the nature of the charges made. This communication received the consideration of the Council, and a reply was made on July 3d,[8]

[6] Col. James Marshel wrote President Reed, Aug. 8, 1781, with reference to elections for the organization of the Pennsylvania militia: "I Judged it most prudent to postpone the Election until that event [the running of the line] Should happen, or until the departure of the armed Banditti Under the General [Clarke] that then awed the good people of this County, and were Chasing such of the Inhabitants as Pentecost, Shepherd, and Evans, the Lieutenants of Youghagaini, Monongalia & Ohio, were pleased to point out by way of drafting as fit to go with the general. . . ."—*IX. promising that, "As the Honor of Pennsylvania requires the strictest attention to the obligations of publick Faith, we shall take such Measures as shall be judged most proper to demonstrate the purity of our intentions and the rectitude of our proceedings." Immediately afterward Thomas Scott, the prothonotary and clerk of Washington County, was informed of the proceedings, the letter of Governor Harrison transmitted to him, and a full report on the facts was requested. This report,[1] which clearly showed that there had been no just ground for complaint, having been received, was laid before the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, which body, on Aug. 28, 1783,[2] pronounced the remonstrance and complaints frivolous and unwarrantable, and adopted a resolution requiring the Supreme Executive Council to correspond with the executive of Virginia upon the subject of the permanent boundary line and the mode and time for establishing the same, and authorizing the immediate appointment of commissioners to act with others to be appointed on the part of Virginia in running said line, "this house being sincerely disposed finally to ascertain the boundary between the two States as speedily as possible."

On Sept. 11, 1783,[3] the Supreme Executive Council proceeded to act upon the foregoing resolution. It was determined to appoint four commissioners immediately, with directions to provide the necessary astronomical apparatus, and to correspond with those to be appointed by the State of Virginia for the same purpose. The same day Rev. John Ewing,. D.D., David Rittenhouse, Esq., the State treasurer, John Lukens, Esq., surveyor-general, and Thomas Hutchins, Esq., were appointed the Pennsylvania commissioners. The Governor of Virginia, on November 10th, responded to a notification of this appointment, and named as the commissioners appointed on the part of that State Rev. James Madison, Rev. Robert Andrews, Hon. John Page, and Thomas Lewis.[4] It will be observed that two of the commissioners on each side had been members of the Baltimore commission in 1779. The time agreed upon for running and marking the line was the 1st day of June next, and as it was the intention to run the meridian line, which would extend north of the Ohio River, notice was given to Congress of the time and place of meeting.[5]

All things now seem auspicious for a final termination to the long controversy. The American Revolution is become a fact accomplished, a definite treaty of peace has been made, and henceforward there is an end to border troubles arising out of the boundary controversy. As the actual running of the permanent line is a matter of great interest, scientific as well as political, and as that line formed the southern boundary of Washington County for fifteen years after its organization, it will be proper to give the official record of the proceedings:

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE PENNSYLVANIA COMMISSIONERS.[6]

"IN COUNCIL, PHILADELPHIA, March 26th, 1784.

"GENTLEMEN,—

"With this letter you will receive a Certificate of the act of Council respecting your appointment duly authenticated.

"We confide in your abilities and attention, that the very important business committed to your charge will be performed 1784. in the best manner.

"Your first employment after the necessary astronomical observations, we presume, will be the Extension of Mason's and Dixon's line, due West five degrees of Longitude. This extended line we desire to have marked by Stones properly prepared and fixed in the ground, at the distance of five miles from one another, every stone to be inscribed with its distance from the River Delaware. The southwest corner of the State should be marked with a large Stone, well fixed, and by a considerable heap of smaller stones around it. The bearings and distance of near & remarkable objects around it should be taken & be mentioned in the Report of proceedings. The line from thence to the Northern Limit of the State should be marked as the Southern boundary is to be, computing the distance to be inscribed upon each Stone therein from the Southwest Corner.

"We hope that such a peace will be established with the Indians before you arrive at the Ohio in running the Western boundary, that you may safely proceed in that work to its northern Extremity. In that Case, we wish you to ascertain the Northwestern Corner of this State by astronomical observations in the Latitude of forty-three degrees, and to mark that as the Southwest Corner is to be.

"We have given Notice to Congress of your appointment as Commissioners to make these surveys; and if any should be appointed on their part, you will be pleased to act in conjunction with them. As you Gentlemen in the Execution of this Commission, will travel over many parts of the Country, We cannot but ardently wish that you may embrace the opportunity of making every observation and obtaining all possible information concerning the situation and courses of Rivers, Streams, Hills, and Mountains, that may be of the least use in assisting the publick Councils, on the very interesting subjects of forming the most advantageous communications by roads and canals between the different parts of the State.

"We have appointed Colonel Andrew Porter to attend you as Commissary under your direction. He is to purchase before you set out the articles of which a list is enclosed,[7] except such as can be obtained from the publick stores, procure provisions at the places of operation, hire necessary labourers, and to render a just and true account of the Monies expended.

"I am Gentlemen,

"with great Esteem and Regard,

"your obedient and very humble Servant,

PENNSYLVANIA COMMISSIONERS TO PRESIDENT DICKINSON.[8]

"SIR,

"We have considered the proposals made to us, by the Executive Council, and are unanimously of opinion that it will be inconsistent with the business for us to have anything to do with providing Necessaries for ourselves, or with being dependent on the Humor of a Commissary, so that unless it be part of his duty to provide for us, we cannot undertake the Work. And when we reflect upon the accuracy necessary for the accomplishment of the Work, the constant attention to the observations both Night and Day, the frequent interruptions of our natural Rest, the daily Fatigue we must undergo, the Danger of losing our Health and above all the regard we ought to have to our Characters with all the Gentlemen of Astronomical Knowledge in Europe, whose Eyes will be turned upon us, and who will expect from us all that Precision, that can be derived from the greatest astronomical Discoveries that have yet been made; We expect that the Supreme Executive Coun-

Pennsylvania Commissioners to Sup. Ex. Council.[1]

"Gentlemen,

"The time of our Departure from Philadelphia drawing near, it is necessary that the Commissary should be employed in looking out for the articles that may be wanted. As the Council have signified to us that they would be glad to know who would be agreeable to us in this Expedition, we would inform them that it appears probable to us, that Coll. Porter, from his long Experience in the army, and his knowledge of the most Œconomical and ready way of supplying a number of Men with the Necessaries would answer the Expectations of the Council and of the Commissioners, as well as any Person they can think of at present. He has informed us that if the Council will appoint him, he will go with us, and he is acquainted with the Terms which you have proposed.

"With Respect to the Provision to be made for the Commissioners, we have expressed our Sentiments fully in our last letter to Council, and we have agreed to undertake the Business, and hope to accomplish the Work in such a manner as will give satisfaction to the State and answer the Expectations of Gentlemen of science in Europe, if the Council do not wish to have Men of greater abilities employed; in which Case we will cheerfully resign the Business into the Hands of any others that may appear to the honorable Council to be better qualified for the Work, or more eligible on the whole.

"An anxious Desire to gratify the astronomical World in the performance of a Problem which has never yet been attempted in any Country, by a Precision and Accuracy that would do no Dishonour to our Characters, while it prevents the State of Pennsylvania from the Chance of Losing many hundred Thousands of Acres, secured to it by our agreement at Baltimore, has induced us to suffer our Names to be mentioned in the accomplishment of the Work. We assure you that the lucrative motives that might have Influence with us, in other Circumstances, have not sufficient Weight to engage us in so difficult a Work, that will separate us from our Families for half a year, and subject most of us to Fatigues to which we have not been accustomed.

"And we cannot persuade ourselves that the State of Pennsylvania will avail itself if this Desire, to subject us to the mortifying Circumstance of meeting with the Commissioners from Virginia upon any unequal Terms. However, we submit the whole affair to the consideration of the honorable Council, and if upon our Return from the work it should be found that the Commissioners from Virginia have been employed on the same Terms, we shall perfectly acquiesce; as we look for no more than an Equality with them.

"We are, Gentlemen,
"with great respect,
"your most obed't h'ble servants,

Report of Pennsylvania Commissioners.[2]

"To his Excellency John Dickinson, Esq., President of the State, & To the honorable the Supreme Executive Council of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

"The Commissioners appointed for ascertaining the Length of five Degrees of Longitude and for determining and fixing the Boundary Lines between this State and Virginia by Astronomical Observations, beg Leave to Report,

"That after procuring the necessary Instruments, according to the Directions of Council in the preceding Spring, we sett off for our respective Places of Observation about the Beginning of June, Messrs Rittenhouse and Lukens to Wilmington, and Ewing and Hutchins to the South Western Corner of the State.

"The observers at Wilmington completed their Observatory, and furnished it with the necessary Instruments, so as to begin their astronomical Operations, in Conjunction with Messrs Page and Andrews, Commissioners from Virginia, about the Beginning of July; where they continued observing the Eclipses of Jupiter's Satellites, till the 20th of September, that they might have a sufficient Number of them, both before and after his opposition to the Sun; And altho' the Summer proved very unfavorable for astronomical purposes, they were fortunate enough to make, amongst them, near 60 observations of these Eclipses, besides many other Observations of the other heavenly Bodies for the Regulation of their Clock and fixing their Meridian Line; so that they were well ascertained of their Time to a single Second.

"In the mean Time, the other Observers, setting out from Philadelphia, pursued their Rout, to the South Western Extremity of the State, where they arrived about the middle of July, having been greatly retarded by the Badness of the Roads through that mountainous Country. There they met with Messrs Madison and Ellicott, the Commissioners from the State of Virginia, who had arrived about the same Time. With all possible Dispatch, they erected their Observatory on a very high Hill at the place where the Continuation of Messrs Mason and Dixon's Line by Messrs. Neville and McClean Ended; supposing that this place would prove to be near to the Western Extremity of five Degrees of Longitude from the River Delaware. After erecting their Instruments, which had not sustained the least Damage, by the Carriage through so long a Journey, and the most unfavorable Roads, they began their astronomical Observations about the middle of July, and they continued them Night and Day till the 20th of September following. Although they were frequently interrupted and disappointed by an uncommon quantity of Rain and Foggy Weather, which seems peculiar to that hilly Country, yet by their Attention to the Business of their Mission, they made between 40 and 50 Observations of the eclipses of Jupiter's Satellites, many of which were correspondent with the Observations made by the other Astronomers at Wilmington; besides innumerable Observations of the Sun and Stars for the Regulation of their Time Pieces and the marking of their Meridian with the greatest Precision.

"In this part of their work, situated near 30 miles beyond any of the Inhabitants, the Commissioners were greatly assisted by the Diligence and indefatigable activity of Coll. Porter, their Commissary, to whose Industry in providing every Thing necessary, and prudence in managing the Business of his Department with the utmost Œconomy, the State is greatly indebted.

"The Astronomical Observation, being compleated on the 20th of September, the Eastern astronomers set out to meet the other Commissioners in the West, in order to compare them together. Messrs. Rittenhouse and Andrews carried with them the Observations made at Wilmington, while Messrs. Lukens and Page returned home, not being able to endure the Fatigues of so long a Journey, nor the subsequent labour of running and marking the Boundary line. Mr. Madison continued with the Western Astronomers till the arrival of Messrs Rittenhouse and Andrews, when the affairs of his Family and publick Station obliged him to relinquish the Business at this Stage, and return Home, after concurring with the other Commissioners as to the principles on which the matter was finally determined.

"Upon Comparison of the Observations made at both Extremities of our Southern Boundary, your Commissioners have the pleasure of assuring you, that no Discouragements arising from the unfavourable State of the Weather, or the unavoidable Fatigues of Constant application by Day and frequent Watchings by Night, have prevented them from embracing every opportunity, and making a sufficient Number of Astronomical Observations, to determine the Length of five Degrees of Longitude with greater precision than could be attained by terrestrial Measures of a Degree of Latitude in different places of the Earth: and further, that they have compleated their Observations with so much accuracy and certainty as to remove from their Minds every degree of doubt concerning their final determination of the South Western Corner of the State.

"In the Result of the Calculations, they found that their observatories were distant from each other twenty minutes and one second and an eighth part of a Second of Time. But as the Observatory at Wilmington was fixed at 114 Chains, 13 Links West of the Intersection of the Boundary Line of this State with the River Delaware; and as 20 Minutes of Time are equivalent to five Degrees of Longitude, they made the necessary Correction for the said 114 Chains, 13 Links, and also for the said one Second and one eighth part of a second, which is equal to 19 Chains and 96 Links; and accordingly fixed and marked the South Western Corner of the State in the manner mentioned in the joint agreement and Report of the Commissioners of both States under their Hands and Seals, which we have the Honour of laying before the Council.

"After these calculations were made, the Commissioners proceeded with all convenient Dispatch to the place where Mason and Dixon formerly were Interrupted by the Indian Nation in running the southern Boundary of this State, in order to extend the said Boundary Westward to the length of five Degrees from the River Delaware. Being prevented by rainy weather for near a week from making any astronomical observations in order to ascertain the Direction of the Parallel of Latitude, which we were to extend we concluded, to save Time and Expense, that it would be eligible to take the last Direction of Mason and Dixon's Line, and to correct it, if necessary, when we should have an opportunity of a serene Sky. Upon extending the Line in this Manner 195 Chains from the place where they ended their work, we found by astronomical observations that we were 32 feet and five inches North of the true parallel, and we accordingly made the necessary Correction here and marked a Tree with the Letters P. on the North side and V. on the South. From thence we assumed a new direction, which we again corrected in like manner at the distance of 575 Chains where we found our line to be 73 feet and 6 inches North of the Parallel of Latitude. We made the offset accordingly and planted a large post in the true parallel marked as above. From thence we found another direction by calculation, which beginning at the said post should at the Distance of eight Miles from it, intersect the said Parallel, making offsets at convenient distances, and planting Posts in the true Parallel. This direction being continued 33 Chains farther than the eight miles above mentioned, fell 23 inches South of the Parallel, where we also planted a post in the true Boundary marked as before; and from thence to the South West Corner of the State we assumed a new direction which being continued, fell two feet and eight inches South of the said Corner. This correction therefore being made, we planted a Squared White Oak Post in the said Point, and marked its bearings from Different Objects, as mentioned in our joint report. Besides the Marking of the Boundary Line by the Posts and Stones above mentioned; your Commissioners took care to have a Vista of 20 or 30 feet wide cut over all the most remarkable Ridges which were in the direction of the Parallel.

"For a more particular description of this part of our work, we beg leave to refer to the annexed plan and sketch of the Country through which the Line Passed. The season being now far advanced, we were obliged to desist from any farther Prosecution of the work, and agreed with the Virginia Commissioners to meet them at the South Western Corner of our State on the 16th of May next, to proceed in running and marking the Western Boundary of this State.

"Agreeable to our Commission to report the Situation of the Country and the best means of preserving the Communication and Connection between the Eastern and Western Parts of the State, we beg Leave to observe that the natural obstructions to so desirable a purpose may be in a great measure removed by a few easy instances of attention paid by the Legislature of this State to the Situation and exhausted conditon of the Western Citizens. Their Publick Roads are numerous, extensive, and in bad order, while the Citizens being few in number, scattered at a distance from each other, and being harrassed and exhausted by an Indian war, are unable to repair their Roads, or to open them through more easy and convenient Passes over the Hills and Mountains. A few hundred pounds, not exceeding one thousand, judiciously and frugally applied, would, in our opinion, make a tolerable good Waggon Road from York County to the Monongahela, and thereby facilitate the Exportation of Goods from this City to that Western Country, and secure their Trade with us, especially if the Ferry over the Susquehanna was made free to all the Citizens of the State. It appears probable to us that otherwise the Exertions of Maryland and Virginia to repair their Roads to that country will frustrate the Expectations, which we are entitled to entertain of enjoying the advantages of the Trade with the Western Parts of our own State. We beg Leave farther to observe that the natural attachment of the Western Citizens to this State might be increased and fixed by an indulgence to their distressed Situation in the price of their Lands, and the Terms of Payment, and particularly in the remission of the Interest due on the purchase Money, during the Time they have been obliged to evacuate their Possessions by the Savages, and fly to Forts for the security of their Lives and Families.

JOINT REPORT OF THE PENNSYLVANIA AND VIRGINIA COMMISSIONERS.[1]

"Agreeably to the Commission given by the State of Virginia to James Madison, Robert Andrews, John Page, and Andrew Ellicott, & by the State of Pennsylvania to John Ewing, David Rittenhouse, John Lukens & Thomas Hutchins, to determine by astronomical observations the Extent of five Degrees of Longitude west from the River Delaware in the Latitude of Mason's and Dixon's Line, & to run & mark the Boundaries which are common to both States, according to an agreement entered into by Commissioners from the said two States at Baltimore in 1779, & afterwards ratified by their respective assemblies: We, the underwritten Commissioners, together with the Gentlemen with whom we are joined in commission, have by corresponding astronomical observations, made near the Delaware & in the western Country, ascertained the extent of the said five Degrees of Longitude: and the underwritten Commissioners have continued Mason's and Dixon's Line to the termination of the said five Degrees of Longitude, by which work the southern Boundary of Pennsylvania is completed.

"The continuation we have marked by opening vistas over the most remarkable Heights which lie in its course, & by planting on many of these Heights in the Parallel of Latitude, the true Boundary, Posts marked with the Letters P. & V., each letter facing the State of which it is the Initial. At the Extremity of this Line, which is the South West corner of the State of Pennsylvania, we have planted a squared unlettered white oak Post, around whose base we have raised a Pile of Stones. The Corner is in the last vista we cut, on the east side of an Hill, one hundred and thirty-four chains & nine Links East of the meridian of the western observatory, & two Chains & fifty-four Links west of a deep narrow valley through which the said last vista is cut. At the distance of fifty-one Links & bearing from it North twenty-three degrees east stands a white oak marked on the south side with three notches; & bearing South twelve degrees west & at the Distance of twenty-nine Links stands a black oak marked on the North side with four Notches. The advanced season of the year & the Inclemency of the weather have obliged us to suspend our operations; but we have agreed to meet again at the South West Corner of Pennsylvania on the sixteenth Day of next May, to complete the Object of our Commission. Given under our Hands & Seals, in the County of Washington in Pennsylvania, this 18th Day of November, 1784.

"ROBERT ANDREWS,
"ANDREW ELLICOTT,
"JOHN EWING,
"DAVID RITTENHOUSE,
"THO. HUTCHINS."

Thus was the southwestern corner of Pennsylvania at last found and marked; but the meridian line thence northward for our western boundary was as yet untouched. The commissioners who had extended Mason and Dixon's line had adjourned to meet again to run this meridian line on the 16th day of the next May; some obstacles must have intervened, however, for on April 11, 1785,[2] Rev. Dr. John Ewing and Thomas Hutchins were appointed to de- 1785. termine and mark that boundary, to whom instructions were at once issued.[3] But Dr. Ewing resigned and Thomas Hutchins was absent, whereupon the Supreme Executive Council on May 5, 1785,[4]

"Resolved, That David Rittenhouse and Andrew Porter, Esquires, be appointed Commissioners to run and mark the boundary of this Commonwealth, from the south-western corner thereof to the northwestern corner of the same; and that Andrew Ellicott, Esquire, be appointed a Commissioner, in conjunction with David Rittenhouse and Andrew Porter, Esquires, or either of them, or such other Commissioner or Commissioners as may be appointed by Council, to run and mark the boundary of this Commonwealth, from the river Ohio, where it crosses the same, to the northwest corner of the State."

Andrew Ellicott was of Maryland, and on May 4,

1785, wrote to President Dickinson[1]: "I understand that the Executive Council (at the Head of which you preside) have appointed me one of your Commissioners to run the western boundary of your State, over the Ohio. As I have been employed in favor of Virginia on this business to that River, I find that I can attend with conveniency afterward in favor of Pennsylvania." The other commissioner on the part of Virginia was Joseph Neville, and the commissioners on both sides met at the appointed place on May 16, 1785,[2] and on Aug. 23, 1785, made their report, as follows:[3]

"We, the subscribers, Commissioners appointed by the States of Pennsylvania and Virginia, to ascertain the boundary between the said States:

"Do certify that we have carried on a Meridian Line from the South-West Corner of Pennsylvania Northward to the River Ohio, and marked it by cutting a wide Vista over all the principal Hills intersected by the said Line, and by felling or deadening a Line of Trees, generally thro' all the lower grounds; and we have likewise placed Stones marked on the East side P., and on the west side V., on most of the principal Hills and where the Line strikes the Ohio; which Stones are accurately placed in the true Meridian bounding the States aforesaid.

"Witness our Hands and Seals this 23d day of August, 1785.

"Dav. Rittenhouse,
"Andrew Porter,
"Andrew Ellicott,
"Joseph Neville."

The western boundary was yet to be continued to the northwestern corner of the State, and, although none of that part north of the Ohio was touched by Washington County, yet it is proper that our record be completed by giving the further and final extension.

It will be remembered that the commission to Rittenhouse, Porter, and Ellicott authorized those gentlemen to continue the line to completion; indeed, Mr. Ellicott was specially appointed to act for Pennsylvania north of the Ohio. In the early spring of 1786, however, the commissioners were changed. Rittenhouse and Ellicott were put upon the northern boundary between Pennsylvania and New York, which had been postponed the preceding year, while Alexander McClean, of Fayette County, was commissioned to assist Andrew Porter.[4] 1786.

On May 10, 1786, Col. Andrew Porter addressed to the Supreme Executive Council the following letter:[5]

"Phila., May 10, 1786.

"Gentlemen:

"I beg leave to inform Council that I propose to proceed to the Westward without loss of time, in order to complete the Line of the Western Boundary of the State; and being informed that Mr. Alexander McClean is to assist me in the business, should be glad his appointment might be sent him as soon as convenient. . . ."

The two commissioners made a report of progress on June 25, 1786, as follows:[6]

"Shenango Creek, 25th June, 1786.

"Gentlemen:

"We beg leave to inform Council, That on the 19th Inst. we began to extend the Line of the Western boundary of the State, and have proceeded upwards of three miles. We have fallen in with several Hunting parties of Indians since our arrival in the woods; they all appear friendly and peaceable.

"We are, with Respect, &c.,
"Andrew Porter,
"Alexander McClean."

The final report was made Oct. 4, 1786:[7]

"We the commissioners appointed to ascertain and Complete the Line of the Western boundary of the State of Pennsylvania, beg leave to report: That we have ascertained and completed said Line by astronomical observations as far as Lake Erie; having opened a Vista, and planted Stones in the proper direction, marked on the East side P., and that said line extends some distance in the Lake.

"October 4th, 1786.

"Andrew Porter,
"Alexander McClean."[8]

The reader has been long kept about the southwestern corner of Washington County, as originally erected, awaiting the ascertainment and marking of two imaginary lines coming together at that point, which, run and marked a century ago, then terminated a fierce but bloodless contest, and have since served to separate the jurisdiction of two sovereign and independent States. He has seen how near, at one time, almost the whole of what is now Washington County was of being left to form a part of the State of Virginia. He will linger yet a while to read the language of Mr. J. H. B. Latrobe,[9] at the close of his description of the manner in which the Indian escort stayed the London surveyors at the crossing of Dunkard Creek, in 1767:

"Subsequently, and by other hands, the line was run out to its termination, and a cairn of stones some five feet high in the dense forest now marks the termination of Mason and Dixon's line, calling by that name the southern boundary of Pennsylvania, and, standing on the cairn and looking to the east and north, a fresher growth of trees in these directions indicates the ranges of the vistas so often mentioned. But mount the highest tree adjacent to the cairn that you may note the highest mountain within the range of vision, and then, ascending its summit, take in the whole horizon at a glance, and seek for a single home of a single descendant of the sylvan monarchs whose war-path limited the surveys, and you will seek in vain. But go back to the cairn, and listen there in the quiet of the woods, and a roll, as if of distant thunder, will come unto the ear, and a shrill shriek will pierce it, as the monster and the miracle of modern ingenuity—excluded from Pennsylvania as effectually by the line we have described as the surveyors of old were stayed by the Indian war-path—rushes around the southwestern angle of the State on its way from the city which perpetuates the title of the Lord Proprietary of Maryland, to find a breathing-place on the Ohio in the 'Panhandle' of Virginia."

CHAPTER XV.

VII.

The West Augusta Court.[1]

BEFORE proceeding with the extracts made from the interesting records of this court, there should be a notice of the judicial system then in force in Virginia.

The Virginia Judicial System.—In every county were appointed magistrates, called justices of the peace, usually from eight to thirty or forty in number, in proportion to the size of the county, of the most discreet and honest of the inhabitants. They were nominated by their fellows, but commissioned by the Governor, and served without pay. If the question before them were a question of law only, they decided it themselves; but if it were of fact, or of fact and law combined, it was referred to a jury. In the latter case, of a combination of law and fact, it was usual for the jurors to decide the fact, and to refer the law arising thereon to the decision of the justices. But this division of the subject lay in their discretion only. If the question related to any point of public liberty, or if it were one of those in which the justices might be suspected of bias, the jury undertook to decide both law and fact.

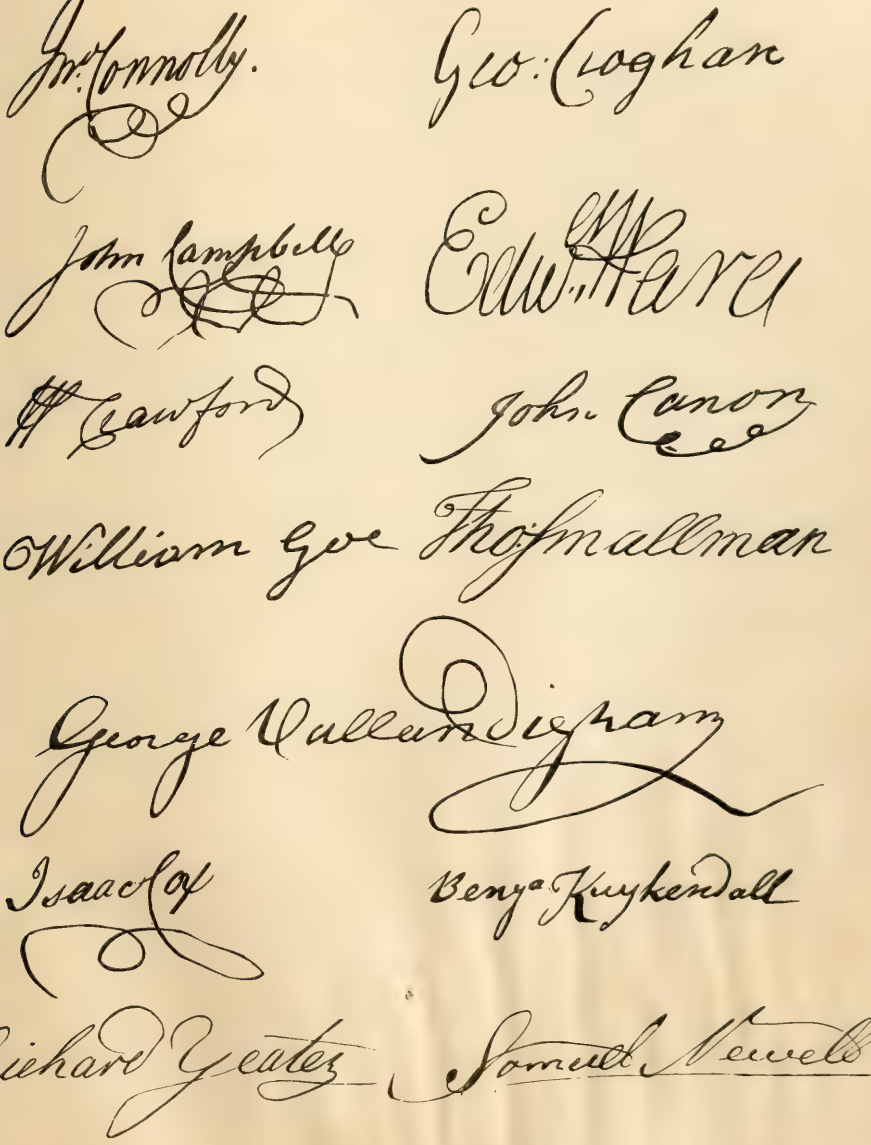
The justices executed their process by the sheriff or coroner of the county, commissioned from among themselves, or by constables of their own appointment. When any free person committed an offense against the Commonwealth, if it were below the degree of felony, he was bound by a justice to appear before the court, to be tried on an indictment or information. If the charge were a felony, the accused was committed to jail and a court of these justices was called; if, on examination, they thought him guilty, he was sent to the jail of the General Court, before which court he was tried first by a grand jury of twenty-four, of whom thirteen must have concurred to find a true bill, which being found he was tried by a jury of twelve men of the county where the offense was committed, and by their unanimous verdict he was acquitted or condemned without appeal. But if the criminal were a slave, the trial by the county court was final. In every case, however, except that of high treason, the Governor had the power to pardon. In high treason the pardon could only be granted by the General Assembly.

In civil matters these justices had jurisdiction in all cases of whatever value not appertaining to the department of the admiralty. This jurisdiction was twofold. If the matter in dispute were of less value than four dollars and one-sixth a single justice might try it at any time and place within his county, and might award execution upon the goods of the defendant. If it were of that or greater value it was determinable before the county court, which consisted of four at least of these justices, assembled at the court-house of the county on a certain day in every month. From the determination of the county court, if the matter in controversy were of the value of ten pounds sterling, or concerned the title to or the bounds of lands, an appeal lay to one of the superior courts.

There were three superior courts, to wit, the High Court of Chancery, the General Court, and the Court of Admiralty. These courts were held at the capital of the State, at first Williamsburg, afterwards Richmond.[2]

Without further introduction, or further comment than an occasional note, the reader will now be introduced to the records of an extinct judicial jurisdiction; those records made up on the day of the transactions recorded, and signed by the presiding judge at the end of each day's proceedings.

RECORDS OF WEST AUGUSTA COURT.



"His Majesties Writ adjourning the County Court of Augusta from the Town of Staunton to Fort Dunmore and with a new Commission of the Peace and Dedimus and a Commission of Oyer and Terminer and Dedimus from under the hands of John Earl of Dunmore, his Majesties Lieutenant and Governor in Chief, bearing date the sixth day of December, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Seventy-four, directed to Silas Hart, James Lockart, John Dickinson, John Christian, Daniel Smith, Archibald Alexander, John Poage, Felix Gilbert, Abraham Smith, Samuel McDowell, George Moffet, Sampson Matthews, Alexander McClenachan, William Bowyer, Matthew Harrison, George Matthews, Michael Bowyer, Alexander Robertson, John Gratton, John Hays, Thomas Hugert, James Craig, Elijah McClenachan, John Frogg, Jonah Davidson, William Tees, John Skidmore, George Croghan,[3] John Campbell, John Connolly, Edward Ward, Thomas Smallman, Dawsey Pentecost, John Gibson, William Crawford, John Stephenson, John McCullough, John Cannon, George Vallandigam, Silas Hedge, David Shepherd, and William Goe, Gentlemen, being read and thereupon Pursuant to the said Dedimus the said George Croghan, John Campbell, John Connolly, John Gibson, George Vallandigam & William Goe, Gentlemen, took the Usual oaths to his Majesties Person and Government, subscribed the Abjuration Oath and test, and also took the Oaths of justices of the Peace and of justices of the County Court in Chancery, and of justices of Oyer and Terminer, all which Oaths were administered to them by Thomas Smallman and Dawsey Pentecost, and then John Campbell and John Connolly administered all the aforesaid Oaths to the aforesaid Thomas Smallman and Dawsey Pentecost, who took the same and Subscribed the Abjuration Oath and Test, on which the court being Constituted the following members were present:

[1] From the original records of the Virginia courts, held first at Fort Pitt (called by the Virginians Fort Dunmore), afterward for a few monthly terms near the borough of Washington, and subsequently, after the division into the three counties in 1776, on the Monongahela River, near the Allegheny and Washington County line, such extracts will be made as will serve not only to preserve from oblivion this interesting period of our legal history, but also to illustrate the character of the jurisdictional contest then pending, the nature of the legal business of that day, and, still further, the social condition of that early time. It will be remembered that the spelling of proper names is retained as in the original records.

[2] This account of the organization of the Virginia courts and their judicial system at the period covered by the records about to be introduced is taken from Thomas Jefferson's "Notes on the State of Virginia," written in 1781–82.

[3] George Croghan and the persons whose names follow all lived west of the mountains.

[1] The reader will now observe that an additional batch of justices take their seats upon the bench. An important cause is about to be heard.

[2] Of Sept. 17, 1774.

[3] A notice of this Thomas Scott, at the date of the above record a justice of Westmoreland County, has been given in the sketch of the boundary controversy. He became afterwards a member of the Supreme Executive Council, the first prothonotary and clerk of Washington County, a justice of that county, her first member of Congress under the constitution of 1787, and held many posts of honor. He had been arrested on Nov. 12, 1774, at his home on Dunlap's Creek, and carried before Lord Dunmore (on the latter's return from "Dunmore's War"), where he was held to bail for his appearance at the Augusta County Court, soon to be established at Pittsburgh. He chose to give bail on account of his health.

The record shows his hearing before Dunmore's Court on May 18, 1775, but it will be observed that on the termination he does not enter into the recognizance directed, and therefore must have been imprisoned. There is nothing to show us how long he remained incarcerated, but "he was not released until accumulated resentment and the beginning of the war for liberty had burst his prison bonds and set many of Connolly's captives free."—Veech. Contrast the policy adopted by the Virginia authorities with that always pursued by the magistrates of Westmoreland County, as outlined by Governor John Penn in his letter of April 22, 1774, "to William Crawford, Esq., and his Associates, justices of Westmoreland county." In this letter it is said, " . . . As the Government of Virginia hath the power of raising a Militia, and there is not any such in this province, it will be in vain to contend with them in the way of Force; the Magistrates, therefore, at the same Time that they continue with steadiness to Exercise the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania with respect to the distributions of justice and punishment of Vice, must be cautious of entering into any such Contests with the Officers of my Lord Dunmore as may tend to widen the unhappy Breach, and therefore, as Things are at present circumstanced, I would not advise the Magistracy of Westmoreland County to proceed by way of criminal prosecutions against them for exercising the Government of Virginia." (X. Col. Records, 171.)

[4] Now Monongahela City.

"The above-named William Evans was led to the Bar & upon Examination denied the fact wherewith he stands Charged; whereupon several Witnesses were sworn & Examined; on Consideration of which the Court are of the Opinion that he is not guilty of the Burglary, but that he is guilty of a Trespass.

"It is Ord that he be Committed to the Goal of this County & there to remain until he enter into recog in the sum of £50 with 2 secys in the sum of £25 each for his app at the Grand jury & for the Good behavior & the sd Wm. Wilson, of Georges Creek, who, it will be remembered, with John Carnahan, the sheriff of Westmoreland, and others, raided Fort Dunmore, liberated Justice Hanna and others, captured Doctor Connolly, and carried him on the way to Philadelphia as far as Ligonier. At Ligonier, St. Clair wined the doctor well, but was much mistaken when he supposed he had thawed out state secrets. In retaliation for Connolly's capture, "a mob or set of Connolly's friends, who live on Chartiers Creek," seized Col. Wilson, Joseph Spear, and Devereux Smith, and sent them in an old leaky boat down to Fort Fincastle (Wheeling) under guard. This retaliation, as well as the efforts of the Pittsburgh Committee, procured Connolly's release, and perhaps Wilson, Spear, and Smith were also soon set at liberty.

The court for Augusta County was held at Pittsburgh, Oct. 17, 1775, according to an ordinance of the convention held at Richmond; Present, George Croghan, Thomas Smallman, John Gibson, and John McCullock; and also on Nov. 21, 1775; present, George Croghan, Edward Ward, Thomas Smallman, John Canon, and George Vallandigham. At the latter court:

"The persons appd to View a road from Capn Froman's to the Mouth of Yough made their report: It is Ord that the sd road be Established & that John Malony & Thos Lapsley & Edward Sharp be surveyors & that the Tithables within 3 miles on each side work thereon."

On Nov. 21, 1775, "a Court was held—Present, Geo. Croghan, Thos. Smallman, John Canon, and Geo. Vallandigham,—for the Examination of Mr. Devereux Smith at His House, by His Petition to the Justices," for the murder of Capt. George Aston, one of Connolly's militia officers. The court was of the opinion that Mr. Smith should be held for trial at the next General Court in April, and ordered his commitment to prison.

The prisoner by his counsel moved to be admitted to bail, whereupon "the Court are of the Opinion that from the situation Mr. Smith is in, the circumstances attending the fact wherewith he is charged, that he ought to be admitted to Bail," and he was held in £3000, with Robert Hanna, Æneas Mackay, and William Butler as his sureties, "upon Condition that Devereux Smith doth personally appear On the 6th day of the next General Court, (if he be able at the time to attend the sd General Court from the situation of his wound & state of health,) if not, at the ensuing Court for the Tryall of Criminals, and shall not depart, &c." What became of this case is not known, but it is evident that it had its origin in the personal troubles of the jurisdictional controversy.

The next term was held at Pittsburgh, Jan. 16, 1776; present, Edward Ward, Thomas Smallman, John McCullock, George Vallandigham, and William Goe. Administration of the estate of Alexander Miller, deceased, was granted to John Calhoun; George Wilson, John Swearingen, John Hardin, and Jos. Caldwell appointed appraisers. 1776.

License to keep an ordinary was granted to David Duncan and to James McCaslin. Thomas Girty, the brother of Simon, was bound to keep the peace, having been charged with threats and assault upon the wife of Samuel Semple, the Pittsburgh landlord.

Hugh Scott and Ezekiel Dewit were appointed constables.

On Jan. 17, 1776,—present, Edward Ward, Dorsey Pentecost, John McCullock, George Vallandigham, and Thomas Smallman,—Richard Wells, James Wright, Daniel Harris, Thomas Glenn, Thomas Crooks, Thomas Atkinson, Francis Morrison, and Peter Hilderbrand had their several ear-marks allowed and recorded. Samuel McBride was appointed a constable in place of Rezin Virgin. The court was then adjourned until the court in course.

The next term at Pittsburgh, being upon a writ adjourning the county court of Augusta from Staunton to Fort Dunmore, was held April 16, 1776; present, John Campbell, Dorsey Pentecost, Thomas Smallman, and John Canon. Administration of the estate of Jeremiah Woods, deceased, was "granted to John Stevenson (who is married to the widow,) he having complied with the law, and Benjamin Kuykendall, James Sullivan, Richard McMahon and Peter Barrakman were appointed appraisers, whereupon court was adjourned until tomorrow morning at 9 O'clock."

[1] This was the ordinance of the Virginia Convention of June, 1776, Chapter V., Section IV., 9 Hening, 127: "Be it therefore ordained that the justices residing in the said district, on taking the same oath aforesaid, shall have the power and authority to hold a court within the said district on the third Tuesday of every month, at such place as they may appoint, and shall exercise their office, both in court and without, in the same manner as the justices of the several counties are empowered to do."

[2] Here we have record evidence of the existence of a place for holding a Virginia court near where Washington stands.

The Augusta County court, while in session at Pittsburgh, Aug. 20, 1776, ordered the erection of a house, twenty-four by fourteen feet, for a jail. The "petition" was doubtless intended to set apart a small room for a temple of justice. The place where the building was erected was called "Catfish Camp;" on second thought that name was erased, and "Augusta Town" substituted. The name was changed after adjournment, however; see erasure at the end of the next day's proceedings; see also order made by the Yohogania court on Dec. 23, 1777.

That this jail and court-house, and, therefore, Augusta Town, must have been on the William Gabby farm, immediately west of Washington, is sustained not only by tradition, but by the recollection of the removal of such an old building by Mr. Gabby's father.

Here closes the Order Book of the old Augusta County Court.

Very many matters, showing a large and varied business done in this court, have been omitted. The parts of that old book passed over show the names of very many of our pioneers. The reader will please look at the map of the old Virginia counties, and observe the extensive territorial jurisdiction of the district of West Augusta, whose last court was held within sight of Washington were it not for the intervening hill.

CHAPTER XVI.

VIII.

The Yohogania County Court.

The Court of Yohogania County.—In the session of the General Assembly of Virginia for October, 1776, as shown in a preceding chapter, an act was passed defining the District of West Augusta, and dividing the said district into three new counties, Ohio, Yohogania, and Monongalia,[1] and defining their boundaries severally, except as to Yohogania County upon the northeast, north, and northwest. The same act provided, as will be remembered, that the electors in each of the new counties should meet on the 8th of December next (those of Yohogania County at the house of Andrew Heath, on the Monongahela River), "then and there to choose the most convenient place for holding courts for their respective counties." We have no returns of this election for Yohogania County, and the records now to be presented are obscure as to the place where the first courts of that county were held, whether in the lately erected twenty-four by fourteen feet building at Augusta Town, at Pittsburgh, or at the house of Andrew Heath; suffice it to say that those first courts were held at all events at a place afterwards falling within the limits of Washington County, and from Dec. 23, 1776, to Aug. 24, 1780, exercised an undisputed jurisdiction over all the lands west of the Monongahela within the limits of that county. The war of the Revolution, as well as the constant pressure of a contest with bloodthirsty savages instigated and directed by British management, united our pioneers for common protection, and during the time referred to there is but little if any trace of internal dissension. Even persons holding lands under Pennsylvania rights held office, civil and military, under the appointment of this Virginia court. The presence of a name, therefore, upon these pages will permit of no odious inference, but indicate only the part performed by the owner in those early days, and perhaps many will now first learn of positions, honorable and full of danger and responsibility, filled by their ancestors in times that tried men's souls.

"YOHOGANIA COUNTY, Dec. 23, 1776.

"In consequence of an act of the general assembly of Virginia putting off all that part of the District of West Augusta, Northward of the following bounds or lines (viz) Beginning at the mouth of Cross creek running up the several courses thereof to the head; Thence south-Easterly to the nearest part of the dividing ridge Between the Ohio and the Monongahela Rivers; Thence along the said Dividing Ridge to the head of Ten Mile creek; Thence East to the road leading from Catfish Camp to Redstone old Fort; Thence across the said River to the said Fort; Thence along Dunlap's old road to Braddocks Road, and with said road to the meridian of Potomac River;—and a Commission of the Peace and a commission of Oyer and Terminer, Directed to John Campbell, Edward Ward, Thomas Smallman, Dorsey Pentecost, John Gibson, William Crawford, John Stephenson, John Cannon, George Vallandigham, William Goe, John Neville, Isaac Cox, John McDowell, Richard Yeates, John McDaniel, [McDonald?] George McCormick, Philip Ross, Benjamin Kirkindall, William Harrison, Samuel Newell, Thomas Brown, Thomas Freeman, John DeCompt, Joshua Wright, Oliver Miller, Benjamin Harrison and Zachariah Connell; Also a Dedimus Potestatum, directed to William Goe, John Neville and Isaac Cox, or any two of them, to administer the oath prescribed by law, to John Campbell, Edward Ward, Thomas Smallman, Dorsey Pentecost, John Gibson, John Cannon, and Geo. Vallandigham, or any two of them, and they to administer the aforesaid oath to the aforesaid justices.

"Whereupon the aforesaid William Goe and Isaac Cox administered the aforesaid oath to the aforesaid Dorsey Pentecost, who thereupon did administer the aforesaid oath to the aforesaid Richard Yeates, George McCormick, Benjamin Kirkindall, Samuel Newell, William Goe, Isaac Cox, Thomas Freeman, Joshua Wright, Oliver Miller, Benjamin Frye, Matthew Richie, Andrew Swearingin, and John Canon, as Justices of the Peace.[2]

"The court then proceeded to the election of their clerk, whereupon the said Dorsey Pentecost, Esquire, was unanimously chosen and appointed their Clerk, and ordered to take charge of their rolls.

"Dorsey Pentecost took the oath Prescribed by Law as Clerk of this court.

"The court demanded the Records and Papers from John Madison, Junior, Deputy Clerk of East Augusta, in whose custody they are; Which he Peremptorily refused, Notwithstanding he confessed he had seen an Act of assembly directing him so to do.

"Edward Ward, gentleman, came into court and prayed that the court would receive his reasons for refusing to act as Sheriff of this county, which was granted and were as follows:

"That he cannot think of acting as Sheriff, or appointing any under sheriffs, until the line Between the states of Virginia and Pennsylvania are fixed or limited; for on the North Eastern Bounds of this County There is still a Door open for dispute and Contintion, which has been heretofore the cause of Disturbing the Peace of the People settled and Claiming alternately the Jurisdiction of Each Government, and before he can think of acting or any Person under him, he proposes praying the general Assembly to have a Temporary line fixed between them, or the limits of Pennsylvania run or the Government of Virginia Peremptorily running the same, until which is done he cannot think of acting in any state or Government to Infringe on the reserved rights of his fellow subjects; he farther assures that when Government has this done, he is ready to act with Cheertulness, and if this Cannot be done he begs that the Court will Recommend some other gentlemen to his Excellency to serve as Sheriff,—and hopes the Court will acquiesce in Promoting the having the above bounds ascertained; and further offers to qualify into the Commission of the Peace.

[1] Chapter XLV.; 9 Hening, p. 262; see ante, p. 183.

[2] Subsequently others of the persons named in this commission of the peace came in and were duly qualified, to wit: John McDowel, George Vallandigham, Zachariah Connell, William Goe, William Crawford, John McDonald, John Campbell, and John Stephenson. A new commission was again issued, as will be seen, on May 26, 1778.

"The Court is of opinion that the said Edward Ward, gentleman, may be Permitted to Qualify into the commission of the Peace, they being of opinion that he is no sheriff until he enters into Bond before this Court, and comply with the Tinner of his commission as Sheriff; Whereupon the said Edward Ward came into court and took the oath of a justice of the Peace.

"The Court is of opinion that Joshua Wright, Gentleman, is a proper person to be recommended to his Excellency the Governor to serve as sheriff, the whole of the above gentlemen named in the Commission of the Peace who are qualified refusing to act in said office on account of the great difficulty they apprehend will attend the Execution of said office until such time as a line is fixed Between this Common Wealth and the state of Pennsylvania."[1]

Then followed the appointment of constables,—Brice Virgin, Richard Elson, William Lankford, John Alexander, Samuel Clark, Samuel Griffith, Isaac Sparks, John Brown, James Bokias, Matthew Hays, William Gaston, William Hays, John Johnson, Josiah Orsborn, Philip Philips, Andrew Dye, Peter Austurges, and John Beans.

"Ord that Dorsey Penticost, Esquire, be recommended as a proper person to have the Command of the Militia of this County; and that John Cannon be a proper person to be recommended as Colonel of the said Militia; Isaac Cox be recommended as Leutenant Colonel of said Militia, and Henry Taylor, Maj. of said Militia.

"Ordered that the Clerk forward a letter to his Excellency & Council notifying the general dissatisfaction of the people of this county against the late Election being held on the Sabbath day, the short notice of the said election, and of the Inconveniency of the Bounds circumscribing the said County.

"Whereas by an act of the General Assembly the suits &c brought and instituted in the Court of the District of West Augusta are directed to be determined in this Court and the Papers and Records relative thereto are now in the hands of John Madison, Junior, Deputy Clerk of East Augusta, who hath this day been called upon to deliver the said Papers and records to this court, which he, the said John Madison, in contempt of the said Act and the demands of this Court refuses to deliver, to the Manifest Injury of Individuals and evident hurt of the publick:

"Ordered, therefore, that a Process be Issued to apprehend the said John Madison and forthwith bring before this Court to answer the above misdemeanor.

"Court adjourned until in Course.

"EDWARD WARD."

"Court met on Monday the 28th of April, 1777, according to adjournment to Court in Course.

"Present, Edward Ward, John Cannon, John McDowell, 1777. Richard Yeates, Benjamin Kirkindall, Joshua Wright, Oliver Miller and Andrew Swearingen, Gentlemen, Justices.

"On the Courts meeting and the Sheriffs Commission not coming to Mr. Joshua Wright, agreeable to recommendation of the Court, and notwithstanding Col. Pentecost's letter to Colonel Cannon, Insuring him he had a Sheriff's Commission for Mr. Wright, he refused to act Protempory. Therefore the Court was reduced to the Necessity of appointing another, as there was an Election to be held for a Senitor and Delegates, and a Criminal to be tried and other Breeches of the Peece.

"The question first being put to Mr. Joshua Wright, to be appointed protempory, and he refused, notwithstanding his hearing of the Commission as aforesaid; but said if his commission had come to this Court he would have sworn into said Office:—The question then being put to the rest of the Court, who would serve as Sheriff, and all refused to expect Mr. William Harrison, who agreed to be appointed, and the Court unanimously agreed that the said Mr. Harrison be recommended as a proper Person for Sheriff, and Mr. Joshua Wright concurred with the Court.

"The Court is of opinion that William Harrison, Samuel Newell and Thomas Freeman are proper persons to be recommended for Sheriffs the Insuing year.

"William Harrison came into Court took the Oath as Sheriff.

"Court adjourned Tuesday, 7 O'clock."

"Court met according to adjournment.

"Pres't Edward Ward, John Cannon, John McDowell, Richard Yeates, Benjamin Kirkindall, Joshua Wright, Oliver Miller, Andrew Swearingen, Gentlemen, Justices."

"The Court still laboring under great difficulty for the want of a Clerk, as Colonel Dorsey Pentecost, our former Clerk lying in Baltimore in the Small Pox: The Court then applied to Mr. James Innis who the said Colonel Penticost had appointed to serve as Clerk in his Absence, and when application was made to said Mr. Innis he refused to attend the Court; his answer was that he only agreed to attend the March Court, upon which the Court choose Mr. Isaac Cox for their Clerk, who Came into Court and swore into said Office."

Zachariah Connell (the proprietor of Connellsville), William Lee, and Andrew Heath were sworn as captains of the militia, John Canon as colonel, and Henry Taylor as major.

At the next term, held May 26, 1777, "present, William Crawford, Benjamin Kirkendall, John McDaniel, and Oliver Miller, Gentlemen, Justices,"

"Colo. Dorsey Pentecost came into Court and beged that the Court would consider the Cause of his not attending their Court at their last meeting—he, the said Pentecost, Convinced this Court that it was out of his power to attend, he being at that Time confined in the Small Pox;—and prayed the Court to reestablish him in his office of Clerk of this Court, Colonel Isaac Cox who was appointed Clerk of this Court to succeed him, acquiescing, in said Petition, on the Proviso, that his Bonds given the Court for the due performance of his Office, be given up or Confiscated; the Court is therefore of opinion that the Reasons offered by the said Pentecost for his non-attendance at Last Court is satisfactory and the Court acquiesce with his and Colonel Cox's request, and it is accordingly ordered that Colonel Cox's Bond be delivered him and he is hereby released therefrom and that the said Pentecost enter into Bond with this Court for the due performance of his Office, and to Take the charge of the Rolls of this Court as Clerk to this Court.

"Colonel Isaac Cox took his seat in Court."

Thomas Cook was sworn as captain of the militia, John Muckelhany and Benjamin Kirkendall[2] (otherwise called Jersey Ben) were appointed constables. On May 27th, Michael Thorn and Joshua Meeks were sworn as captains of the militia. To Zachariah Connell, Edward Ward, William Goe, Thomas Freeman, Benjamin Frye, Benjamin Kirkendall, Oliver Miller, Richard Yeates, Andrew Swearingen, John McDaniel (McDonald), Samuel Newell, Matthew Richie, and Isaac Cox was assigned a portion of territory in which he was to "Take in the list of Tithables."

"June 26th, 1777, Court met according to adjournment.

"Pres't, John Campbell, Isaac Cox, Richard Yeates, Thomas Freeman, Oliver Miller, and Zachariah Connell, Gentlemen, Justices.

"Ordered, That the court be adjourned to six o'clock[1] to-morrow morning.

"JOHN CAMPBELL."

On the next day, Aug. 27, 1777, there seems to have been quite a deal of civil business done. It may be interesting to name the parties to causes wherein orders were made: Alexander Bowling v. William Poston; Same v. Francis Morrison; Thomas Rankin v. Jeremiah Standsbury; David Day v. Jacob Hendricks; John Lyda v. Joseph Cox; Matthew Dale v. Richard Elson; Benjamin Jones v. Patrick McDaniel; William McMahon v. John Greathouse; Daniel Swigert v. Benjamin Newgent; Peter Reasoner v. Davis Ruth; Balser Shillings v. Spencer Collins; Dorsey Pentecost v. Christopher McDaniel; Burr Harrison v. William Williams; Joseph Lindsey v. George Long; Zachariah Connell v. Providence Mounce; Same v. John Lindsey; Ignaw Labat v. John Bradley; Hugh Sterling v. Mordecai Richards; Ignaw Labat v. Thomas Girty; Davis Wilson v. Henry Bowling; Alexander Sumrall and Thomas Jack v. Walter Summerville; John Worthington v. James Poor; John Snively v. Samuel Beelor; Richard Yeates v. Brice Virgin; Richard Waller v. John Earskin; Dorsey Pentecost v. James Poor. The spelling of the original is preserved in this list. Isaac Leet, Sr., Joseph Beeler, Sr. (the late Westmoreland County commissioner), John Carmichael, James Rogers, Isaac Reason, James McLane, James Blackstone, Joseph Becket, and Joseph Vance are recommended to the Governor to be added to the commission of the peace.

"Ordered, That the magistrates appointed to make the Tour of the County and Tender the oath of allegiance and Fidelity, Shall also Take in the Numbers in Each Family within their Respective districts, In order to enable the justices to make an equal distribution of the salt, and make return to October Court."

Isaac Cox was recommended to the Governor to be commissioned as lieutenant-colonel of the militia in the place of Thomas Brown, who had declined the office, when the court rose.

The next term was held Sept. 22, 1777. On the first day of the court

"William Taylor produced a Licence appointing him to preach the Gospel after the manner of his sect; which being read, the said William Taylor came into Court and took the Oath of fidelity and allegiance to this Commonwealth."

To illustrate, by two of several cases tried, the method of administering the criminal law, the following records appear:

"David England, being charged with a breach of an act of Assembly of this commonwealth, Intitled an Act for the punishment of Certain Offences, came into Court and confessed the Charge; Then came a jury, to wit: James Swolevan, James Wall, Charles Bruce, James Campbell, William Marshall, Joseph Becket, John Crow, Zadock Wright, Edward Cook, Joseph Bealer, Andrew Heath, & John Douglass, and being sworn say that they find forty shillings.

"Thomas Estill, being Charged with a Breach of the Act of Assembly of this Commonwealth entitled 'an act for the punishment of Certain Offences,' who being called upon come into Court and pleads Not Guilty; Whereupon, a Jury being sworn, to wit: James Swolevan, James Wall, Charles Bruce, James Campbell, William Marshall, Andrew Heath, John Crow, Joseph Becket, Zadock Wright, Joseph Beeler, Edward Cook, and John Douglass, do say, they find for the Commonwealth Twenty Pounds Current Money.

"Philip Tabor, charged with being guilty of a Breach of an act of Assembly of this Commonwealth, intitled 'an act for the punishment of certain Offences,' being Called comes into Court and Pleads Not Guilty; Whereupon come a Jury, to wit: James Swolevan, James Wall, Charles Bruce, James Campbell, William Marshall, Andrew Heath, John Crow, Joseph Becket, Zadock Wright, Joseph Beeler, Edward Cook, & John Douglass, who upon their Oaths do say the said Philip Tabor is Not Guilty.

"Upon the Petition of Adam Wickerman, setting forth that he is desirous of Building a Water Mill on Mingo Creek about three quarters of a Mile from the mouth, and that he owns all the Lands that will be overflowed by the building of the said Mill: It is therefore considered by the Court that the said Adam Wickerham have leave to build and compleat a Mill at the place aforesaid.

this Court do draw on the Treasurer of this Commonwealth for the payment of the same.[1]

"A letter from General Hand addressed to Col. Campbell requesting that Capt. Alexander McKee's Parole given to the Committee of West Augusta be given up to him the said General Hand, in order to enable him to put Capt. McKee on a New Parole, as he finds it necessary to remove said Alexander McKee. Ordered that the said Parole be given up to General Hand and that he deposit a Copy of the New Parole to be taken from the said Captain McKee in Lieu thereof, certified by the said General Hand."

The records of the next regular term begin as follows:

"The Court met according to Court in Course at the house of Mr. Andrew Heath Octbr 27th, 1777.

"Present John Campbell, Isaac Cox, Joshua Wright, Richard Yeates, Gentlemen, Justices.

"Ordered that the Court be adjourned to the new Court-House.

"JOHN CAMPBELL."

"The Court met at the Court House pursuant to adjournment.

"Present John Campbell, Isaac Cox, Richard Yeates, Joshua Wright, Benj. Kirkindall, Andrew Swearingen, Samuel Newell, Gentlemen, Justices."

On the next day it was

"Ordered, that the Inhabitants of this County have leave to Inoculate for the Small Pox, at their own houses or such other convenient places as they may think proper."

On Oct. 30, 1777, the following order was made:

"Ordered, that Isaac Cox, Oliver Miller and Benjamin Keykendal, Gent., or any two of them, be appointed to contract with a proper person or persons to build a sufficient Stone Chimney in the Court house and Goal, to be carried up in the middle of the building, with three fire places, one in each room of the Goal, and one in the part where the Court is held; and to have the Court Room chunked and plastered; also a Good loft of Clapboards, with a window in each Glebe (gable), and four pains of Glass of ten-Inches by eight, and the Goal rooms to be plastered."

The next regular term was held Dec. 22, 1777, when Maybury Evans was sworn as lieutenant of the militia of the county (county lieutenant), John Crow as captain, and Patrick Lafferty as ensign. Earmarks were allowed and ordered to be recorded for John Crow, Jacob Shillings, Richard Yeates, Oliver Miller, Maybury Evans, Richard Evans, William Anderson, and Michael Taggert.

"On the Petition of Andrew Heath &c, Ordered, that Robert Henderson, Zadock Wright, John Robertson, John Crow, Thomas Applegate and Andrew Dye, view a road the nearest and best way from Pittsburgh to Andrew Heaths ferry on the Monongahela River, and from thence to Beckets Fort.

"Upon the Motion of Andrew Heath, ordered that he have leave to keep a ferry at his house across the Monongahela River.

"Ordered, that the above rates commence the fifteenth day of January next, and not before.

"Ordered, that this court be adjourned to-morrow morning at 7 o'clock.

"WILLIAM GOE."

On the 24th of December, 1777, the following orders were made:

"Ordered, that the recommendation for Militia Officers of the 5th & 6th November last, by the justices of this County, be confirmed as the Opinion of this Court, and they do hereby confirm the proceedings of the said Justices respecting the same, as the distressed situation of this County demanded the particular attention of the said Justices at that time.

"Ordered, that Gabriel Cox be recommended to his Excellency the Governor as a proper person to serve as Major of this County, in the stead of Henry Taylor who has resigned his Commission.

"Upon the Motion of William Harrison, Gent., Ordered that the Clerk issues a summons to call John Stephenson, Thomas Gist, Joseph Beeler and Edmund Rice before the Court, to testify and the truth say, what they know respecting the marriage of Catherine Harrison with Isaac Mason, on the part of the said Catherine."[3]

No term of court seems now to have been held until March 23, 1778, probably on account of the insufficiency of the building used to protect the court and suitors from the inclemency of the 1778. weather. Even at that date, only the justices residing within convenient distance (Isaac Cox, Joshua Wright, Thomas Freeman, and Benjamin Frye) were present when court opened, although Oliver Miller, William Crawford, and John Stephenson afterward appeared.

There was quite an amount of ordinary business (granting letters testamentary and of administration, orders in civil causes) transacted, and Thomas Prather, Levingston Thomas, and Nicholas Christ were sworn as lieutenants of the militia, Luke Decker and John Johnston as ensigns.

On the next day, March 24th, twelve justices occupied the bench,—John Campbell, Isaac Cox, Richard Yeates, Joshua Wright, William Crawford, Oliver Miller, Zachariah Connell, John De Camp, Benjamin Frye, Thomas Freeman, George Vallandigham, and William Goe.

[1] Beside the foregoing, orders were subsequently made for the relief of the families of other Revolutionary soldiers from Yohogania, some of them as follows: Richard James, —— Knox, Thomas Douthard, Abraham Ritchie, William Richie, Robert Crawford, —— Stewart, William Lindsey, Ezekiel Lindsey, Thomas Dunn, Peter McCorkey, John Depugh, Jeremiah McCarty, William Nau, James Behan, Richard Wade, David Smith, Richard Jones, George Frederick Kiper, John Evans, James Shirley, Charles Churchill, Matthew Burns, John Overlin, Providence Blackstone, William Shaw, Daniel McKay, Greenberry Shous, Matthew Hindman, Jonathan Davis, Nicholas Hagerty, Thomas Green.

[2] Doubtless this "Goal formerly built for this district" was the Jail on the Wm. Gabby farm, west of Washington, and about a mile from that place.

[3] See the record of this matter made April 28, 1778, post., p. 217.

"James McGoldrick, being charged with pulling down and demolishing a Block-house erected by Orders of General Hand for the preservation of the Inhabitants of Pittsburgh, and the said James being brought into Court confesses the charge. Ordered that the said James be held in One hundred pounds, with two securities of fifty pounds each for the appearance of the said James before the next Grand Jury Court, otherwise to remain in Custody of the Sheriff.

* * * * * * * * *

"View of a road from the Court-house to Pittsburgh, returned by Zadock Wright and Robert Henderson, viewers; passing by Zadock Wright's fields on Peters Creek, thence along the dividing Ridge passing Widow Lapsley's, thence along the Old Road to Stewart's, thence along the old road to Jacob Bousman's. Ordered to be Confirmed.

"Ordered, that Zadock Wright be appointed Overseer of the Road from the Court-House to Martha Lapsley's; Robert Henderson, Overseer of the Road from Martha Lapsley's to Jacob Judy's; and Sebastian Frederick, Overseer of the Road from Jacob Bousman's; and that the Tythable Inhabitants within three miles on each side of said Road work on and keep it in repair, together with the Inhabitants of the town of Pittsburgh.

"John Whitaker, a Minister of the Gospel, came into Court and took the Oath of Allegiance and fidelity as directed by an act of General Assembly, entitled an Act to Oblige the free male Inhabitants of this State, above a certain Age, to give Assurance of Allegiance to the same and for other purposes."

On March 25, 1778, the record shows a large business in the militia line. John Stevens and Isaac Cox were recommended as proper persons to serve as colonels of militia. Joseph Beelor, the old Westmoreland County commissioner doubtless, and George Vallandigham, of the first board of Washington County commissioners, were recommended as majors.

"William Christy came into Court, being summoned as Garnishee in behalf of John Campbell and Joseph Simon against George Croghan; being sworn, saith that he hath two pair of Geers, one old ox, one old spade, one pitch fork, one small box of iron and an old Lanthorn, and no more, of the Estate of said George in his hands."

Then John Stephenson and Isaac Cox produced their commissions from the Governor and were sworn as colonels of the militia; Gabriel Cox, as a major; George Vallandigham, as a lieutenant-colonel; Charles Reed, as lieutenant; David Lefergee, as ensign; Edmund Baxter, as captain.

"Upon the Petition of Samuel Cook, setting forth that he is desirous of building a Water Mill on Brushy Run, a Branch of Chirtees Creek,[1] and praying for an Order for the Condemnation of one acre of Land on the opposite side of said Run to said Cook's Land: Ordered, that the Sheriff summon a Jury of Twelve Freeholders of the Vicinage, to meet on the said Land petitioned for and they being first sworn shall diligently view the said Land and Lands adjacent thereto on both sides of the Run, together with the Timber and other conveniences thereon, with the true value of the Acre, and of the damages done to the party holding the same, and report the same to the next court under their hands and seals."

The following record would indicate that there was at least one individual within the jurisdiction who may have been favorable to Pennsylvania:

"The Commonwealth v. Jacob Shilling (a criminal) } being charged with a disaffection to the Common Wealth.

"Then came the Defendant, who pleads Not Guilty: where upon came a Jury, to wit: Patrick McElroy, Bazil Brown, Benjamin Venatre, John Custard, James Ellison, Pierce Noland, William Marshall, Senr., William Marshall, Junr., John Munn, John Greathouse, Robert Henderson & John Morrison, who say that the Prisoner is Not Guilty."

Charles Bilderback produced a commission as ensign of the militia, and was sworn; Isaac Pearce, as captain; George Redman, as lieutenant; Elijah Pearce, as lieutenant; and Richard Waller, as lieutenant.

A license to keep an ordinary was granted to Thomas Cook, "at his dwelling-house;" to Jacob Bausman, "at his dwelling-house opposite the town of Pittsburgh;" to John Munn,[2] at his dwelling-house; to William Christy, "at his dwelling-house in the town of Pittsburgh." The court adjourned to meet the next morning at seven o'clock.

"March 26, 1778, the court met according to adjournment.

[1] White Eyes, whose Indian name was Koquaitahghaitah (i.e., the man who keeps open the correspondence between his own and other nations), was chief of the Turtle tribe of the Delawares, and a great friend to the Americans, and especially to Col. Geo. Morgan (called Taimenend by the Indians), during the Revolution. When the British had prevailed upon almost all the Western Indians to become their allies, White Eyes, with a band of adherents, remained faithful, and joining Col. McIntosh's expedition in 1778, with a colonel's commission, he died that year. Accounts commonly received state that he died then at Ft. Laurens of smallpox; but a manuscript letter from Col. Morgan to a member of Congress, dated May 12, 1784, would indicate that he had been killed by treachery. A son, George White Eyes, thirteen years of age, was then in the care of Col. Morgan, at Princeton, of which son the letter states: "Having now entered Virgil and begun Greek, and being the best scholar in his class, he will be prepared to enter College next Fall." "His father was treacherously put to death at the moment of his greatest exertions to save the United States, in whose service he held the commission of a Colonel." "I have carefully concealed and shall continue to conceal from young White Eyes the Manner of his Father's death, which I have never mentioned to any one but Mr. Thompson [the Secretary] & two or three Members of Congress." Col. White Eyes was a man of much property, as the letter referred to shows.

There was no "Court in Course." This was the last time a court of justice was held under the Virginia jurisdiction within the limits of old Washington County. At this term, as well as at other preceding terms, much more business was done than the extracts made would indicate, for in the last day's proceedings the following names appear:

Richard McMahon, James Bruce, Arnold Evins, Abington George Colvin, deceased, John Miller, J J, Hugh Brady, Sampson Beaver, David Steel, James McMullin, Garsham Hull, John Breckenridge, William May, Mordecai Richards and Stephen Richards (sons of Stephen Richards, deceased), Agnes Stilk, Joseph Parkison, Elizabeth Deckert, Sarah Jacobs, Mary Boyd, Catharine Develin, Ann Walker, David Richie, John Wall, George Brown, Jacob Knight, Tobias Wood, Moses Holladay, Michael Burk, John Brotoman, William Long, Morris Hake, James Dornin, Thomas Timons, Joseph McKinnen, John Seamon, Jeremiah Morgan, and Robert Peat.

It was indeed a court of "large and varied" business. Beside the criminal and civil trials by jury, common in our day, it granted letters testamentary and of administration, appointed guardians, qualified militia officers, established roads and ferries, authorized and recorded ear-marks and brands, authorized sale of slaves and servants, granted licenses for ordinaries (or taverns), bound out infant orphans, punished drunkenness and "profane curses," etc., and all this was done after a primitive method of simplified justice.

On Sept. 23, 1780,[1] the General Assembly of Pennsylvania had ratified the Baltimore agreement of July 31, 1779, with the disagreeable condition attached by the Virginia Legislature of June 23, 1780, the result of which was that nothing remained of Yohogania County, Virginia, but a narrow strip on the Ohio River between the mouth of Cross Creek and Mill Creek, which was merged into Ohio County, afterwards forming a part of Brooke County when organized in 1797. Yohogania County, Virginia, then became a lost county, but soon afterwards a new county was born to take its place, Washington County, Pennsylvania.

CIVIL AND LEGAL HISTORY.—(Continued.)

The Erection of Washington County—Appointment of Officers—Early Political Troubles—Division into Townships—Election of Justices—The New State Project.

The Erection of Washington County.—Within sixty days after the Pennsylvania Assembly had finally ratified the Baltimore agreement of Aug. 31, 1779, relating to the boundary line, with the somewhat unpalatable condition attached thereto by Virginia, President Reed, on Nov. 6, 1780, in his message to the new Assembly, then lately convened, wrote as follows:[2]

"The final settlement of the contested boundaries of this State and Virginia induces us to lay before you the propriety and policy of setting off one or more counties so as to introduce law, order, and good government, where they have been long and much wanted. We think it would also conduce much to the defence of the frontiers and safety of the interior country, as the strength of those parts might then be organized & systematically drawn forth in case of necessity."

This necessity for the erection of "one or more counties" out of old Westmoreland must have been apparent to any one looking at the large extent of the latter county, bounded on the east by the Laurel Hills and Chestnut Ridge up from the western terminus of the Maryland line, on the north by the Kiskeminitas, Allegheny, and Ohio Rivers, and on the west and south by the western and southern boundaries of the State. Moreover, the Ohio River to the west of us had become the frontier line, and quarter, though Justice Goe and Miller were able to contribute one dollar, eighty-seven and one-half cents. For a history of the depreciation of the Continental currency, see III. Adams' Writings of Albert Gallatin, 261.

the narrow strip of Virginia forming the Panhandle still left the Pennsylvania settlers west of the Monongahela to form in reality the barrier against Indian encroachment upon the interior parts of the State. The interest of our pioneers, therefore, in the proposed establishment of the civil and military power more conveniently at hand can easily be inferred.

Thomas Scott, Esq., the same who had been arrested and brought before Lord Dunmore at Redstone on Nov. 12, 1774, and had been imprisoned by Dunmore's court at Pittsburgh on May 18, 1775, had written upon the subject of the new county or counties to President Reed on Oct. 8, 1780, though his letter has not been found. It was doubtless this communication which had called forth the passage quoted from the message to the Assembly the following month, for on March 20, 1781, President Reed replied to Mr. Scott, as follows:[1]

"Dear Sir:

"I received your favor of the 8th October last but a few days ago. You will see by our public Message to the House that we have not forgotten the important Point you dwell so much upon. I have also in private Conversation endeavored to impress it on the Minds of the Members, but the Truth is that the People of your own Country are not agreed on it,[2] which with the great Load of Business arising in our great Continental Concerns has I believe kept the House from going into it. Some of the members of the House think there is more probability of gaining military Assistance from the People while laying in one County than after a Division of the County. . . . Since I began this letter I find a Bill has been brought into the House for setting off the County; but I confess I was apprehensive it would not pass this session, until within this Day or two, But I now hope it will. . . ."

Only eight days after the date of this letter, to wit, March 28, 1781, the act erecting a new county was passed. Its provisions were as follows:[3]

"Section I. Whereas the inhabitants of that part of Westmoreland County, which lies west of the Monongahela river, have represented to the Assembly of this State, the great hardships they lie under, from being so remote from the present seat of Judicature and the public offices; for remedy whereof,

"Sect. 2. Be it enacted . . . That all that part of the State of Pennsylvania west of the Monongahela river,[4] and south of the Ohio, beginning at the junction of the said rivers; thence up the Monongahela river aforesaid, to the line run by Mason and Dixon; thence by the said line due west to the end thereof; and from thence the same course to the end of five degrees of west longitude, to be computed from the river Delaware; thence by a meridian line extended north, until the same shall intersect the Ohio river; and thence by the same to the place of beginning; (the said lines from the end of Mason and Dixon's line to the Ohio river, to be understood, as to be hereafter ascertained by Commissioners now appointed or to be appointed for that purpose,) shall be and the same is hereby declared to be, erected into a county, henceforth to be called Washington."

Thus it is seen that Washington County, as originally erected, embraced all the lands lying west of the Monongahela and in the State, thus including the present Greene County and all of Allegheny and Beaver Counties south of the Monongahela and the Ohio.

At this date George Washington had firmly fixed himself in the hearts of the American people, soon to give them the avails of victory; Cornwallis was marching and countermarching through the central portion of North Carolina, to surrender in the fall afterwards to Washington and La Fayette at Yorktown. What name then the more proper for the new county than it received?

It was provided by Section 3 of the act that the inhabitants of the said county of Washington should thereafter have and enjoy all the jurisdictions, powers, rights, liberties, and privileges whatsoever which the inhabitants of any other county enjoyed, "by any charter of privileges, or the laws of the State, or by any other ways and means whatsoever;" and Section 4 provided "that the trustees, or any three of them, hereafter appointed by this act to take assurance of a piece of land, whereon to erect a courthouse and prison, shall, on or before the first day of July next ensuing, divide the said county into Townships or Districts."

Provision was made in Section 5 for the election of inspectors by the electors in the several townships, and that the inhabitants of the county, qualified as electors, "shall (until otherwise ordered by the House of Assembly) meet at the house of David Hoge, at the place called Catfishes Camp, in the aforesaid county, at the same time that the inhabitants of the other Counties shall meet for a like purpose, and then and there elect two representatives to serve them in Assembly, one councilor, two fit persons for sheriffs, two fit persons for coroners, and three commissioners. . . ." Section 6 extended the jurisdiction of the justices of the Supreme Court to the said county, with power from time to time "to deliver the goal of the said county of capital and other offenders, in like manner as they are authorized to do in the other counties of this State."

"Sect. 7. And be it further enacted &c., That the freeholders of each Township or District, in the County aforesaid, are hereby authorized and required, to meet on the fifteenth day of July next, at some proper and convenient place, and elect two fit persons for Justices of the Peace for each Township."

The oaths for the inspectors and judges were prescribed in Section 8, and it was further enacted by

"Sect. 9. . . . That when the persons elected for justices of the Peace, as aforesaid, or shall be appointed by the President and Council, have taken the oaths or affirmations required by the Laws of this Commonwealth, and received their commissions as directed in the Constitution of this State, the said Justices or any three of them, shall and may hold Courts of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace and Goal Delivery, and County Courts for holding of Pleas; . . . which said Courts shall sit and be held for the said County of Washington, on the Tuesdays next preceding the Westmoreland County Courts, in every of the months of January, April, July, and October, at the house of David Hoge aforesaid, in the said County of Washington, until a Court-house shall be built; and when the same is built and erected in the county aforesaid, the said several courts shall then be holden and kept at the said Court-house on the days before mentioned.

[2] Referring no doubt to opposition east of the Monongahela, where Mr. Scott still resided. In 1782, when Fayette County was proposed to be erected, there was serious opposition expressed; see letter of Christopher Hays to President Moore, IX. Penn. Archives, 637.

[4] In 1791, Gen. Ephraim Douglass, the prothonotary of Fayette County, wrote to Governor Mifflin: ". . . The Act for erecting the county of Washington limits that county by the west side of the Monongahela river; and this county is limited—beginning at Monongahela river where Mason and Dixon's line crosses the same; thence down the river to the mouth of Speer's run, &c. Now, by these two acts, it would appear that the river still belonged to Westmoreland county, and that neither of the other counties have any jurisdiction on it."—Monongahela of Old, 165. The difficulty suggested here as to the jurisdiction of the courts of either Washington or Fayette Counties over the Monongahela River does not seem of much moment, but, so far as now known, it has not yet arisen.

"SECT. 10. . . . That it shall and may be lawful to and for James Edgar, Hugh Scott, Van Swearingen, Daniel Leet and John Armstrong, or any three of them, to take up or purchase, and to take assurance to them and their heirs, of a piece of land situated in some convenient place in the said County, in trust and for the use of the inhabitants of the said County, and thereupon to erect and build a Court-house and Prison, sufficient to accommodate the public service of the said County."

Section 11 made provision for the raising by county rates and levies the money necessary in the opinion of the trustees for the purchase of the land and the erection of the public buildings, the amount being limited by Section 12 to the sum of one thousand pounds.

Actions pending in Westmoreland County against persons living in the bounds of Washington County were authorized by Section 13 to be proceeded in to final judgment, to be enforced by process from the courts of the old county.

Sections 14, 15, and 16 appointed Henry Taylor collector of excise in Washington County, and made provisions for his duties, powers, fees, and perquisites as such collector.

Until a sheriff and a coroner should be chosen in Washington County, it was provided by Section 17 that the sheriff and coroner of Westmoreland County should officiate, while the 18th and last section of this organic act made adequate provision for the official bonds of the sheriff and the county treasurer.

Appointments of Officers. — This act, which brought into existence the civil municipality within whose limits we live, was passed, as stated, on March 28, 1781, which was Wednesday. On Monday, April 2, 1781, there is the following record of the proceedings of the Supreme Executive Council:[1]

"The Council taking into consideration the act of Assembly passed the twenty-eighth instant, entitled 'An Act for erecting part of the county of Westmoreland into a special county,' called by the name of Washington.

"Resolved, That Thomas Scott, Esquire, be appointed and commissioned to be Prothonotary of the said county of Washington.[2]

"Resolved, That James Marshall,[3] Esquire, be appointed and commissioned to be Lieutenant of the county of Washington; and that John Cannon[4] and Daniel Leet be appointed and commissioned to be sub-lieutenants of the said county."[5]

[2] Maj.-Gen. Arthur St. Clair, in a letter to the Supreme Executive Council, dated Philadelphia, March 26, 1781 (in IX. Penn. Archives, 36), strongly recommended Michael Huffnagle, "a young gentleman now in the practice of the law in Westmoreland," for the appointment of prothonotary for the proposed new county, the bill for which "will probably pass into a law." The special qualifications of his candidate were fully exhibited by the influential general, but Thomas Scott received the appointment unsought for, so far as known.

Mr. Scott is already well known to us. Of all the early men of our county he was at least the peer of the best of them. He continued prothonotary till March 28, 1789, when, having been elected to the First Congress under the Constitution of 1787, he was succeeded by his son, Alexander Scott. (See XI. Penn. Archives, 568; XVI. Col. Records, 40). On Nov. 21, 1786 (XV. Col. Records, 120), he was commissioned a justice (though still prothonotary), and the writer has his notes of a charge to a grand jury. The following is an obituary notice taken from the Western Telegraphe of March 6, 1796:

"In the night of Wednesday last, March 2, 1796, a few days after he had completed his fifty seventh year, died Thomas Scott. He was born in Chester County, but from a child lived in Lancaster County till the year 1770, when he removed with his family and settled on Dunlap's Creek, near the Monongahela. When Westmoreland County was erected in 1773, he was appointed a justice of the peace from that county. In this capacity he was a warm and able supporter of the Pennsylvania jurisdiction, and drew on himself the particular resentment of the partisans of Virginia. When this contest sunk in the great cause of the Revolution, he was elected a member of the first Pennsylvania Assembly under the republican government, and in the year following he was elected a member of the Supreme Council. After his period of appointment in the Council expired, and this county of Washington was erected in 1781, the office of clerk of the courts here was given to him. This occasioned the removal of his residence to this town In 1787 he was chosen a member of the State Convention for ratifying the Constitution of the United States, and in 1788 a member of the First Congress under this Constitution. As the change of the Constitution of Pennsylvania occasioned a new appointment of State officers in 1791, he declined being considered as a candidate for a seat in the Second Congress, with a view to retain his office of clerk of the courts of this county. But the Governor thought proper to supersede him. The chagrin arising from this appointment preyed upon his mind. At the election a few weeks after he was chosen a member of Assembly from this county, and in 1792 a member of the Third Congress.

"With but such opportunities for the study of the law as his residence in Philadelphia afforded him, and unaided by a liberal or professional education, he was early admitted to the bar in the western counties, and was a successful advocate. His arguments were natural and judicious, his language nervous, and his elocution remarkably emphatic.

"His person was manly and respectable, his mental faculties strong and decisive, his manners kind and sociable, and with an extent of knowledge, and with that correctness of mind, which hardly anything but education can give, he would have been every way a great man.

"He was liberal and did not study economy. Before he was appointed clerk of the courts here his estate and his practice at the bar afforded him a competency. The appointment to that office offered him a permanent prospect of competence for life. From his early residence in this country, and from his advantages of mind and station, he might have accumulated great wealth, but he did not, and he died but in moderate circumstances. He has left behind him a widow and eleven children, of whom three are sons and eight are daughters. One of his sons and three of his daughters are married. The rest are in their mother's family."

These sons were Arthur, Alexander, and Thomas. Of their descendants nothing has been learned. Of the eight daughters, Agnes first married Samuel McKinley and became the grandmother of Alex. McKinley, the jeweler, of Washington, and her second husband was Henry Woods; Elizabeth married Alex. Cunningham (from Derry, Ireland), and became the mother of John Cunningham, M.D., of Wooster, Ohio, and of the late Samuel Cunningham, deceased, of East Maiden Street, Washington; Margaret married David Cook; Mary married Joseph Pentecost, the lawyer, of Washington; Jean married David Hoge (brother of John and William), appointed by President Adams register of the United States Land-Office, Steubenville, Ohio, removed by President Jackson; Sarah married Thomas Thomson; Mabel married Sampson S. King, lawyer, capt. 22d Inf., U.S.A., wounded at Chippewa, promoted major, died at Gettysburg; and Rebecca married Shephard Conwell. Thomas Scott's will, in his own hand, is filed in the register's office, and is recorded in Book I., p. 283.

[3] Almost always so printed, but incorrectly. He never wrote his name other than Marshel. For sketches of these officers see subsequent pages.

[4] Who always wrote his name Canon.

[5] The military system then in force was created by act of March 17, 1777. In each county, as the representative of the executive, there was a lieutenant and sub-lieutenants, not exceeding five in number. The

It appears that Col. Marshel was in Philadelphia when the act creating the county was passed,[1] for on April 4, 1781, the records of the Council say:[2]

"James Marshall, Esquire, appointed by the Honorable House of Assembly to be Register for the Probate of Wills and granting letters of administration, and Recorder of Deeds for the County of Washington, and by this Board, to be Lieutenant of the said county, attended in Council, and took the several oaths necessary to qualify him for the said offices respectively."

Early Political Troubles.—The nursing of the new county, thus given a corporate existence, and supplied with the officers necessary for the keeping of its records, and for the organization of its military power, now proceeded slowly under many and somewhat serious difficulties. That these embarrassments may be realized the better by the reader, a chronological order will still be followed, as the organization of the municipality is proceeded in to a legal entity, with a complete establishment of its courts and justices for the administration of the law, and at the same time, with the notice of the township divisions, elections, organizations of the courts, etc., will be given original writings illustrating every-day events of great public importance, the character of the prominent actors therein, themselves the chroniclers, as well as the troubled condition of the times. The constant terror from Indian incursions, actual and threatened; the continued existence of the Virginia usurpation, and the jealousy between the Pennsylvanians and the Virginians; the inability of the Pennsylvania government to wield power which alone can give protection; the resurrection and reagitation of "The New State Project," thought in such circumstances to afford a prospect for better security and permanence; and, as might be expected, the rivalry for the possession of offices, the evidence of power and position and the opportunities for wealth and advancement, even at that day strong and controlling,—all these will be unfolded as well as it is now possible. But let the reader be cautioned again not to judge of any man's real character, in this period of angry strife, from what is said of him by an opponent. The names of no unworthy men will here be found, though some of them are now and then denominated "Raskels," "Banditti," "Mobs," etc.

And let it be remembered (it is now written once for all) that, starting from the spring of 1774, when Cresap stopped with his party, one of them wounded, at "Catfish Camp," at the beginning of Dunmore's war, until 1795, when Wayne's treaty gave final peace to the borders,—in all a period of twenty-one years,—there was not a day when fear did not find a place at the fireside of the settler.

On April 20, 1781, the Supreme Executive Council[3]

"Ordered, That Col. James Marshall,[4] Lieutenant of the county of Washington, be authorized and directed to call out forty men of the militia of that county; or if the militia shall not be organized sufficient for that purpose, to raise the said number of men, for the purpose of escorting and guarding the Commissioners appointed to run the Line between this state and Virginia, during the time they shall be on that service; and that he be authorized to call on the commanding officer at Fort Pitt for ammunition for that purpose."

The running of the boundary line was delayed, however, as has appeared in a former chapter, and on June 5, 1781, Col. Marshel wrote to President Reed as follows:[5]

"Since my arrival in this County, I have been making what progress I Can in organizing the Militia, altho as yet, Deprived of the Assistance of the Sub-Lieutenants by the Indefatigable Oppo-ition of a Certain Mr. Penticost [Dorsey Pentecost] and a few of his adherents, the old enemies of this government, who Immediately on my arrival got together at their Court-house, in what they call Yohogania County, which is wholly involved in this and Westmoreland Counties, and to which the Government of Virginia has Sent no Orders for some Considerable time past. Notwithstanding, they have resolved to go on with the jurisdiction of Virginia, both Civil and Military until the line is Actually run. Whereupon the said Penticost swore into an Old Commission of County Lieutenant that he pretended to have by him for a long time, and thereupon assumed the Command of the Militia. Mr. Cannon [John Canon] (a Civil Officer under the government of Virginia,) one of our Sub-Lieutenants, publickly declares that government have Infringed upon the Rights of the people in appointing officers for them before they were represented, and instead of assisting me in Organizing the Militia, is using all his Influence to prevent it. Mr. Lite [Leet] the other Sub-Lieutenant refuses doing anything until the artists arrive on the spot, which leaves me without assistance, and must Consequently delay the formation of the Militia. However, I expect in a short time to have the business Compleated, and that the artists will not fail in being on the line as soon as possible, which might prove fatal to the Interests of the State in this Quarter; for altho the people at large are well affected to this government, the junto aforesaid are Indefatigable, and a failure on the part of the artists would afford them great Opportunity of doeing mischief; in a word Mr. Penticost and Mr. Cannon are ringleaders of Sedition, and are doeing every thing in their power to revive the jurisdiction of Virginia, in order to keep this Country in Confusion, and there not being a Court of Justice in this County, these disturbers of the peace go unpunished; two or three words of an Order from your Excellency would put the affairs of this Country into a better situation, and at the same time Oblige a whole County.

"The Indians have not done any damage on the frontiers of this County for some time past, altho they never had a better Opportunity, and were it not for Col. Broadhead's late Expedition and the Expectation of General Clark being in their Country this Summer, I am persuaded they would have laid a Considerable part of our Country waste by this time; let me hope then, that as soon as there may be a Necessity, you will Enable us to Call out a number of our Militia for the de-power given was exercised by the lieutenant, or in his absence by two or more of the sub-lieutenants. By warrants to the constables lists were obtained of all male inhabitants between eighteen and fifty-three, excepting delegates in Congress, members of the Council, judges of Supreme Court, masters and faculties of colleges, and the clergy; and within five days the lieutenants or sub-lieutenants divided the county into districts, each district to contain not less than 440 nor more than 680 privates, divided into eight classes, which were numbered. Each district had its field-officers, elected, being a colonel, a lieutenant-colonel, and a major, and each class or company its captain, two lieutenants, and ensign. The men were called (or drafted) into service by classes to serve a tour of two months, one class at a time, to be relieved by the next. Absentees paid fines, which reimbursed the State for bounties paid to substitutes. A complete system of rules and regulations was provided.

fence of the Frontiers, and that we may be supplied with ammunition as soon as possible.

"I have the Honour to be with Very great Respect and Esteem your Excellency's Most Obedient and very Humble servant.[1]

On June 27, 1781, Col. Marshel again addressed a communication to President Reed,[2] informing him of new developments since his letter of the 5th:

"SIR:

"Since I had the honour of Addressing your Excellency last, the Old Enemies of this government and their adherents have exerted themselves to the Utmost to prevent this County being organized. On the 5th Inst. a Council of the Militia Officers of Youghagena County was held at their Court-house and in Consequence of sd Council, the fifth part of the Militia of sd County was drafted for General Clark's Expedition, but the people did not Conceive they were Under the Jurisdiction of Virginia, therefore they denied their Authority, and almost Universally Refused doing duty under any government whatever until the line between the States is actually run.

"Upon finding the Commissioners did not arrive by the time appointed to run the line, I did not know well what part to act, fearing the Consequence of Involving the good Subjects of this State in a Civil War with Col. Penticost's Banditti, and a new Government party that Exists here, and of Exposing our frontier Settlements to the greatest danger from the Indians, (who no doubt well know our unhappy Situation). I thought it most Advisable to postpone Organizing the Militia until the Commissioners arrive on the spot. Let me hope then that your Excellency will forward the Commissioners with all possible Dispatch, as it is Clearly Impossible to do anything to purpose in this County until their arrival. The Expiration of the several periods Given us to expect them, discourages our best friends, and gives the aforementioned party great Opportunity of keeping up the Confusion, which they hope will issue in driving the whole people into their favorite scheme of New Government. Some of those Gentlemen formerly Elected members of Virginia Assembly, on this side the Mountains, are lately gone down on no other business than

[1] In this letter are found four of the old worthies: James Marshel, born Feb. 20, 1753, in north of Ireland, obtained rights to about fifteen hundred acres in what is now Cross Creek township, between 1776 and 1778. From the fact that two cousins, John and Robert, came west near to him from that part of Lancaster now Dauphin, it is thought he too had come thence. On the erection of Washington County, John became an influential justice; Robert is said to have been in Williamson's expedition, for which he expressed his regret all his life. In 1779, when Rev. Joseph Smith was called by the Presbyterian congregations of Buffalo and Cross Creek (Adam and Andrew Poe signing), Col. Marshel, to have Rev. Smith brought out, gave two hundred acres of his land to Capt. Joseph Reed, the great-grandfather of J. M. K. Reed, Esq., and his brother, John C. Reed, who now occupy it. Marshel became an elder in the Buffalo Church, but it is said that in his later days he was not distinguished for his piety. On Nov. 3, 1784, he resigned his offices of county lieutenant, register, and recorder, and succeeded Van Swearingen as sheriff, and on Jan. 17, 1789, was himself succeeded by Col. David Williamson. He was again recorder and register from 1791 to 1795. With David Bradford and Rev. David Phillips, he represented Westmoreland County at the Pittsburgh meeting in September, 1791, "to take into consideration" the excise law, and afterwards took a prominent part in the Whiskey Insurrection. In July, 1794, he was present with Bradford when the captured mail was opened at Canonsburg, and two days afterward, with Bradford and others, signed the call for the militia to rendezvous at Braddock's Fields. In the Whiskey Insurrection he seemed to be wholly in the control of Bradford, following, though unwillingly, when the latter led. In 1795 or '96 he sold his lands in Westmoreland County and removed to Wellsburg, W. Va., where he resided till his death, March 17, 1829. He left surviving a son, John, born about 1783; studied law with Parker Campbell, admitted in 1807, went into mercantile business; commissioned sheriff in 1835, and in 1836 was made cashier of the Franklin Bank of Washington, so remained till a year or so before his death in 1863. Col. Marshel also left a son Robert, who settled in Ohio, a daughter who married William McCluney, and two other daughters, who died unmarried. John Marshel, cashier, left a daughter Rachel, wife of Dr. Lafferty, Brownsville; another daughter, wife of Dr. Cowen; Rebecca, widow of the late Dr. M. H. Clark, Washington; and Jane, wife of S. A. Clarke, bookseller, Pittsburgh.

Dorsey Pentecost: see note to later page.

John Canon.—Though Findley, "Whiskey Insurrection," 95, says, writing in 1794, that Canon was from Chester County, doubted; for there is some evidence that he came to this county from Virginia. He is first found in what afterward became Washington County in February, 1774, when he and Henry Taylor were appointed by the Westmoreland County Court as road-viewers. Already well known to us as a justice of the Augusta County and Yohogania County Courts, it must be inferred that he was quite a partisan of the Virginia jurisdiction. The office of sub-lieutenant of the militia, from which he derived his title, was abolished in 1783, but on Oct. 6, 1784, he was commissioned a justice of the peace and of the courts, and recommissioned Aug. 24, 1790, holding that office till his death. He had acquired Virginia rights to the several tracts afterwards surveyed by Pennsylvania as Abington, Mount Airy, and Canon Hill, containing nearly twelve hundred acres; on parts of the two former he laid out Canonsburg; the first lot sold March 15, 1787, about which time he with others brought about the establishment of a High School in Canonsburg, which in 1791 was organized as an academy, incorporated in 1794, with himself as one of the trustees. He died in 1799, just before the academy he had aided to found became Jefferson College. To but a slight extent involved in the Whiskey Insurrection, on July 26, 1794, he was present, with Bradford, Marshel, and others, at the opening of the captured mail at Canonsburg, and also signed the call for the Braddock's Field rendezvous. Col. Canon left a widow, Jeannette; sons, John, Samuel, William, Joshua; daughters, Jean, Anne, Margaret. Of these survivors little is known. Joshua settled at Burgetstown; his children, Abigail, wife of John Dougherty, one of whose daughters is wife of M. R. Allen; Ellen, wife of a Mr. McCue; Jane, wife of Josiah Scott, Florence; Margaret, wife of John Fulton, Burgetstown; Martha never married; Julia, wife of M. M. Brockman, Burgetstown; John, married Asenath Boyd, of West Middletown, removed to California, where he lives. Jean, daughter of Col. Canon, married Rev. Robert Patterson, son of Rev. Joseph Patterson, in August, 1801. A son of this union is Mr. Robert Patterson, of the Presbyterian Banner, of Pittsburgh, whose wife is Eliza Acheson Baird, a daughter of Hon. Thomas H. Baird. A writer in the Presbyterian Magazine, February, 1857, says, "Col. Canon, the founder of Canonsburg, was an active, intelligent, and gentlemanly man. He died when but little past the meridian of life, leaving a widow and several children. Mrs. Canon was regarded as the lady of the place, and deservedly; for she was eminently pious, friendly, and generous. Her house was the seat of hospitality, the favorite resort of Christian ministers and serious students."

Daniel Leet.—Isaac Leet, the father of Daniel, died in Washington County in 1802, and is buried, as is also his widow, in the burial-place on the farm of S. K. Weirich. Daniel was born in New Jersey, Nov. 6, 1748; was by profession a surveyor, and, as the reader will recollect, produced his commission as such from the College of William and Mary, Va., to the Augusta County Court on April 17, 1776, and was sworn into office as a deputy under Col. William Crawford. As such deputy he made many of the Virginia surveys in Washington County in 1780. He probably first came to this country in 1773, for on September 23d of that year Washington writes to Crawford, "By Mr. Leet I informed you of the unhappy cause which prevented my going out this fall."—Washington-Crawford Letters, 28. He had been previously employed by Washington to survey lands for him in Virginia. In 1778 he was with the militia as adjutant, under Gen. McIntosh, at Fort Laurens. During the Revolution he also served with the Virginia line as quartermaster and paymaster. In 1782 he was brigade-major in the unfortunate expedition, under Col. Crawford's command, against the Sandusky Indians, in which his brave superior was tortured to death at the stake. On this occasion, after Maj. Brinton was wounded, Maj. Leet commanded a division, and exhibited much bravery and vigilance. (See Butterfield's Crawford's Expedition, 77, 124, 207, 219, 296.) He is appointed in the act erecting the county one of the trustees to divide the county into townships, and to purchase ground for the public buildings; and besides his office as sub-lieutenant, he was one of the first justices commissioned for the courts of the county. His homestead was what is now known as the Shields' tract a few miles south of Washington, where his only child, Eliza, was born. She married David Shields, who resided in Washington from 1804 to 1823, when he removed to the Sewickly Bottoms, Allegheny County. Of this union there were nine children, of whom but three married. Two of these three are dead, leaving descendants; the other, the widow of John K. Wilson, Esq., and mother of D. S. Wilson, Esq., of the Washington bar, still lives. In 1829, Daniel Leet removed from Washington County to the home of his daughter, Mrs. Shields, and there died June 18, 1830

to Endeavor delaying the line, in order to forward their business of new Government, and a Committee has been formed in this County for some time who go well nigh assuming the government of the County, which appears preparatory to something more Compulsive.

"Let me again urge the Necessity of the Commissioners being on the line as soon as possible from this one Consideration, that a failure on their part will Expose the friends of this government to the Contempt and Malice of their enemies. There is at this time upwards of two thousand five hundred Effective men in this County, but if we remain much longer in our present Situation, we must unavoidably be reduced, either by Internal or External Enemies, and perhaps by both. On the 17th Inst., a party of about twenty Indians attacked the frontier Inhabitants, wounded one man, and took off a whole family prisoners, which has occasioned great part of the frontiers to be evacuated."

The references in the foregoing letter to Gen. George Rogers Clarke's expedition of 1781, against the British and Indians at Detroit, to obtain men for which the Virginia militia officers for Yohogania County instituted a draft and enforced it with great severity in Monongahela valley, as well as to the "New State Project" now revived, and which caused no little concern at the State capital, will hereafter be more fully explained.

On July 23, 1781, President Reed replied to the two letters from Col. Marshel, as follows:[1]

"Sir:

"I have received two Letters from you, one of the 5th & the other of 27th June, which I have laid before the Council. We are sorry to hear of the Obstructions which have been thrown in your Way by ill designing People, who keep up unhappy Contests for sinister Purposes. We hope the time will soon come when these Machinations will be at an End, as we are resolved as soon as the Line is run, to exert the Power of legal & coercive Authority over all who shall presume to disturb the publick Tranquility & distress the County by their mal Practices." [The president then proceeded to explain the delay in running the boundary line, and the necessity of its early completion; the agreement with Virginia to mark a temporary boundary, and the appointment of Alexander McClean on the part of Pennsylvania for that purpose; announcing the intention of the Council, as soon as that line was run and reported, to issue a proclamation calling upon the people within this State to conform to its laws and government, as quoted from this letter in our Boundary controversy, and concluding:] "You and the other Friends of this State may depend upon a firm and vigorous Support in your Attachment to it, & that we shall most heartily concur in every Measure to Establish Peace, Good Order, & Government as soon as possible."

Dorsey Pentecost seems to have received information of the subject matter of Col. Marshel's two letters to President Reed, of the 5th and 27th of June, for on July 27, 1781, he addressed to the latter the following letter:[2]

"Sir:

"I am now in General Clarke's Camp, about three miles below Fort Pitt, and about to leave this Country on the Expedition under that Gentleman's Command, & from some recent Transactions that have happened here, & being apprised of some unwarrantable Representations that have, and are about to be made to your Excellency in Council, respecting the Common Welfare of this country, & in which my Life, Property, & Consequently my Character is Concerned, & not being able (owing to my immediate service in the Public) to attend so soon as I would wish at Philadelphia, have taken the Liberty to trouble your Excellency with the following plain State of Facts.

"This country (I mean West of the Monongahela River) has ever been considered by a majority of its Inhabitants to be within the State of Virginia; it has been under that Jurisdiction without Controversy since the year 1774, but on the Publication of the Agreement made between the Commissioners for the two States, Virginia and Pennsylvania, at Baltimore, 1779, and a Report immediately following that the Line should be run without Procrastination in Consequence thereof; this produced a Relaxation amongst the Officers (particularly in the Military Line), knowing that such an Agreement would include the Whole, or nearly so, of Yohogania County, and by that means the whole Country was thrown into perfect Anarchy & Confusion. The Indians through the Course of the last Summer were exceedingly troublesome, & butchered up many of the defenceless Frontiers; myself and some others apprehending early Visits from them this Spring, and knowing the confused Situation of the People, from the Reasons above mentioned, went personally to the Frontier Settlements, & found them in the greatest Dejection of Spirits; they expected nothing but Desolation & all the Cruelty to be feared from an extensive Combination of Savages (this was the latter Part of the Winter). At our Return We advertised a meeting of the Principal People to endeavor to fall on some Plan for the Defence of those helpless Persons (the Frontiers); accordingly a number of Gentlemen met, and We then recommended that every District as they then stood, should choose two men out of each to form a General Committee for that Purpose; that was also accordingly done. We then proceeded to direct (with the acquiescence of the People) to raise by Hire 100 men, to be stationed and employed as aforesaid; this alarmed the Pockets of some Gentlemen (notwithstanding We advised as our Opinion that Government would countenance the measure whenever it should be established, & the men allowed Militia pay); they therefore opposed the measures, published Pieces (or at least a Piece) setting forth the Enormity of the Expence, the Impropriety of the attempt, with many other unwarrantable assertions,—in short, Sir, the Piece was inflammatory, alarming, & decorated with Falsehood.

"This impeded the good Intent of the Committee, but did not quite frustrate their honest endeavors, for the Commanding officers at Fort Pitt not only countenanced but gave every Spur to facilitate so laudable a measure. We hired thirty men, sent them to the Frontiers, and they are there yet.

"About this Time the Spring Session met, and a certain James Marshall (a Person of Yesterday amongst us,) a Frontier Inhabitant, & a member of Committee, went home from one of the meetings, prepared a Petition to the Assembly, went to a few of the Frontier Companies who were in the greatest Distress; he flattered them that he would procure from the Assembly immediate Succor for them; they agreed to the Proposal, and gave him money of Convoy & sent him to Philadelphia. At his return he brought the Act of Assembly creating that part of Westmoreland lying west of Monongalia into a Separate County by the name of Washington & for himself three Commissions, Lieutenant Recorder & Register, for said County; and in that Act of Assembly, on his (Mr. Marshall's) or some of his Friends Representation, a Sett of men were appointed, who all (except Capt. Swearingen & Mr. D. Leet,) are strangers to the Country, being Gentlemen that have but recently come among us.

"While Mr. Marshall was at Philadelphia, Genl. Clark came here with an Intent to carry an Expedition against the Savages, which was principally intended to have been aided by Volunteers from this County. He consulted myself with many others on the most probable plan for Success. Every Effort was tried, but to no effect; the Frontiers were murdered every Day, & the Militia could not be got out. The Field officers of Yohogania County called on me, & requested that I would take the Command of the same, & I endeavored to save it from utter Destruction. I accordingly swore into a Commission for that Purpose, which had been in the County upwards of a year, & which I had neglected to qualify to on account of the apparent Probability there was for a Change of Government.

"Soon after this, Genl. Clark had a meeting of the Principal People to consult on the most Plausible Plan to raise the Militia for his expedition. They after long deliberation, Resolved, that nothing could effect so desirable a Plan, save my Exertions as County Lieut. of Yohogania, and in the most pointed Terms (in an address to me) requested that I would put my Command in Force, and use every Exertion to facilitate the Expedition. The Day following I was furnished with a Demand from Genl. Clark for the Quota of the County. I went into the Business with Resolution, conducted myself with a steady Firmness, and with a great Deal of Fatigue, Trouble, & Perplexity, I have accomplished that Business and the Militia are now encampt.

"This has been the Part that I have acted from the Principle only of saving this unhappy Country from the inevitable ruin with which it is threatened, though my Conduct has been misconstrued by Mr. Marshall and his adherents, as intended to oppose the authority of the State of Pennsylvania, on account of my bearing some Considerable Commissions in the other State. And here I beg Leave to inform you, Sir, (whatever you may have heard to the Contrary) that Commissions &

Command were never Objects that gave me one moments Uneasiness, and its a matter of total Indifference to me who doth the Public Business, so it is well done, and a man in office acquainted with the Bonum Publicum. And I would further inform you that every Office that I have filled, I undertook from a Principle of serving the Public with my utmost abilities and industry.

"I am conscious of the Rectitude of my Intentions, and I scorn the Censures of discontented Partisans; I have always been vigilant to effect the Business I have engaged in, and have generally succeeded to their mortification with advantage to the Public.

"It may not be amiss to let your Excellency in Council know that I waited on Mr. Marshall as soon as I heard of his Return from Philadelphia, & the Office he was to fill whenever the County should be established, & offered that if he could or would undertake to regulate the Militia, protect the Frontiers, & afford Genl. Clark Assistance, I was ready to retire, but that, I apprehended, it was totally out of his Power until the Line of Division between the States was run, & that the People could be assured that they were on a permanent Footing, and whether the Errors and Impositions heretofore practiced on us, on account of the Territorial Dispute, would not rather be augmented than abated;—upon the whole, whether it would not be the best to desist from the Exercise of his Office as County Lieutenant until the Line was run, or the authority of Pennsylvania regularly extended; to these Propositions he gave the following categorical answer: 'that he was determined to support the Honour and Dignity of an officer, & he meant immediately to organize the militia.'

"And he accordingly did all he could to perplex the People, and advise them to pay no obedience to Draughts that I had ordered for Genl. Clark's assistance, & has actually offered Protection to some of 'em, though he before on a request of Genl. Clark's, declared he could do nothing as an officer, wished well to the Expedition, & as a Private Person would give every assistance to promote it.

"There is one Circumstance more I would wish to mention, & that is —The Act of Assembly directs that the Elections to be made for Justices should be held on the 15th inst. (this was the Sabbath); the Day following, I am told, was the Day advertised, however, so obscurely that few, very few, knew of the Day or Place as will appear by the Number of Votes—not one Third of the People knew or attended the Election; by this means an obscure sett of men, perfectly unacquainted with Business will be Returned for Justices. I tremble at the Consequence; I shudder at the Event, I lament the Situation of the poor People of this Country. I wish most sincerely that your Excellency knew the true State of Affairs here, & had it in your Power to rectify the abuse offered the honest People of this Country.

"I am come now, Sir, to apologize for this Letter, & have nothing to offer in my Defence, although I confess the Liberty I have taken greatly needs an apology, save that I am about to leave this Country on the Expedition & shall not have it in my Power to confront in Behalf of the People the insulting abuses here offered them. I am bursting with anxiety for the welfare of this infant Country, and could not consistent with what I conceive to be my Duty suffer such a Career of Iniquity to go on with the Rapidity it now doth without letting the Supreme Executive Council of this State know something of it, and for which Presumption I beg Excuse for, Sir,

"Your Excellency's Devoted
"& most obedient H'ble Servt.
"DORSEY PENTECOST."[1]

[1] Dorsey Pentecost, one of the most prominent of the men of our early days, it is thought was from Virginia, and settled in what is now Rostraver township, Westmoreland County. In a deed conveying his "mansion tract," made when about to remove west of the Monongahela River, the tract is described as having been surveyed to D. P. on a warrant out of the Surveyor's Office of the Province of Pennsylvania in the year 1769, and afterward an entry made in the "Surveyor's Office of Virginia." The reader will remember that he was a Justice of Cumberland County in 1770, of Bedford County in 1771, though not for Westmoreland County when erected in 1773. When the boundary contest began, he was from the first to the last, as has been observed, a partisan of Virginia. In 1777 he removed from the Youghiogeny region to the eastern branch of Chartiers Creek, purchasing from Paul Froman a tract of about 1400 acres at the present Linden, in North Strabane township, near which, probably adjoining, he soon purchased other lands, of which those now owned by John Gamble, Esq., formed a part. In this locality he lived till his death. At the first general election for Washington County he was elected a member of the Supreme Executive Council, and took his seat Nov. 19, 1781; and on Oct. 31, 1783, he was appointed president judge of the courts, being the first judge specially commissioned for that office, Henry Taylor, his predecessor, being presiding judge by reason of having been first named in the general commission. In 1785, without doubt because of extensive land speculations and a miserable currency, he had become seriously involved, and having made arrangements for the disposal of all his lands he went into Frederick County, Va., and while there, Nov. 25, 1786, he was suspended from his office as president judge. In 1787 he returned to Washington County. He died in 1802, and left surviving him his widow Catharine (née Beelor); three sons,—Joseph, the lawyer of Washington, father of George Pentecost, of West Middletown; Dorsey, grandfather of A. J. Pentecost, auctioneer, Allegheny City; and George W., who served in the war of 1812, and died unmarried: five daughters,—Margaret, married Ashby, Virginia; Catharine, married, first, Rabb, Uniontown, second, Vance, Uniontown; Sarah, married Ezekiel Graham, merchant, Cincinnati; Lucy, married James Ashbrook, lawyer, Washington; Rebecca, married Mordecai Hoge, Steubenville. Of the family of Col. Dorsey Pentecost, the only representative in Washington County at present is Mr. George Pentecost, of Middletown.

Space has been taken to quote these letters from the leading parties on both sides, in order that the peculiar conditions of public affairs in which our county was organized might be fully realized. The close of the letter of Mr. Pentecost contains a reference which will now receive attention.

Division into Townships.—The fourth section of the organic act required that the trustees, James Edgar, Hugh Scott, Van Swearingen, Daniel Leet, and John Armstrong, or any three of them, should, on or before the 1st day of July ensuing, divide the county into townships or districts; and the seventh section provided that the freeholders of each township or district should meet on the 15th day of July, "at some proper and convenient place, and elect two fit persons for justices of the peace for each township."

Just when the division into the original townships was made is not known, nor can any report of the trustees be found to show where the lines were. But enough appears to indicate that the original township boundaries followed the courses of the larger streams or the dividing ridges between the smaller ones. This is all that can now be said with certainty.

The division was made in due time, on or before July 1, 1781, and the townships as then named were as follows: Amwell, Bethlehem, Cecil, Cumberland, Donegal, Fallowfield, Hopewell, Morgan, Nottingham, Peters, Robinson, Smith, and Strabane, thirteen in number.

Mr. Veach says:[2]

"Among the most interesting minor studies of our early history is to trace the origin of first settlers in the names of localities. . . . Washington County affords the most instructive derivations. . . . By the act of 1781 erecting it, its trustees . . . were required to divide it into townships. They took the Continental number, thirteen. Of these were Amwell, the name of a township in Hunterdon County, adjoining Morris County, N. J., and of a Presbyterian church in the same vicinity, from which came the Lindleys, Cooks, Rev. J. Dod, and others. Cecil, from Cecil County, Md. Fallowfield, a township in Chester County. . . , Nottingham, a township in Chester County, and a district in Cecil County, Md. . . . Hopewell, a township in York, Cumberland, and Bedford counties. . . . Donegal and Strabane are Irish all over, and common in all our Scotch-Irish counties. Bethlehem, perhaps because settled largely by Quakers. Running out of names, Mr. Edgar procured one to be named Smith, in which he and his pastor, Rev. Joseph Smith, resided."

The subsequent modification of the original townships, and the erection of new ones, into those at present existing will not be followed out here, but in their several histories, hereafter given, the time and method of their organization as well as their early residents will be fully shown.

Election of Justices.—It is seen from Col. Pentecost's letter that the 15th of July, the day on which the organic act required the elections for justices to be held, fell on the Sabbath; and that, as he states, the elections provided for came off on the next day, being Monday, the 16th. It is not probable that, even in those days of rudeness, a people who so frequently imposed fines for "profane curses," as shown by the records of the old Virginia courts, would tolerate an election held on the Sabbath day, even when so required by an act of the General Assembly. The returns of the votes polled at that election are not to be found, but there is a letter from Thomas Scott, the clerk of the Quarter Sessions, to President Reed, dated July 31, 1781,[1] from which the following extracts are made:

"Dear Sir:

"I expect this will be handed you by a messenger from this county with the returns of our elections for Justices of the peace, which affords me an opportunity of acknowledging with Gratitude the receipt of the commission[2] with which Council is pleased to honour me in the county; and also of requesting that in order to make my business perfectly convenient and more capable of Imploying my whole attention, Council be further pleased to Grant me a Commission of Justice in the Common Pleas, Clark of the Orphans Court, and of the Quarter Sessions, which last hath sometimes been Granted to one on the Court's recommendation of several; but as this mode would leave the Sessions for some time without a Clark, and appears unknown in our present constitution, I have thought this application not Irregular, and really necessary.

* * * * * * * * *

"Whatever may be the end of Genl. Clark's expedition, his preparations for it have been greatly Injurious to the Interests of Pennsylvania in this country and hygily oppressive and abusive to many Individuals well affected to this Government. He hath made use of a paper (whereof the Inclosed is said to be a Copy) as authority for exerci-ing a strange, very extraordinary and most arbitrary Jurisdiction over those who have formerly been subject to Virginia, no Matter where they live or whether they were subject by force or free will, which paper and others of the same kind, and his and his parties' proceedings in Consequence thereof hath contributed not a little to the prevention of the proper organization of Washington County and regulation of the militia of Westmoreland.

"A sense of duty constrains me just to mention this matter, the particulars are numerous and horid, some of which its like will be given you by Col. Marshall; but I am convinced the Instances of high Treason against the state are not less than forty."

The letter of Col. Marshall referred to was dated Aug. 8, 1781,[3] and recited the difficulties he had encountered in organizing the militia into battalions, originating out of the fact that the jurisdiction of Virginia had not yet been withdrawn, and that he had found it most prudent to postpone the elections for militia officers until the boundary line was run, concerning which he had lately received intelligence, "or until the armed Banditti under the general [Geo. Rogers Clark], that then awed the good people of this County, and were Chasing such of the Inhabitants as Pentecost, Shepherd & Evans, the Lieuts. of Youghagani, Monongalia & Ohio, were pleased to point out by way of drafting as fit persons to go with the general, and on Missing their persons were Violating and totally destroying their property." Then, after recounting outrages committed by Lieut.-Col. Gabriel Cox and his command, under orders from Col. Pentecost, upon a number of citizens of Westmoreland County who had been drafted for service in Clark's expedition, he proceeds:

"They being in Quest of John Douglass (Gent. Elected one of our Justices for this County), and not finding him the first attempt, broke open his house in the night-time, Fed away and Destroyed such a part of Rye and Corn (his property) as they thought proper. Drew their swords upon his wife and children in order to make them Discover where he was; that ed Cox and his party have taken and Confined a Considerable number of the Inhabitants of this County, amongst which were Hugh Scott (one of the acting trustees of the County), altho' he was not drafted; in a word, the Instances of high treason against the state are too many to be enumerated."

From the record about to be produced, it will be seen that John Douglass lived in Peters township. Gabriel Cox, who was afterwards tried at the second term of the Quarter Sessions when established, lived below Finleyville, in what is now Union township.

In the record of the proceedings of the Supreme Executive Council for August 24, 1781,[4] is the following:

"Returns of Justices for the following townships in the county of Washington were received and read, by which it appears that the following gentlemen were elected:[5]

"Peters township—John Douglass and Robert Thompson.

"Township of Nuttingame—Benjamin Parkinson and Joseph Parkinson.

"Strabane township—(in which is the place called Catfish Camp, ordered by law to be the seat of justice)—Daniel Leet, Henry Taylor, John White, Nicholas Little, Alexander Eddy, and David Clark.

"Aimwell township—Abner Howell and John Craig.

"Donnegal township—Samuel Mason and Samuel Williamson.

"Hopewell township—William Scott and John Marshall.

"Fallowfield township—John Parker, John Hall, east end; and John Stevenson and Patrick McCullough, west end of said township.

"Smith's township—Samuel Johnston and James Edgar.

"Cecil township—Matthew McConnell and John Read[6]

[5] Pity it is we have not the tally-sheets and lists of voters at these the first elections ever held in Washington County; but it will be understood that having no offices yet in which to file them, they would not be preserved in our files, and they are not printed in the State archives.

[6] It will be observed that there were as yet no returns of elections held for the townships of Bethlehem, Cumberland, Morgan, and Robinson, the others of the original townships; but on Nov. 21, 1781 (XIII. Col. Records, 121), there is this record: "A return of an election said to have been held at the house of Ezekiel Roe [Ross], in Bethlehem township, in Washington County, for electing Justices of the Peace for said township, was presented and read, and on enquiry, it appeared that the said election was not appointed by a Justice of the Peace for said county, 'where a vacancy had happened,' the case provided for by law, but in consequence of a neglect to chuse according to the directions of the law; wherefore the election is void." The council then proceeded to appoint a justice, agreeably to an act cited, and appointed and commissioned Thomas Crooks, Esq., as a justice for Bethlehem township.

"On consideration,

"Resolved. That Henry Taylor, William Scott, John Craig, John White, Daniel Leet, John Marshall, John Douglass, Benjamin Parkinson, John Reed, Abner Howell, Matthew McConnell, Samuel Johnston, and Samuel Mason be appointed and commissioned to be Justices of the Peace, of the Court of Common Pleas and of the Orphans' Court, of the county of Washington, and that a general commission be issued accordingly."

Before, however, the foregoing record was made, and the commission recited issued, the following letter was written and sent (though not then received), which is copied as a further and final illustration of the difficulties existing at the time of the organization of the new county:[1]

"August 15th, 1781.

"HONBLE. SIR,

"Farr from Prejudice and Party Faction disengaged, at Present, in the following Narrative, willing to see Justice, without favour or affection Distributed, give us Leave to trouble your Honr. with a detail of measures at present adopted for Magistrates in this Quarter (Washington County).

"At a Time when many People in this County look'd on Themselves bound by their oath of Fidelity to the State of Virginia, until the line between the states should be actually run, or some other Lawful Judicial Proceedings should be taken to relieve them from such Fidelity, At a Time when Genl. Clark had an Expedition Carrying on for the salvation of this Country, and when the Lieut. Col. had advertised Battalion Elections should be postpon'd until the Line between the States should be actually run, Notwithstanding all these obstructions, an Election for Justices was held on the day Genl. Clark ordered his Rendezvous & that by a very few, Electing men farr Inadequate to the Task, men who have ever Lived in obscurity. These being undeniable facts, We beg your Honr will postpone the Commissioning all such men until a fair and Candid Representation can be made, and that to prevent such Fraudulent mal Practices, Fair and Impartial Elections may be held, Whereof Publick Notice shall be given, being well convinced many people in this County never heard of the Election until the day after it was Past. We further assure your Honr, Thus Privately have men of Ability, Fortune, & Character been deprived of an opportunity to serve their Country, and men elected who had no reason to Expect such office. We therefore, in order to give grace to Proceedings that may come from this Court & Harmonize the People, beg no Commission may issue until our Council & Representatives can be heard on the Occasion. We further beg leave to Pray yr Honr. In case you find it absolutely necessary for the administration of Justice to Commission some few of those already Elected, of those Give us Leave to give our opinion of the most able to serve, 'to wit,' James Edgar Judge, Danl. Leet, John Reid, Jos. Parkerson, John Armstrong, Abner Howell, and James Brice.

"Pardon us for intruding on your Honour's Patience, being moved with Indignation at Party factions gives us the greatest reason to Expect your Honour will grant the Indulgence, With Leave to say we remain

"JAMES ALLISON,
"B. JOHNSTON,
"JOHN MCDOWELL,
"GEO. W. MCCORMICK,
"THOMAS CROOK,
"DEMAS LINDLEY,
"GEORGE MYERS."

The foregoing protest, signed by many names already well known to us, came to hand too late, and was probably not received at Philadelphia until after the letter was written by President Reed to Thomas Scott, on Aug. 27, 1781,[2] from which the following extracts were made:

[1] IX. Penn. Archives, 355.

[2] Ibid., 374.

"DEAR SIR:

"Your Favour of the [31?] Ult. has been duly received, & by this Opp'y you will receive the several Commissions requested in addition to that already sent you. We also send the Commission of the Peace for the County, & are extremely sorry that we could not consistent with the Act of Assembly insert Mr. Stevenson's & Mr. Parker's name, but by referring to both the Acts of Assembly which direct the Appointment of Justices, you will see that we are limited to two for each Township, saving the District of the County Town. We are also of opinion that the Return for Fallowfield is too incorrect to admit of any Appointment & have therefore returned it; we cannot distinguish between the Ends of that Township, as it is an entire Thing; if too large it ought to be divided, or the Number of Magistrates increased by pursuing a Mode directed by a late Act of Assembly. A new Election will give the People an Opp'y of appointing Mr. Stevenson, if they think proper, & the Powers of the Council are sufficiently ample to place him at the Head of the Bench agreeable to the general Desire & Opinion.

* * * * * * * * *

"With Respect to Genl. Clark's Proceedings we can only say that he has no Authority from us to draught Militia, much less to exercise these Acts [of?] Distress which you have hinted at & which other letters more particularly enumerate. His Expedition appears to us favorable for the Frontiers, as carrying Hostilities into the Indian Country rather than resting totally on the defensive.

* * * * * * * * *

"At the same Time we cannot help expressing our Fears that too many excuse themselvas under Pretence of unsettled Boundary, some deny any Duty & seek to transfer it entirely to those who are willing & active. After the general Concurrence of the Lieutenants of Westmoreland in the Expedition & agreeing to raise 300 Men, we should have been glad to have heard that the County of Washington had assisted in a measure which seems to us to have been calculated for their own safety in particular as well as the Publick in general."

* * * * * * * * * *

The foregoing communication inclosed the commissions of Thomas Scott himself as clerk of the Quarter Sessions and of the Orphans' Court, dated Aug. 24, 1781; as justice of the Common Pleas, dated Aug. 27, 1781; and also the General Commission of the Peace, dated Aug. 24, 1781. This document, as it reached Mr. Scott, is now before the writer, and as it sets forth the constitution of our first courts of justice it is here copied in full:

"To Henry Taylor, William Scott, John Craig, John White, Daniel Leet, John Marshall, John Douglass, Benjamin Parkinson, John Reed, Abner Howell, Matthew McConnell, Samuel Johnston, and Samuel Mason, Esquires, of the County of Washington, Greeting:

"Reposing especial trust and confidence in your patriotism, prudence, integrity, and abilities, Know that we have assigned you jointly and severally, and every of you, Justices of the peace in the County aforesaid to keep, and all Laws and Ordinances made for the good of the peace and for the Conservation of the same, to keep and cause to be kept and to chastize and punish all persons offending against those laws and Ordinances within the said County as the Law doth or shall direct.

"We have also assigned you, or any three or more of you, Justices, to inquire by the oaths or affirmations of good and lawful men of the said County by whom the truth of the matter may be better known of all and all manner of felonies and other misdeeds and offences whatsoever of which Justices of assize, Justices of Oyer and terminer or of goal delivery, or Justices of the peace according to the Laws of this Government may or ought to inquire. And to inspect all indictments before you, or any of you taken, or to be taken, or taken before others, late Justices of the Peace of the said County, and not yet determined or discharged, and to make and continue the process thereupon, and to hear and determine according to law all crimes and offences whatsoever properly determinable before you according to the laws, usages, and customs of this Commonwealth; and to chastize and punish all persons offending in the premises by fine, forfeiture, or otherwise, as the Law doth or shall direct, and therefore you are hereby strictly commanded that you attend the keeping the peace, laws, and ordinances, and all and singular the premises, and at certain days, times, and places, which by the Constitution and laws of the Commonwealth are appointed, you make inquiry upon the premises, and hear, determine, perform, and fulfill the same, doing therein that which to Justice according to Law shall appertain.

"And we have also assigned you, the said Henry Taylor, William Scott, John Craig, John White, Daniel Leet, John Marshall, John Douglass, Benjamin Parkinson, John Reed, Abner Howell, Matthew McConnell, Samuel Johnston, and Samuel Mason, Justices of the Court of Common pleas for the said County of Washington, requiring and commanding you or any three or more of you to hold pleas of assize, Scire facias, replevins, and to hear and determine all and all manner of pleas, actions, suits and causes, civil, personal, real, and mixt, now depending or which shall hereafter be commenced or brought in the said Court according to law, and to hold special courts for the more speedy determination of all causes of such defendants as are about to depart this Commonwealth, pursuant to the said Laws.

"And we have also assigned you the said Henry Taylor, William Scott, John Craig, John White, Daniel Leet, John Marshall, John Douglass, Benjamin Parkinson, John Reed, Abner Howell, Matthew McConnell, Samuel Johnston and Samuel Mason, Justices of the Orphans' Court for the said County of Washington, requiring you or any three or more of you to hold Orphans' Courts, to hear and determine all matters and things now depending or which shall hereafter be commenced or brought in the said Court, make orders and do and perform all matters and things to the said Court appertaining and by law directed.

The New State Project.—The justices having been commissioned, courts are now ready to be opened, that protection to the rights of person and of property may be provided by the due and regular administration of the law. But, omitting more than a mere reference to the difficulties arising out of land titles, occasioned by the fact that settlers were claiming under rights acquired from two different sovereignties exercising the right of eminent domain, difficulties which have already been noticed in a previous chapter, when treating of the surveys made under Virginia warrants during this period, resulting almost in a declaration of war by Pennsylvania against her sister State, there must now be treated another matter of serious contention which had its origin and existence chiefly within the limits of Washington County, and which has received the name of the "New State Project."

The reader will recollect the pompous petition to the Continental Congress for the erection of a new government, copied in our "Boundary Controversy," the date of which is now well fixed as in the summer of 1776.[1] The proposed government was to be called Westsylvania, and its boundaries were: "Beginning at the Eastern Bank of the Ohio, opposite the mouth of the Scioto, & running thence in a direct Line to the Owasito Pass, thence to the top of the Allegheny Mountains, thence with the Top of the said Mountains to the Northern Limits of the Purchase made from the Indians in 1768, at the Treaty of Fort Stanwix, thence with the said Limits to the Allegheney or Ohio River, and thence down the said River as purchased from the said Indians at the said Treaty of Fort Stanwix to the Beginning." He will also remember how that soon afterwards a disloyal combination was discovered, trials for treasonable offenses were had, and the ringleader of the conspiracy, whoever he was, was put out of the way. This in 1777–78. The same condition of disaffection was developed again in 1780, and the scheme for the establishment of a new State resuscitated.

The writer can see no possible connection between the new State project, as developed either in 1776 or in 1780, with the "proposed new government" talked of in Dunmore's time, called the Walpole Grant, or "Vandalia;"[2] nor has he seen any evidence whatever, that the desire to set up an independent State establishment was in any way induced by the Pennsylvania enactment to abolish slavery;[3] an industrious reading has brought up no documentary proof of such fact nor contemporaneous complaints on that score; indeed, the time when the new State was first petitioned for, to wit, 1776, four years before the Abolition act was passed, would seem to relieve the subject from any doubt in that respect.

The Indiana Company, or grant, might have had some connection with the origin of the new State project.[4] That company was pressing for a recognition of its claims before the Virginia Assembly in [4] As there seems to be great misunderstanding relative to the Indiana Company, and where its grant lay, a brief notice of it is proper, though its lands lay beyond the Pennsylvania boundary. If, however, the boundary line between Pennsylvania and Virginia had been established near Pittsburgh, east or west, that grant would have included the lands now in Washington County.

In 1763, during the French and Indian war, William Trent, with about twenty other Indian traders, among whom was George Morgan, then of the firm of Wharton, Baynton & Morgan, sustained losses by the depredations of the Shawanese, Delaware, and Huron tribes, aggregating a very large amount. At the treaty of Fort Stanwix, on Nov. 3, 1768, the Six Nations, as the head of the tribes, were held responsible for these losses, the aggregate amount ascertained at £85,916 10*s.* 8*d*, New York currency, and through the influence of Sir William Johnson, the Indian agent, the Six Nations, as a compensation for them, executed and delivered to "His Majesty," etc., for the use of William Trent, in trust for himself and the other sufferers, a deed for "all that tract or parcel of land beginning at the southerly side of the little Kanhaway Creek, where it empties itself into the river Ohio, and running thence southeast to the Laurel Hill; thence along the Laurel Hill until it strikes the river Monongahela; thence down the stream of the said river according to the several courses thereof to the southern boundary line of the province of Pennsylvania; thence westwardly along the course of the said province boundary line as far as the same shall extend; thence by the same course to the river Ohio; and thence down the river to the place of beginning, inclusively." It is seen that this grant does not, as many have written, embrace the present State of Indiana. The Indiana Company, for so the traders organized, failed during colonial times to acquire the royal confirmation of their claim under their deed, and in 1776 endeavored to obtain a recognition of their grant by the Virginia government, but again failed; in 1782, however, a committee of Congress reported favorably, but Congress itself declined the power to recognize. As late as 1791 the company was vainly attempting to obtain a rehearing before the General Court of Virginia, and an effort was also fruitlessly made by a bill in equity in the Supreme Court of the United States. Thus this immense grant, containing millions of acres, amounted to nothing.

October, 1776, and in 1781–82 was making a like fruitless endeavor before the Continental Congress. And as the lands claimed all lay within the boundaries of the new State, it may have been that among the promoters of the project under consideration were, some of them, members of the Indiana Company.

Believing, then, that neither the old "new government" scheme mentioned nor the abolition of slavery in Pennsylvania had much if anything at all to do with the new State project of 1780, which created so much alarm east of the mountains, it is thought that a sufficient cause for the agitation is found in the peculiar condition of affairs in Southwestern Pennsylvania at that time.

There was, first, the unrest natural to the pioneers of any new country, leading them, after having endured the dangers and hardships of the wilderness, to seek like trials and excitements farther away in the backwoods. This, perhaps, carried off the early emigration from these parts into Kentucky and Tennessee. Then again, with those who remained, the long-extended range of mountains to the eastward formed a barrier which not only shut them out from the seaboard markets but also weakened the protective power of the State government (for of national power there was none), and the people felt that, unaided and unprotected in the past, in the future their common weal was dependent upon their own autonomy. What one of them ever imagined that the future would provide the force which would break down that mountain barrier?[1] But looking westward and southward they saw the broad waters of a magnificent natural outway, inexpensive and with an unlimited capacity, and at the farther terminus twenty-five dollars per barrel for their flour. And across the Ohio lay a boundless acreage, much of it ready for the plow; and down the southern bank of the beautiful river a garden-spot, an El Dorado. And remember, too, that the people were already taught the principles of liberty and self-government, and, further, that the then union of the States, being but a confederacy, wielded no power and could command no allegiance. Beside all, there was the unsettled state of affairs arising out of the "unrun" boundary, the source of many woes for so many years. Anarchy and confusion was indeed the rule, order and stability the exception.

What wonder then that Col. Daniel Brodhead, in command of Fort Pitt, should write, Sept. 23, 1780, as quoted by Mr. Veech:[2] "The emigrations from this new country to Kentucky are incred- 1780. ible, and this has given opportunity to disaffected people from the interior to purchase and settle their lands," and that he should write also, on Dec. 7, 1780, to Richard Peters,[3] "I learn more and more of the disaffection of many of the inhabitants on this side the mountains. The King of Great Britain's health is often drunk in companies, and I believe those wish to see the regular troops removed from this department, and a favorable opportunity to submit to British government!" But of this state of public sentiment it has been wisely said,[4] "This opinion was based not solely upon the disaffection of the people, but also upon the weakness of the governments, State and national. There was a deeply seated, sulky disappointment at having been abandoned by Virginia and Pennsylvania, which readily soured into aversion to both and to the United States, who they thought had failed to afford them due protection against the savage foes in their rear."

The new State project broke out afresh early in 1780, and, as will be inferred as the history of its resuscitation is unfolded, was supported chiefly by the Virginia adherents, discontented probably by the late adjustment of the boundary by the Baltimore agreement then before the Virginia Assembly for ratification. On May 31, 1780, Alexander McClean wrote from Redstone to Thomas Scott,[5] then the member of the Supreme Executive Council for Westmoreland County:

"Mr. Adams was with me the other day, who seems greatly concerned about the progress of the new state; he informs me that a number of the persons over the River [i.e., in the present Washington county] who had signed the Petitions in your hands have been prevailed upon to vote for a new State, and he informs me that there is to be a meeting at Colo. Cooks[6] the 25th if I mistake not of June in order to take the Sense of the people largely. Woe unto the Virginia lawyers, for they have (I believe) taken away the key of knowledge and are never likely to return again themselves. They have so blinded the Western world that they will not see, they have become so obstinate that nothing less than a new State can come under Consideration. I hope they will at last consider it properly. Mr. Adams was to have wrote largely, but this opportunity could not be made to suit us both. . . . We have had a very dry season so far; the worms have been very destructive to flax &c., but I think this morning will find them other employ, Viz, swimming."

[1] "The two great emigrant and pack-horse routes up to 1800," says Mr. Veech, "Monongahela of Old," 37, "were the Pennsylvania [Pittsburgh, via Hanna's Town, Ligonier, Bedford] and the Virginia [Braddock's] roads heretofore noticed. 'The writer has seen as many as thirty pack-horses in a caravan, pass through Uniontown in a day,—an occurrence so frequent as not to attract unusual notice. . . . They were freighted with salt, sugar-kettles, bar iron, nail rods, glass, kegs of rum, powder, lead, &c. &c. A good horse carrried from two hundred to three hundred pounds besides provisions and feed. These they would take up along the way at places they had dropped them in going down; having no other heavy down loading, merely peltry, ginseng, feathers, &c. The provisions consisted generally, of pone, cheese and dried venison. A bear skin to each horse was an indispensable accompaniment for a bed to the drivers and to protect the cargo from rain. Each horse had his bell, silent by day, but let loose at night when browsing. Two men generally managed ten or twelve horses, one before and one behind each train, to guide them among the trees, and protect the loading from side contact. Strength was also needful to load and unload daily. Emigrants would have their little all slung across one, two, or more horses, according to their abundance, surmounted by their wives and children, or the old folk, with the little bag, or stocking of guineas, joes, or pistareens, snugly ensconced in the salt or clothes bag, after the manner of Joseph's brethren on their trip to Egypt for corn. In 1784 the freight on goods from Philadelphia to Uniontown, was Five Dollars per one hundred pounds. In 1789, thirty shillings, (Four Dollars,) from Carlisle,—the beginning of the pack-horse transportation. . . . This state of things made goods, even the necessaries of life, very high. The best of alum salt rated here at from $4 to $5 per bushel, of ninety six pounds; ground alum salt, at from $3 to $3.50; coffee 33 cents per pound; sugar, 25 cents; Jamaica spirits, $2.33 per gallon. In 1784, wheat sold for 67 cents per bushel; corn, 22 cents; rye, 50 cents. But flour at Natches, if you could get it there, was worth $25 per barrel! A good two horse wagon and gears could be bought for two pack-horse loads of salt, or a good tract of land of four hundred acres for a rifle gun and a horn of powder."

What was done at the proposed meeting, and what further transactions there were relating to the new State during the subsequent part of 1780, there is no definite information; but it was during this period that the letters of Col. Brodhead, referring to the emigration to "Kentucke" and the disaffection of the inhabitants, heretofore quoted, were written. And it was at this time that the Continental Congress was endeavoring to have the seaboard States,—Virginia, New York, Massachusetts, and Connecticut,—all having claims westward towards the "South Sea," to cede their claims to the United States, and that on Oct. 10, 1780, Congress made an earnest appeal to that end, accompanied with an assurance that out of the Territories so ceded should be formed new States, not less than one hundred nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square.[1] It was at this time, too, that a pamphlet was written by the celebrated Thomas Paine, having the following title: "Public Good, being an Examination into the Claim of Virginia, to the Vacant Western Territory, and of the Right of the United States to the same; to which are added Proposals for Laying off a New State, to be applied as a Fund for Carrying on the War, or Redeeming the National Debt; written in the year 1780." It was not, therefore, an altogether unauspicious time to discuss the propriety, on the part of the Monongahela and Ohio valleys, of remaining in Pennsylvania or of joining in the new project. Even Thomas 1781. Scott was not astounded at the idea of the new State, for on Jan. 24, 1781, he wrote to President Reed,[2] referring to the measures pending in Congress of the nature stated, and propounding certain interrogatories:

"1st. Does Congress expect any land off Pennsylvania? 2d. Do they mean by the promised rembursements to pay a just proportion of the sum due the proprietary family as well as other expence? 3d. Will the State come into the measure? 4th. Will Pennsylvania let all the settlements on the Western waters [i.e., on Monongahela and Ohio] go with or be part of what they will relinquish? If the two first are in the affirmative, and the whole Plan calculated, as it appears to be, to bring the States into a firmer bond of union than they at present are, I can Intertain but Littell doubt of the third. And if the fourth is in the affirmative also, I believe it will meet but very few objections on this side the mountains; but should the unsettled part of Pennsylvania's claim be relinquished,[3] and the settlements Retained, the people would certainly think themselves Intolerably aggrieved. Give up all and let us take our chance, or keep all and let us grow to be a considerable part of you, is the cry of many. Others say let us by mere dint of opposition force those States [Pennsylvania and Virginia] to relinquish us to Congress (on the present recommendation), whose procrastinated quarrel about our Country hath hung us, our wives, Children and Living, upan easy pray to the savages these so many years, the settlement whereof hath in so many instances been totally neglected, and at best considered as a mere by business; which will at one stroke reconcile all our Territorial differences, and Inable us to exert our united strength against our common enemy. . . This is the present situation of this country, all in confusion and distraction, helpless for want of Government, and exposed to the Dayly Iurodes of the savage tribes."[4]

The whole of this letter is worthy of being read by him who would have full knowledge of the "destractions" of the times. The letter of Col. James Marshel to President Reed, of June 27, 1781,[5] has already been quoted, wherein the colonel expressed his fear of "Involving the good Subjects of this State in Civil War with Col. Penticost's Banditti and a new Government party that Exists here, and of Exposing our frontier Settlements to the greatest danger from the Indians." In November, 1781, Brig.-Gen. William Irvine became the commandant at Fort Pitt. He seemed to understand the people and to know how to deal with them much better than did his predecessor, Col. Brodhead. On Dec. 3, 1781, he wrote to William Moore, then president of the Supreme Executive Council:[6]

". . . This misfortune [the fate of Colonel Lochry's command], added to the failure of General Clarke's expedition, has filled the people with great dismay. Many talk of retiring to the east side of the mountains early in the spring. Indeed, there is great reason to apprehend that the savages and perhaps the British from Detroit will push us hard in the spring; and I believe there never were posts, nor a country, in a worse state of defense; notwithstanding, I am well informed there have been sundry meetings of people at different places, for the purpose of concerting plans to emigrate into the Indian country, there to estab lish a government for themselves. . . . From what observations I have been able to make, I am of opinion there are many obvious reasons that no time should be lost in running the line between Virginia and Pennsylvania. Civil government will never be fairly established till then, nor even the militia drawn out with regularity for their own defense. I have no reason as yet to complain of the people for the refractory, ungovernable, loose manners generally ascribed to them. I assure you, sir, my pity for their situation is rather excited than wrath or indignation kindled. . . ."

President Moore recommended a method of diverting the people from their new State emigration by employing them in an invasion of the Indian country.[7] On April 20, 1782, Gen. Irvine again writes from Fort Pitt,[8] this time to Gen. Washington:

". . . Civil authority is by no means properly established in this country, which I doubt not proceeds in some degree from inattention in the executives of Virginia and Pennsylvania. Not running the boundary line is, I think, a proof of this, which is at present an excuse for neglects of duty of all kinds for at least twenty 1782.
miles on each side of the line. More evils will arise from this neglect than people are aware of. Emigrations and new States are much talked of. Advertisements are set up announcing a day to assemble at Wheeling for all who wish to become members of a new State on the Muskingum. A certain Mr. Johnson is at the head of this party; he is ambitious, and some say disaffected. . . . Should these people actually emigrate they must be either entirely cut off or immediately take protection from the British, which I fear is the real design of some of the party, though I think a great majority have no other views than to acquire lands."[1]

There is now given an affidavit relating to the part taken by an old acquaintance, Dorsey Pentecost,[2] in the new State project, he at that time being a member of the Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania for Washington County :

"WASHINGTON COUNTY, ss.

"Personally appeared before me, the subscriber, one of the Commonwealth's Justices of the Peace for said County, Hugh M. Brackenridge, Esqr., being summoned to give evidence with regard to the conduct of Dorsey Pentecoast, Esqr., in exciting and fomenting the present disturbances in the County of Washington ; saith that he heard Mr. Pentecoast on his return from Council declare that the line, meaning that with Virginia and this Commonwealth, would never be run, and that this Country never would be Pennsylvania or Virginia, but a new State. At the time that meetings were frequently held in the County where matters of a seditious nature were proposed, anonymous notes in writing were circulated thro' the County, advertising a meeting under the pretence for consulting measures for the preservation of the County, which notes were in Mr. Pentecoast's handwriting.

"On oath before me this 4th day of July, 1782.

"JOHN DOUGLASS."

To show that the new State advocates were not confined to Washington County, or to the vicinity of Pittsburgh, to which that county then extended, there is a letter from Christopher Hayes, of Westmoreland County, to President Moore, dated "September y^e^ 20th, 1782 :"[3]

"After my best Compliments to you I enform your Excellency that the Commission for the Courts of Oyer and Terminer is Come to hand, and also Mr. McClean's Instructions for the Running of the Pennsylvania line, which is now sevarlly Threatened by those who Opposed it before, and our Lives Much Threatened by those who formerly held to the Government of Virginia and now to a New State. . . . As our Assessors was taking their Returns According to Law, the Opposers Assembled under arms, Drove them off From their Deauty, Fired Guns at them, and say they will not pay any Taxes nor be Obedient to our Laws, being they never took the oath of Fidelity to this State, But means to support a New State."

In a letter dated Washington County, Nov. 6, 1782,[4] directed to President Moore, Col. Pentecost, in his own peculiar way, and with a "Degree of warmth in Some Expressions," replies to the charges made against him in the affidavit before quoted, professing, however, a want of information as to their real nature, but dealing in truly vigorous language. A portion of his letter is as follows :

". . . The gentleman tells me that if he understood Mr. Brackenridge right, some depositions has reached the State House the Subject of which He could not perfectly collect as Mr. Brackenridge dealt in that amiable Doctrine of Enuendoes, and his Invictives was rather in the Generals; However they ware (or ware made) so Consequential as to be referred to a Committee, who called on Mr. Brackenridge for Information on the subject. That truly wise and good man (no doubt with the Sanctity of a Divine) told them that the Charges were true, but the Committee with some members of your Board Concluded that I was a Character too Insignificant for their notice. . . ."

The result of which was, as intimated, that the government, pursuing as heretofore a policy of conciliation, instituted no proceedings against individuals.

But soon afterwards, to wit, on Dec. 3, 1782, the General Assembly passed an act[5] upon the subject, a portion of which is here given :

"AN ACT to prevent the erecting any new and independent State within the Limits of this Commonwealth.

"SECT. I. Whereas, by the Separation of the Thirteen United States from Great Britain, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania hath become a sovereign and independent State, and, in Consequence of such Separation a Government, established solely on the authority of the People, hath been formed ; and it being evident that every County hath by the Constitution, or by Laws enacted for that Purpose, an incontestible Right to send Deputies to represent them in the General Assembly, and that they have exercised that Right, they being now actually represented in this House ; therefore all the Inhabitants of this Commonwealth, as they are under the protection of its Laws, are bound by and do owe Allegiance thereto ;

"SECT. II. And Whereas great Exertions have been made for the Defence of the Frontiers, and large Sums expended therein, notwithstanding the Embarrassments and Difficulties under which the Commonwealth hath and still doth labour in its Finances;

"SECT. III. And Whereas this Commonwealth is indebted to the late Proprietaries of Pennsylvania in a large Sum of money, payable to the End of the War, and each and every County ought to contribute its just Part or Proportion for that End, and the unlocated Lands within this State are and always have been considered a valuable Fund towards paying and discharging the said Debt ;

"SECT. IV. And, Whereas, notwithstanding the Premises, this house hath received Information that divers ill disposed Persons, setting at naught every Principle of public Virtue, and pursuing their ambitious and interested Views, have caused great Uneasiness among the good people of this State, by manifesting the most criminal Design of setting up a distinct State or Government within this Commonwealth ;

"SECT. V. Be it therefore enacted, . . . That if any Person or Persons shall erect or form, or shall endeavor to erect or form, any new and independent Government, within the Boundaries of this Commonwealth, as described in the Charter, and settled between this State and the State of Virginia, such Person or Persons, being thereof legally convicted in any Court of Oyer and Terminer, shall be adjudged guilty of High Treason."

In subsequent sections, of which there were six in number, it was also made high treason, and punishable with death, to set up notices calling meetings for the purpose of forming a new and independent government, or to advocate the same at any public meeting ; trials were authorized in any county of the Commonwealth, and authority given the Supreme Executive Council to call out the militia to suppress any attempts "to set up a new and independent government in any county or counties within the boundaries of this Commonwealth, as above mentioned."

Then the Supreme Executive Council, through John McDowell,[6] the member from Chester County, commissioned Rev. James Finley to observe the condition of sentiment among the people, 1783. and to dissuade them from the new treasonable project. Mr. McDowell said, "He has frequently Preached among them, & is expected there this spring ; he will therefore have it in his power to execute his Commission, without incurring the least suspicion of being employed by Council." The person employed, the terms of Mr. McDowell's letter, as well as of the instructions[1] supplied to Rev. Mr. Finley, indicate the wisdom and prudence of the course adopted in dealing with this delicate subject, especially difficult to deal with among a people distracted in so many respects.

The report of Rev. Mr. Finley was as follows,[2] omitting, however, the interesting circular letter he had used among the inhabitants:

"CECIL COUNTY, MD., April 28, 1783.

"SIR,

"As y^e^ Hon'ble Council over which your Excellency presides was pleased to appoint me to fulfil y^e^ Intentions of y^e^ Leg'slature by endeavoring to bring those deluded Citizens in y^e^ western Counties to a proper Sense of their duty, who seemed disposed to separate from y^e^ Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, & erect a new & Independent state & left it with me to act as prudence might direct, &c. And, as I undertook this business, they doubtless had a right to demand, & therefore may justly expect me to give an account of my conduct herein; which, may it please your Excellency, was as follows:

"Immediately upon y^e^ receipt of y^e^ appointment, & your Excellency's Instructions, which were of singular use to me, I sett off; and endeavored to gain all y^e^ knowledge I could of y^e^ sentiments and conduct of y^e^ people in y^e^ different parts of those settlements. And, as I found y^t^ y^e^ Inhabitants on y^e^ east side of y^e^ River Youghioganni were mostly opposite to a New State, I passed them by. A considerable number of those between s^d^ River and y^e^ Monaungehela, as well as a great part of Washington County, I found to be fond of it; being misled by a few aspiring, & I suspect ill-designing men, or by men, who had not thoroughly considered y^e^ whole matter which later was y^e^ case of some of y^e^ Clergy. I also found y^t^ y^e^ Act to prevent y^e^ erecting any New and Independent States, &c.; and likewise y^e^ Act for y^e^ sale of certain lands therein mentioned, &c.; of y^e^ 3d of December last, quite intimidated & discouraged y^e^ populace, who had been buoyed up with y^e^ hopes of easily obtaining, & prospects of great advantage by a New State; and y^t^ even y^e^ Ringleaders were for eating in their words & putting a new face upon their conduct; so y^t^ y^e^ design of y^e^ Legislature was partly effected, yet y^e^ people seemed rather hushed than convinced: Therefore I called upon a number of y^e^ Ministers & other Gentlemen, conversed with some & wrote to others, as well as cautioned y^e^ people after Sermon against having any hand in such Schemes.

"The Substance of my conversation, Cautions, & letters is to be found in y^e^ copy of a letter I herewith send your excellency; & which is nearly y^e^ same with many I wrote on y^e^ occasion; & which, in a leasure hour your Excellency may give a glance to if it may be thought worth while.

"I carefully concealed my appointment from every one; nor did any appear to suspect it. But while some approved of my conduct, others, viz., y^e^ New Statesmen alledged I was too officious: yet I suspect appearing in a public Character in y^t^ affair would not have answer'd any better end. I concluded however that having y^e^ letters in their hands & reading them one to another, as I found was the case, they would be obliged to attend to y^e^ arguments. I hope some good is done; & cannot but believe y^t^ y^e^ New State affair is over at present. I was six weeks in y^t^ country; & would have tarried longer had it appeared requisite for y^e^ good of y^e^ State. But I must tell your Excellency y^t^ I fear much opposition will be made, especially by those disappointed in their expectations about a new State, & artifice used to evade a tax. I was greatly opposed in this; and cannot answer y^e^ objections against a tax in cash, otherwise than by alledging y^t^ y^e^ Assembly would surely adopt some easy measure which y^e^ people could comply with; and I hope this will be done, as those Settlements are nearly destitute of cash.

"If a Campaign should be carried on to your westward this summer or fall in order to check y^e^ insolence of y^e^ savages, who have already killed & captivated many; y^e^ people, I doubt not, will readily contribute in grain or wheat, each man his share of y^e^ tax; & by this means will be brought into y^e^ custom without either force or disputation. And if it should seem good to y^e^ legislature, until money shall circulate more extensively, to appoint active & honest men to receive y^e^ publick dues in flour & convey it to New Orleans to market, y^e^ people would this way not only pay y^e^ public tax, but also take out patents for their lands, So that in a short time many thousands would come into y^e^ treasury, which otherwise need not be expected. With an ardent wish for y^e^ peace & prosperity of your Government this comes from your Excellency's

"most obedient & humble servant.

"JAMES FINLEY."

The reverend commissioner was much too modest in his expectations as to the results of his mission. The new State project troubled the government no more, and the history of this contention is now closed by quoting from the address of Mr. Veech:[3]

"Now it is presumed that Mr. Finley's conferences with the clergy west of the Monongahela were chiefly, if not wholly, with Presbyterians, —McMillen, Smith, Dod, and Clark. Does he mean that some of them had been misleading the people? His language looks that way. And if they did so because they 'had not thoroughly considered the whole matter,' who can blame them? It was a captivating scheme, and until recently not forbidden. And if they had not been as 'wise as serpents' to discern its seditious origin and the mischiefs it would work, it was perhaps because they were as 'harmless as doves.' Be this as it may, the project quickly died out, and disaffection receded. . . . And yet, in looking back upon the new State project, one may be pardoned for the half-drawn sigh at its decapitation. With Pitt-burgh for its capital, so natural as to seem to have been made for it, how easily would it have sat in the sisterhood of States."

Organization of the Courts.—On the 17th day of September, 1781, to which date the reader is asked to return, Henry Taylor, being the first-named justice in the general commission heretofore copied, and therefore by long usage the president of the courts about to be organized, issued the venire for a grand jury, still on the files in its proper place, which is here copied because it is quite different from such venires of the present day: 1781.

"WASHINGTON COUNTY, ss.

{SEAL.} "The Common Wealth of Pennsylvania, To the sheriff of Washington County, Greeting:

"We command you, that you omit not, by reason of any Liberty within your county, but that you enter therein, and that you cause to come before our Justices assigned to keep the peace in the said County, and also to hear and determine divers felonies, trespasses, and other misdemeanors in the said county committed, on the Second day of October now next Insuing, at the House of David Hoge, at Catfish Camp, in the said county, Twenty-four good and Lawful men of the body of the county affore said, then and there to inquire, present, do and perform, all and singular such things, which on behalf of the said Commonwealth shall be injoined them; And have you then there as well the names of the Jurors aforesaid, as also this writ: Witness Henry Taylor, Esquire, at Catfish, the Seventeenth day of September, in the year of our Lord, one thousand Seven hundred and Eighty one, and in the Sixth year of the said Commonwealth.

[Indorsed] "HENRY TAYLOR."

"I have Sumoned the men whose names are mentioned in the Pannal hereto annexed as within I am commanded,

"LEVI WELLS,
"Sub-Sheriff."

["Pannal" attached.]

"David Riddle.	George Vanemmon.
Josiah Scott.	Henry Dunnavan.
Alexander Eddy.	James Scott.
Nicholas Littell,	Joseph Cowenhoven.
David Finley.	Henry Newkirk.
Alexander Karr.	James Graham.
Patrick Scott.	Laurance Ralasson.
Arthur Forbes.	Norard Franeway.
Patrick McCullough.	John Morison.
John Stephenson.	George Gillespie.
Hugh Scott.	James Clemons.
James Furman.	Thomas Wilon.
Samuel Freazer.	Samuel Sillick."

Twenty-six in number.

On the same day (Sept. 17, 1781) another venire was directed to the sheriff,[1] commanding him

"To cause to come before our Justices at Catfish Camp, at our County Court of Common Pleas there to be held for the County of Washington, on the Second day of October next, Twenty-four free and lawful men of the body of your County, each of Whome has forty Shillings of Lands, Tenements or Rents by the year at Least, by whom the truth of the matter may be better known, and who are in no ways of kin to the parties, to make a Certain Jury of the County between the parties aforesaid in the pleas there depending, Because the said parties, between whome the Matters in verlance are, have put themselves upon that Jury: and have there the names of the Jurors and this writ: Witness Henry Taylor, Esquire, at Washington[2] the seventeenth day of September, Annoq. Domini, 1781."

The panel returned with this venire for the first petit jury contains the following names:

David Dilly.	David Irwin.
Peter Letherman.	William Holmes.
George Demut.	William Johnson.
Jonathan Markland.	Archibald Neal.
Philip Lewellin.	John Beard.
Matthew Steen.	David Enoch.
Joseph Shaban.	James Fitzpatrick.
David Clark.	Ezekiel Rose.
John Smith.	John Mannon.
Samuel Osburn.	Nathaniel Redford.
James Brownlee.	John Varvil.

By this writ and panel of jurors provision was made for the first Court of Common Pleas of Washington County.

But, as heretofore written, the Court of Quarter Sessions of the Peace, etc., was the principal court during the existence of the Constitution of 1776, and the venire first quoted is that which brought together at "Catfish Camp" the several justices commissioned, and who held the first term, the record of which in the original minutes will now be laid before the reader:

"At a Court of General Sessions of the Peace held at the house of David Hoge,[3] at Catfish Camp, for the County of Washington, on the Second day of October, in the year of our Lord one Thousand Seven hundred and Eighty-one, before Henry Taylor, Esquire, and his associates, Justices of the said Court.

"Hugh Montgomery Brackenridge,[4] Samuel Irwin, and David Sample, Esquires, admitted Attorneys, and sworn in open court.

"The said David Sample,[5] Esquire, appointed To prosecute for the State.

"Grand Jury:

Alexander Eady, Foreman.	Samuel Frazer.
David Riddle.	George Vanemon.

"Alexander Eady, Thomas Hambleton, James Patterson, Abraham Vanmiddleswarth, and Nathaniel Brown, appointed to View, and if necessary Lay out a Road the Nearest and best way from Catfish Camp to the Presbyterian Meeting-house in the forks of Chartiers creek, petitioned for by a number of the Inhabitants of Strabane Township, and to Report to Next Term.

"Hugh Montgomery Brackenridge, Esquire, Complains that a Road is much wanted from Catfish Camp to Pittsburgh; Whereupon Henry Hulce, Andrew Hood, Moses Coe, Joseph Beelor, James Bradford, Jr., and John White, Junr., are appointed to View, and if necessary Lay out the Said Road, the nearest and best way from point to point, and report to next Term.

"Hugh Montgomery Brackenridge Complains that a Road is much Wanted from John Cannon, Esq., his Mill to Pittsburgh; Whereupon Robert Ralstone, William Long, Thomas Brakeu, John Springer, John Henry, and Nathaniel Stokes are appointed to View, and if necessary to Lay out the said Road, by Course and distance the nearest and best way from point to point, and report to next Term.

"The recommendation of the Court is granted to James Wilson for keeping a Public house of Entertainment at Catfish Camp."

The only other item of business transacted in the Quarter Sessions at this its first term is the binding in a recognizance of John Fisher to appear at the next term, and in the mean time to keep the peace "towards all the liege subjects of the Commonwealth, and particularly towards William Bowan, Elizabeth

[1] There was no sheriff yet in commission for Washington County, but it will be remembered that in the organic act it was provided that until a sheriff and coroner should be chosen for Washington County, the sheriff and coroner of Westmoreland County should "officiate and act."

[2] This shows the struggle for this place for a name,—Catfish Camp, Washington, Bassett Town. David Hoge wished to call his town after his kinsman, Richard Bassett, of Delaware, as to whom see Johnston's "Hist. of Cecil Co., Md.," 166, 177, 184–85

[3] It is thought that David Hoge never lived at Catfish Camp, though he doubtless had a cabin here. He was the brother of Jonathan Hoge, of Cumberland County, who was a member from that county of the Constitutional Convention of 1776, and also of that of 1790, and a member of the Supreme Executive Council in 1786. But it is pretty well settled that the first terms of the courts for Washington County were held upon the lot occupied by John Dodd; for in the minutes of the first board of county commissioners for the year 1783, in which year is the first recorded tax levy, one item of the levy was, "Laid on to pay the Court-House rent to Charles or John Dodd, £40." The record of disbursements shows that there was paid to Charles Dodd that same year, for "Court-house Rent, 1 year, £15." This being for the third year, the inference is permissible that £15 was paid for the second year, and £10 for the first year. John Dodd occupied, as is well established, the lot whereon at present stands Mr. R. F. Stream's building, on the northwest corner of Main Street and Strawberry Alley, and upon that lot doubtless was held the first sessions of the courts. There is evidence that terms were held at other houses also, until were erected the Public Buildings, an account of which will appear elsewhere.

[4] This was the Hugh Henry Brackenridge of a few years later. Just when or why or how his name was changed, as it undoubtedly was, is not known. He was born at Campbleton, Scotland, in 1748; came with his father to Pennsylvania at the age of five; graduated at Princeton College, 1771, and was master of an academy in Maryland when the Revolution broke out; removed to Philadelphia, studied divinity, became a chaplain in the army; settled at Pittsburgh in 1781; in 1786 was sent to the Legislature to have Allegheny County erected; was made a judge in 1789, and from 1799 until his death at Carlisle, June 25, 1816, was a justice of the Supreme Court of the State. He took a prominent part in the Whiskey Insurrection (quod vide), and was the author of several works, satirical, historical, and literary.

[5] David Sample was admitted to the bar of Bedford County at the first court in 1771.

Bowan, and Elce Fisher, wife of the said John Fisher."

There was but little business transacted at the first term of the Court of Common Pleas. The venire, as heretofore copied, was dated Sept. 17, 1781. On that day a suit was brought by Philip Gililan against Mary Peters, widow. This defendant was the wife of Indian Peter, living on "Indian Hill" tract, where West Brownsville now is.[1] The case was never brought to trial, being non-prossed after a first and second rule to declare. No paper in the suit remains on file, except the writ, which was a summons in trespass on the case. The second suit on the docket was Sarah Taylor vs. David Williamson. At the term time there was a special imparlance, and special bail was entered. January term, 1782, rule to declare, and continuance. This defendant was Col. David Williamson, who the next month, February, 1782, led the militia of the county against the Moravian Indians at Gnadenhütten.

To this first term of the Common Pleas there were fifteen causes, ten of which were ejectments. In the first year of this court's existence there were two hundred and eighty-five causes, of which fifty-seven were contentions about land titles. The great source of these contentions, it will readily be surmised, was the condition attached by Virginia, on June 23, 1780, to her ratification of the Baltimore agreement of Aug. 31, 1779, determining the boundary controversy, in which it was provided "that the private property and rights of all persons acquired under, founded on, or recognized by the laws of either country previous to the date thereof be saved and confirmed to them, although they should be found to fall within the other; and that in the decision of disputes thereon preference shall be given to the elder or prior right, whichever of the said States the same shall have been acquired under," which humiliating condition Pennsylvania, in the interest of peace, on Sept. 23, 1780, had accepted.[2] Hence it followed that to determine which was the prior right, acquired under one State or the other, a suit at law was necessarily unavoidable, and the Virginia jurisdiction having been terminated the land-title contentions were left to be decided in the Pennsylvania courts, the greater part of them in Washington County.

At the first term of the Orphans' Court Elizabeth Green, minor, of the age of fourteen years, was "put an apprentice" to Patrick Allison, "till she arrives at the age of eighteen years, to learn to read and also the art of housewifery." George Green, a minor of the age of two years, was "put an apprentice" to Patrick Allison, "till he arrives at the age of twenty-one years, to learn reading, writing, the five rules of arithmetic, also the art of farming." Abraham Teagarden was appointed to be the guardian of the "affairs" of Jesse Bumgardner, a minor, "as far as his concerns lie in Washington County."

In order to show the style in which our fathers attended this term of court, it is said by Judge Wilkeson, in his "Early Recollections of the West,"[3] writing of this period: "So great was the destitution of comfortable clothing, that when the first court of Common Pleas was held in Catfish, now Washington, a highly respectable citizen, whose presence was required as a magistrate, could not attend court without first borrowing a pair of leather breeches from an equally respectable neighbor, who was summoned on the grand jury. The latter lent them, and having no others had to stay at home."

But at this term of court who of the justices commissioned on the 24th of August, 1781, to hold the courts came together and what their surroundings? To this inquiry the only answer to be found is in the letter of the truly honorable Thomas Scott to President Reed,[4] portions of which are copied:

"WASHINGTON, October 19, 1781.

"DEAR SIR,

"I am honored with your favor dated In Council, Philada., 27 August, 1781, and the several Commissions Inclosed. Immediately on rect. whereof I called a number of the Gent'n named in the general commission [i.e., to the justices], and administered to them the necessary oaths. Also acquainting as many as I had the opportunity of, with the paragraff in your Letters which mentions the oaths of Citizenship to be taken by our Electors. I am exceedingly sorry that I have to mention the great disgust this [last] requisition gives many, which Increased from day to day until the court, when it came to be more publicly spoken of, and it was with considerable difficulty we could prevail upon such of the Grand jury as had not, to take the oath of fidelity. However they did, and business was done in a tolerable manner, but the great question was about the election.[5]

"Our County, its true, is unhapily divided into two grand parties, namely the Pennsylvania & Virginia, each claiming some special Indulgencies; the one for their steady attachment to the state, the other on account of their Transfer, as it is called, from the other state. For my part I think what is right is right in either party, and am well satisfied all things prior to the agreement of the two states should be forgotten, and every man stand or fall on the demerit of his deeds in futur. My earnest desire to reconcile these parties, and steady adherence to neuterality between them in hopes of accomplishing this end, however unreconciled they yet remain, hath had the effect in some measure of softening their resentment to each other on this ocation, and bringing the resentment of both on myself; one party alledging that of Course I was of the other, and therefore had wrote to Council that the oath might be urged in order to prevent the voats of those who still felt a little sore through old prejudices. The other avering I ought of right, to be of their party and was not, but had wrote for the said Instructions thereby to prevent the voats of those who were religiously scrupulous of multiplying oaths, especially as the line is not yet run, and thought themselves intitled to voat on their known attachment to the state, and, in a word, both declared for voating without oath, and that I was the only cause of its being required. So jealous and so unjust is the spirit of party, Council will see no mistery in all this, and if good grow to the County out of the mistake, I have no objection to the small sacrifice.

[1] See Centennial Celebration of Washington County, 45.

[2] Of course the terms of this condition referred entirely to land titles. But a curious application of it was attempted. During the Virginia usurpation, Dorsey Pentecost had held the office of clerk of the Court of Yohogania County, and Benjamin Johnston had been the county surveyor for that county, exercising that office even after Washington County was erected. These worthies, when they failed to get the corresponding offices for Washington County, complained in vigorous English that their respective rights under the terms of the compromise condition had been violated! See their letters: Dorsey Pentecost, Oct. 6, 1783, X. Penn. Archives, 181; Benjamin Johnston, Nov. 1, 1784; Ibid., 611.

[5] To be referred to hereafter.

"Being under an indispensable necessity of being at Westmoreland Court the very day of the election I was not present, and know not how it was conducted. But I conceive there is the greatest necessity of the Legislature immediately ascertaining by publick action on what Terms The Inhabitants of this disputed Territory shall become Lawful Jurors, voaters, etc., which I hope the Council will think of, and if necessary Lay it before the house of assembly. I have not the least doubt but the people will Generally be good and faithful subjects if properly managed and supported.

"We still groan under the difficulty of an unrun boundary line. . . .

"I presume the Gentn who remonstrated against the commission of the peace for the County being Issued, are on cool reflection convinced that it was not nor could it be a private election as to time, that being settled by act of Assembly, and as to the privity of place I believe great part was ocationed by some persons pulling down and secreting the advertisements which the trustees published for that purpose. However, I think all are nearly satisfied on learning that there is a mode provided whereby those Townships that have not elected at all may be supplied, and also a way to displace such as by their conduct show themselves unworthy the honour and trust of a magistrate, some of which rank (I am sorry I have it to tell you) I expect will shortly be told out to the assembly, and that one of those recommended by these very Gentn will be in the list. So liable to mistakes is human nature, the best proof of mankind is Tryal; but I confess when this proof is obtained at the expense of disgracing an hon'ble commission or betraying the trust of a people its too dear; but when a good man and good officer is found I can't think the discontent of a frowning, freting party too high a price. This county is just like other parts of the world, Let a petition be formed to burn the church and some Signers may be got to it."

* * * * * * * * * *

The General Election.—It will be observed that although the first terms of the courts have passed, the county is yet without representatives in Council and in the Assembly, a sheriff, a coroner, and county commissioners of her own; persons for these offices had not yet been chosen.

The Constitution of 1776 [1] provided that the day for holding the general elections throughout the State should be the "Second Tuesday of October forever," [2] which in 1781 was the 9th day of that month, and on that day were chosen persons to fill the positions referred to. It was to this election Mr. Scott made reference in the early part of his letter, and it would seem that the oath of allegiance and fidelity required by the instructions of the Supreme Executive Council to be taken by each elector was dispensed with by consent of both parties into which our people were divided, and the result of this violation will presently appear.[3]

The returns of this general election traveled slowly on their way to Philadelphia, at least it was not until Nov. 30, 1781, that there was the following record of the proceedings of the Supreme Executive Council:[4]

"A return of the general election of the county of Washington was read, by which it appears that the following gentlemen were duly elected, viz.:

"Councellor, Dorsey Pentecost.

"Representatives, James Edgar, John Cannon.

"Sheriffs, Van Swearingen, Andrew Swearingen.

"Coroners, Wm. McFarlane, Wm. McComb.

"Commissioners, George Vallandigham, Thomas Crooks, John McDowell.

"On consideration,[5]

"Resolved, That Van Swearingen, Esquire, be appointed Sheriff of the county of Washington, and that Wm. McFarlin be appointed Coroner of the said county, and that they be commissioned accordingly."[6]

---

[1] See Sections IX. and XVII., Chapter II.

[2] Unchanged until the Constitution of 1874, ninety-eight years.

[3] This general election by the people of the whole county was held at what was regarded as the court-house. Such elections were held at the county-seat until 1787; see act of 1785, III. Carey & Bioren, 91. By the act of Sept. 27, 1787 (III. Ibid., 212), the county for the first time was divided into election districts six in number, and their boundaries described. The places for holding the elections in each district as numbered were as follows:

1. House of Jacob Cline, on Muddy Creek.
2. House of Sheshbazer Bently, on Pigeon Creek.
3. House of Daniel Shaughan, on Chartiers Creek (?).
4. Court-house, Washington.
5. House of Joshua Meek, Raccoon Creek (?).
6. House of George Blazer, Kings Creek.

It would be unprofitable to follow the subsequent changes innumerable made in the election districts.

[4] XIII. Col. Records, 134.

[5] So far as the elections for sheriffs and coroners were concerned, under the Constitution of 1776 the election was but a recommendation, as will be remembered, and the Council could commission either of the two chosen as "fit persons."

[6] Dorsey Pentecost and John Canon are well known to us.

James Edgar, celebrated in our early annals for his upright and influential character, was born in York County, Pa., Nov. 15, 1744, was a member from that county of the Provincial Conference which met at Carpenter's Hall, Philadelphia, June 18, 1776, to make provision for a "new government in this province on the authority of the people only;" on July 8, 1776, elected (and served) as a delegate from that county to the convention which framed the Constitution of 1776; a member from that county of the Council of Safety, 1777; member of Sup. Ex. Council from that county in 1777; removed to and settled in Smith, now Cross Creek township, Washington County, in the fall of 1779; with John McDowell, member of the Board of Censors for Washington County in 1783; commissioned, with William McFarland, an associate justice, Sept. 30, 1788, and held that office till his death. In 1794 he was prominent in the Whiskey Insurrection on the side of law and order. He died in Smith township, on June 8, 1814.

Van Swearingen was son of John Swearingen, of Springhill township, Fayette County, who had come from Berkeley County, Va. He was a justice of Westmoreland County, and resided opposite the present Greenfield until Washington County was erected, that is, when at home, as he was a noted frontiersman, known as "Indian Van," and was a captain from Aug. 9, 1776, in Col. Mackay's regiment, the Eighth Pennsylvania line, in the Revolution. Samuel Brady, his son-in-law then, or afterward, and the famous Indian scout, was also a captain in same regiment. In 1784 he was succeeded by Col. James Marshel as sheriff of Washington County, and in 1785 removed to a tract purchased from Capt. Isaac Cox, embracing Cox's fort, just above Wellsburg, upon which he resided till his death Dec. 2, 1793, in the fifty-first year of his age. His will is recorded in our register's office, in Book I., p. 220. The writer has a letter from Van Swearingen, dated March 17, 1791, to Capt. Josiah Swearingen, in which he says, "I am going to give you the Late nuse in this neiborhood. The Indens lately killed & took seven people 2 miles from my fort & fore others in the woods in this neiborhood. Brady & others 25 folowed or scouted after savedges returned with 4 skilps & a grate quantity of plunder. Thay wounded Indins that escapt & killed a squaw By axident which thay did not scalpt."

William McFarland, son of Col. Daniel McFarland (who settled at the locality of Ten-Mile village, coming from New Jersey, probably as early as 1776 or 1777, and who died in 1817, aged eighty-seven), was born in New Jersey about 1756, and came with his father to the West; Sept. 30, 1788, commissioned as a justice of the courts; his son James was the father of Hon. N. C. McFarland, of the United States Land Office; his daughter Sarah was the mother of Abel M. Evans, of Ten-Mile village; his daughter Mary, the mother of Hon. John A. Dille, Morgantown, W. Va.; his daughter Phœbe, the mother of Miss Phœbe Clark and her sister, the wife of William H. Underwood, late register of wills; and his son Samuel was well known as Maj. McFarland, a citizen of Washington at his death in 1868.

George Vallandigham has been known as a justice of the extinct Virginia courts, lived at the present Noblestown, on the P. C. & St. L. Railway, and is said to have been the grandfather of Hon. C. L. Vallandig-

Early Judicial Proceedings.—The result of holding this general election without the oath of allegiance and fidelity was that Pentecost, Canon, and Vallandigham, hitherto ardent Virginia partisans, and Crooks and McDowell, a little identified with that side, were elected to most important offices. The Virginians were in the majority.

The organization of Washington County as a civil municipality, adapted for the protection and preservation of the rights of person and property, is now completed, though her troubles are not quite at an end. It has already been seen that for several years the old contest still survived, and there is a trace of the old trouble in the records of the second term of the Court of Quarter Sessions, held on the 1st day of January, 1782.

The second, third, fourth, and fifth causes entered to that term in the said court are each entitled, Res publica vs. Gabriel Cox. Number 2 was an indictment for assault, on information of Isaac Gibson; Number 3, an indictment for assault, on information of Richard Parkinson; Number 4, an indictment for assault and battery, on information of Hugh Sterling; and Number 5, an indictment for assault and battery, on information of Hugh Scott. The first two causes were continued, but coming up at the next term, held April 2, 1782, were tried and Col. Cox was acquitted. The jury in Number 2 was composed of David Steel, Jeremiah Riggs, Nathan Ellis, William Howe, Thomas Bond, Edward Miles, Brice Virgin, James Curry, James Kykendall, Rezin Virgin, John Wall, and George Myers. The jurymen in Number 3 were the same, except Peter Hanks in place of Rezin Virgin. To the bills found in Numbers 4 and 5 special pleas of misnomer were filed, but after the verdicts of not guilty in Numbers 2 and 3 were rendered, each of the other causes was ended with a "Noli Prosequi." There were other indictments against John Vanata and Michael Tygart, which evidently had their origin in the same matter as those against Gabriel Cox.

These causes will now be explained. The arrest of the persons named, and their trials for assault and battery, brought about complaints to the Virginia authorities, who in turn complained to the Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania; whereupon that body called upon Thomas Scott, the clerk of the court, for a report of the facts and circumstances.[1] Thus called upon, Mr. Scott wrote a letter to President Dickinson, dated Aug. 15, 1783,[2] in extracts from which a full explanation of the prosecutions referred to is given:

"... The case of Col. Cox is shortly thus: prosecutions were Instituted against him for assaults and Batteries in useing compulsory measures to draw forth the militia of Washington County, By virtue of orders issued by Col. Penticost in Character of Lieutenant of Yohogania county, for the Service of Genl. Clark's expedition down the Ohio in 1781. Which orders, as well the people who were thus compelled to service, as the Generality of the people of the county could not conceive to have proceeded from the authority of Virginia; not only because of the previous agreement of the Several Legislatures, but from the orders Given by that State on that occasion, to the Lieutenant of Monongalia county, viz.: that he should confine his authority to the South side of Dixon's and Mason's Line Extended, although the Greater part of that county lay north of that line; on this Ground as well as on full conviction of the Legal extension of the Jurisdiction of this State, the people very Generally disobeyed these orders, and these prosecutions were commenced.

"This being the true State of this Gentn's Case, and although his conduct on the occasion was exceedingly disrespectful to the court, He coming at the head of a party in a Tumultious & contemptious Manner, continuing about the Streets in that Manner until evening, and the same night an attempt was made upon the house in which the court was held, and part of it Thrown down; yet so far was personal resentment and party Spirit from mingling with the proceedings of the Court, that a disposition to soften the prosecution was observable in most of the officers, and Col. Cox was actually acquitted. How this Can be termed a Judgment against him for a Considerable sum, &c., I cannot understand. It is true that on account of his behaviour already mentioned, I charged him Clarks [clerk's] fees. There was Indictments against one other Gent, who was also acquitted and discharged without fees; and there is a Suit depending against two others for things of the same nature, done at the same time; But there never was a decision of Court against any Virginia officer, as such, for any cause whatever."

Mr. Scott does not tell us, what may have been the case, that the jurymen who sat in Col. Cox's cases, having been the most of them former Virginia adherents, may have been out with him the night that a part of the house in which the court was held was "Thrown down."

At this second term of court, held as stated Jan. 1, 1782, Thomas Smith and David Espy, resident members of the Bedford bar, were admitted as attorneys. Mr. Smith afterward became a justice of the Supreme Court. Quite a number of proceedings were instituted for the laying out of roads, and it seems to have been considered that the roads previously established under authority from the Virginia courts had no legal existence, and that it was necessary that they be again laid out by order of the Quarter Sessions of Washington County. So viewers were appointed to view a road from "Basset Town[3] to near Fort Pitt;" on another from "Basset Town to Redstone Ferry on Monongahela River;" on another from "Basset Town to the mouth of a gut about forty pearches below the mouth of Pigeon Creek;" on another from "Basset Town to Fort Decker on the Ohio;" on another from "John Canon Esquire's Mill to Samuel Johnson Esquire's Mill;" on another from "Body's (or Boly's) Mill to Fort Pitt." There were at this term twenty-eight criminal prosecutions,—one felony, ten assaults, seven tippling-houses, and there were seven prosecutions against females for fornication and bastardy.[4]

By an act of Assembly passed Jan. 22, 1777,[2] in force in 1783, the Spanish milled silver dollar was made equivalent to 7*s.* 6*d.*; the Pennsylvania shilling was therefore 13⅓ cents, and the cost of a good meal and sufficient drink can easily be ascertained.

It is not intended to follow up the records of the courts any further or to detail the facts of the causes celebrès, civil or criminal, which have had their place in our judicial history. Search is made only for those matters which will illustrate the development of the people into a better life. And the next inquiry is, were the whippping-post, the stocks, the pillory and the ducking-stool ever among the civilizing institutions of Washington County? As to the ducking-stool, the only instance of its erection in any part of the State west of the Alleghanies is the one ordered to be erected "at the confluence of the Ohio with the Monongohale," by the Augusta County Court on Feb. 22, 1775. No traces of the pillory have been found. But as to the stocks, upon the minutes of the board of county commissioners for 1784 is found the entry of an item for the tax levy as follows: "Laid on for making stocks by order of Henry Taylor, Esq., £4." And the existence of the whipping-post in the county must be admitted when the following record is read:

Henry Taylor continued to act as the presiding justice by virtue of being the first named in the general commission. But on Oct. 6, 1783, Dorsey Pentecost resigned his seat as a member of the Supreme Executive Council,[4] and applied to be appointed prothonotary and clerk for Washington County, and to have Mr. Scott transferred to the like offices for the new county of Fayette, then lately erected.[5] The Council, however, appointed Gen. Ephraim Douglass prothonotary and clerk for Fayette, and declined to remove Mr. Scott, but soon provided a place for Col. Pentecost, still pursuing the policy of conciliation toward the old Virginia partisans. The Council had the power to commission specially an appointee as president justice for any county,[6] although such power was not always exercised, and on Oct. 31, 1783,[7] that body "Resolved, That Dorsey Pentecost, Esquire, be appointed a Judge in and President of the Court of Common Pleas for the county of Washington," thus displacing Henry Taylor as president of that court, although he continued to act as the judge of the Quarter Sessions. Dorsey Pentecost held the office conferred upon him until Nov. 29, 1786,[8] when the Supreme Executive Council issued an order of which the following is a copy, taken from the original before the writer: 1786.

"Pennsylvania ss. [SEAL.] Charles Biddle.} The Supreme Executive Council for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

"To all to whom these presents shall come, GREETING:

"Know ye that—Whereas we have heretofore appointed Dorsey Pentecost, Esquire, of the County of Washington, to be President of the Court of Common Pleas, and a justice of the said Court of Common Pleas for the aforesaid County, and commissionated him accordingly;—And whereas the said Dorsey Pentecost has removed from the County aforesaid and is now settled in a Neighboring State,—We have therefore thought proper to Supersede the said appointment and Commissions, and do hereby supersede, revoke and make null and void the same, anything in the said Commissions contained to the contrary hereof in any wise notwithstanding.

Reorganization of Courts.—This last proceeding left the courts constituted as they had been prior to the appointment of Dorsey Pentecost 1788. as president, and they so remained until there was a reorganization on Sept. 30, 1788, as evidenced by the proceedings of Council of that date:[9]

"Henry Taylor, Esquire, was appointed and Commissionated a Justice of the Peace for the district of the township of Strabane: James Edgar, a Justice of the Peace for the District of the township of Smith, and William McFarland, a Justice of the Peace for the district of the township of Amwell, in the county of Washington, upon returns made according to law, for the said several districts.

"Henry Taylor, James Edgar, and William McFarland, Esquires, were also appointed and commissionated Justices of the Court of Common Pleas in and for the county of Washington.

"On Motion,

"Ordered, that said Henry Taylor, Esquire, be appointed and commissionated President of the Court of Common Pleas, of the Court of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace and of Jail delivery, and of the Orphans' Court of the county of Washington.

"Two returns of Justices from the districts of the townships of Cecil and Dickinson,[1] in the county of Washington, were read and not allowed, as the whole of Dickinson and part of Cecil district has been struck off to the county of Allegheny."

Thus Henry Taylor[2] is now specially commissioned as the president judge of the courts of this county, which offices he held until Alexander Addison succeeded him, commissioned under the constitution of 1790.

Reduction of Limits—New Counties.—But, as is observed, before the adoption of that Constitution, Washington County began to be reduced materially in her limits, two portions of her best territory being taken to help form two new counties on the north, while an entire new county is carved out of her possessions on the south. These reductions will now be made clear from the acts of Assembly authorizing them.

The first portion taken from Washington County was by the act of Sept. 24, 1788,[3] the preamble of which recites the inconveniences of the inhabitants of parts of the counties of Washington and Westmoreland from being situated so far from the "seat of judicature in their respective counties," etc.; and, that they should be relieved in the premises,

"SECT. II. Be it enacted, &c., That all those parts of Westmoreland and Washington counties lying within the limits and bounds hereinafter described shall be, and hereby are, erected into a separate county, that is to say, beginning at the mouth of Flaherty's run, on the south side of the Ohio river; from thence, by a straight line, to the plantation on which Joseph Scott, Esquire, now lives, on Montour's run, to include the same; from thence by a straight line to the mouth of Miller's run, on Chartiers creek; thence by a straight line to the mouth of Perry's mill run,[4] on the east side of Monongahela river; thence up said river, to the mouth of Becket's run; thence, by a straight line, to the mouth of Sewickley creek, on Youghiogheny river; thence down the said river to the mouth of Crawfords run; thence, by a straight line, to the mouth of Brush creek, on Turtle creek; thence up Turtle creek, to the main fork thereof; thence, by a northerly line, until it strikes Puckety's creek; thence down the said creek to the Allegheny river; thence up the Allegheny river to the northern boundary of the State; thence along the same to the western line of the State; thence along the same to the river Ohio; and thence up the same to the place of beginning; to be henceforth known and called by the name of Allegheny county."

On Sept. 17, 1789,[5] another act was passed, agreeably to the petition of the inhabitants of that part of the county of Washington included in the boundaries hereinafter mentioned, praying to be annexed to Allegheny County: 1789.

"SECT. II. Be it enacted, &c., That all that part of Washington County included by the following lines, viz., Beginning at the river Ohio, where the boundary line of the state crosses the said river, from thence in a straight line to White's mill,[6] on Raccoon creek, from thence by a straight line to Armstrong's mill, on Miller's run, and from thence by a straight line to the Monongahela river, opposite the mouth of Perry's run, where it strikes the present line of the county of Allegheny, be . . . annexed to the said county of Allegheny."

Having lost a large portion of our possessions on the north, an effort to erect a new county out of our southern territory, thus shutting us off from the celebrated Mason and Dixon's line, is finally successful by means of an act passed Feb. 9, 1796,[7] of which there is copied: 1796.

"SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That all that part of Washington county lying within the limits and bounds hereinafter described shall be, and is hereby, erected into a separate county, that is to say, beginning at the mouth of Ten-Mile creek, on the Monongahela river; thence up Ten-Mile creek to the junction of the north and south forks of said creek; thence up said north fork to Colonel William Wallace's mills;[8] thence up a southwesterly direction to the nearest part of the dividing ridge between the north and south forks of Ten-Mile creek; thence along the top of the said ridge to the ridge which divides the waters of Ten-Mile and Wheeling creeks; thence a straight line to the head of Enlow's branch of the Wheeling; thence down said branch to the western boundary line of the state; thence south along said line to the southern boundary line of the state; thence east along said line to the river Monongahela; and thence down the said river to the place o beginning; to be henceforth known and called by the name of Greene county."

On Jan. 22, 1802,[9] an act of Assembly was passed modifying the Greene County line somewhat, and returning to us a small portion of the territory taken in 1796: 1802.

"SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act, the following alteration shall take place in the line between the counties of Washington and Greene, viz.: beginning at the present line, on the ridge that divides the waters of Ten-Mile and Wheeling creeks, near Jacob Bobbet's; thence a straight line to the head-waters of Hunter's fork of Wheeling creek; and thence down the same to the mouth thereof, where it meets the present county line."

But, a little prior to the act last quoted, another new county was erected to the north of us, to which a contribution was made by Washington County, by virtue of an act of Assembly dated March 26, 1800:[10] 1800.

[1] Dickinson township, Washington County, had been erected from that part of Peters lying along the right bank of the Chartiers, down to the river, in the winter of 1784–85. The return of the first constables elected therefor was to March term, 1785, of the Quarter Sessions.

[2] Henry Taylor, as we have seen, had come to the "Rich Hills," where his grandson, Matthew, now resides, in the fall of 1770, from Cecil County, Maryland. Late in life he built the brick house on the property lately owned by William McClane, now by George Munce, where he lived until his death, Oct. 8, 1801, sixty-three years of age. He was the father of nine children,—Matthew, Henry, George, John, James, Joseph, Jane (married a Daggs), Mary (married a Patton), and Eliza (married Dr. Layton). By his son Matthew he was the grandfather of Matthew, now on part of the old homestead, and William H. Taylor, of Washington. J. F. Taylor, Esq., a member of the Washington bar, is a great-grandson, as is also the present excellent prothonotary, John W. Seaman. On the 19th April, 1793, which was during Wayne's expedition against the Indians, he was commissioned by Governor Mifflin "Brigadier General of the Brigade composed of the Militia of the County of Washington, other than the Townships of Greene, Cumberland, Morgan, Franklin and East Bethlehem, in the said County." These townships, except the last named, were in what is now Greene County.

Since the erection of Greene County, and the modification of its line in 1802, there has been no change of the limits of Washington County. With all her losses she is still of magnificent proportions.[2] And now, at the time of which we write, a new generation of men are about to take hold of public affairs, and our judicial system to be materially changed.

Under the Constitution of 1790.—The Constitution of 1776, Section 30, provided that out of the two or more persons chosen for each ward, township, or district, the president in Council should commission one for each ward, township, or district, to serve for seven years, removable for misconduct by the General Assembly. All of these justices could sit in the Quarter Sessions, though only such as were specially selected and commissioned therefor could hear causes in the Common Pleas and Orphans' Courts. Hence, in 1788, there began to be a new set of justices of the County Courts, who were as follows:

Henry Taylor, President,	commissioned	Sept. 30, 1788.
James Edgar, Associate,	"	Sept. 30, 1788.

But the new Constitution, adopted in convention on Sept. 2, 1790,[4] made quite a radical change in the judicial system, the nature of which was as follows: By Section II. the judges of the Supreme Court and of the several courts of Common Pleas were to hold their offices during good behavior; removal by the Governor on the address of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature.[5] 1790.

For the Court of Common Pleas, which now became the principal court, by Section IV. the Governor was to appoint in each county "not fewer than three, nor more than four, judges," who during their continuance in office should reside in such county. The State was to be divided by law into circuits, none of which to include "more than six nor fewer than three" counties, and there was to be appointed a president of the courts in each circuit, who during his continuance in office should reside therein. "The president and judges, any two of whom shall be a quorum, shall compose the respective Courts of Common Pleas."

By Section VII. the judges of the Court of Common Pleas of each county, any two of whom should be a quorum, should compose the Court of Quarter Sessions of the Peace and Orphans' Court thereof, and the register of wills, together with the said judges, or any two of them, should compose the Register's Court of each county.

Of justices of the peace, now no longer members of the County Court, by Section X. the Governor was to appoint a competent number, "in such convenient districts in each county as are or shall be directed by law." These were to be commissioned during good behavior, but were removable on conviction of misbehavior in office, or of any infamous crime, or on the address of both houses of the Legislature.

In the selection of sheriffs and coroners there was no substantial change. Two persons for each office were chosen by the electors; one (and either) was commissioned to serve for three years. The sheriff could not be twice chosen in six years. The prothonotary and clerk (one person might hold these offices) was appointed and commissioned as heretofore by the Governor.

By Sections III. and IV. of the schedule to this Constitution all officers except judges of the Supreme Court in the appointment of the executive department were to continue in the exercise of their duties until Sept. 1, 1791 (unless their commissions should sooner expire by limitation, or the offices become vacant by death or resignation), and no longer; and until that date justice was to be administered in the

[2] According to the Report of the Secretary of Internal Affairs for 1881, p. 60 A., the county contains: square miles, 889; acres, 568,960; population in 1880, 55,417. To illustrate the county's growth in population, as compared with the surrounding counties, the following table is copied from Mr. Veech, Centenary Memorial, 342:

	1790.	1800.	1810.	1820.
Westmoreland	16,018	22,726	26,392	30,540
Washington	24,866	28,298	36,289	40,038

Greene	.....	8,665	12,544	15,554
Beaver	.....	5,776	12,168	15,340

In considering this table, remember that in 1800 Allegheny and Westmoreland contained parts of Armstrong, and Westmoreland the greater part of Indiana.

several counties "by the same justices, in the same courts, and in the same manner as heretofore."

Preparatory for the reorganization of the judiciary system under the foregoing Constitution, the 1791. General Assembly on April 13, 1791, passed an act,[1] in which was provided:

"SECT. II. And be it further enacted, etc., That, in order to render effectual the provisions made in the said constitution for establishing the courts of Common Pleas, this Commonwealth shall be, and hereby is, divided into five districts, or circuits, to be limited as follows, that is to say: [1st, Philadelphia, Bucks, Montgomery, and Delaware; 2d, Chester, Lancaster, York, and Dauphin; 3d, Berks, Northampton, Luzerne, and Northumberland; 4th, Cumberland, Franklin, Bedford, Huntingdon, and Mifflin]; and the fifth circuit, or district, to consist of the counties of Westmoreland, Fayette, Washington, and Allegheny."

The Section III. of this act provided that in and for each of the said districts, or circuits, a "person of knowledge and integrity, skilled in the laws, shall be appointed and commissioned by the Governor to be President and Judge of the Courts of Common Pleas within such district," and for the appointment and commissioning of a number of "other proper persons, not fewer than three nor more than four," as judges, whose term of office should begin on Sept. 1, 1791.

Hon. Alexander Addison.—The first president appointed for the Fifth District under this act was Alexander Addison, whose commission bears date Aug. 22, 1791, and who served until succeeded by Samuel Roberts, in 1803. His associate judges during his term were Hons. Henry Taylor, James Edgar, James Allison, and Matthew Ritchie, commissioned Aug. 17, 1791; Hon. William Hoge, commissioned April 6, 1798; and Hon. John McDowell, commissioned April 7, 1802.

Hon. Alexander Addison was a native of ~~Ireland~~ Scotland, born in 1759, educated at Edinburgh, Scotland, and licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Aberlowe. While still young he emigrated to Pennsylvania, and coming to the West, on the 21st day of December, 1785, was taken under the charge of the Redstone Presbytery, and permission given him to preach within its bounds.[2] For a short time he preached at Washington, then turned his attention to the law, and, studying with David Reddick, Esq., was admitted to the bar of Washington County in March, 1787. It has been said that he settled at Pittsburgh, but advertisements and correspondence in the Western Telegraphe in the winter of 1795 and 1796 show that he then resided in Washington.

"He was a man of culture, erudition, correct principles and thoroughly imbued with love for the good of society. These characteristics are seen in his letters, essays, charges to Grand-juries and the reports of his judicial decisions. They embrace a scope of thought and strength of logic, marking a fine intellect and extensive knowledge; and they exhibit a patriotism of the purest lustre, set in a bright constellation of virtues.

"Judge Addison lived and executed his functions among a sturdy people, amid the troubles, excitements, dangers and factions, which followed the adoption of the Federal Constitution of 1787, and attended the enforcement of the Excise law of the United States, which culminated in the Whiskey Insurrection of 1794. His patriotic instincts and love of the public welfare led him by means of charges to the grand juries, to discuss frequently the underlying principles of government, the supremacy of the laws, and the necessity of due subordination to rightful authority, a duty which he felt urgently incumbent upon him in the disturbed condition of affairs. Though at the time controverted by partisanship and hatred of authority, owing to the peculiar hardships of the early settlers, these efforts are at this day among the best expositions of the principles of free government, the necessity of order and obedience to law. No one can read his charge to the Grand-jury of Allegheny county, September 1, 1794, without feeling himself in the presence of and listening with uncovered head to a great man, whose virtues of heart equaled his qualities of head."[3]

During the time of the Whiskey Insurrection and for some years after there was a strong party rancor existing, the political parties of the day being the Federal and Anti-Federal or "Repub- 1794. lican." Judge Addison, being identified with the former, fell a victim to the partisan hostility of the latter. An associate on the Allegheny County bench was Hon. John B. Lucas, by whom and whose friends was brought about Judge Addison's impeachment before the Senate of Pennsylvania. The bitterness of the day magnified a mole-hill, if 1802. anything, into a mountain. In its full effect the matter complained of was that Judge Addison had interfered with Judge Lucas in the latter's attempt to instruct juries in opposition to what the former believed to be the law. As formulated the charges were:

"1st. That Judge Addison, after Judge Lucas 'had in his official character and capacity of judge as aforesaid, and as he of right might do, addressed a petit jury then and there duly impanneled and sworn or affirmed respectively as jurors in a cause then pending, then and there openly did declare and say to the said jury, that the address delivered to them by the said John Lucas, had nothing to do with the question before them and they ought not to pay any attention to it.'

"This 'question' will be better understood by lawyers when informed that a justification was pleaded as a defense in an action of slander, and was unsupported by the testimony, and Judge Lucas' charge was intended to reduce the damages of the Plaintiff to a small, if not a nominal sum.

"2nd. That the said Alexander Addison 'did under pretense as aforesaid of discharging and performing his official duties then and there in time of open court, unjustly, illegally, and unconstitutionally stop, threaten, and prevent the said John Lucas, from addressing as of right he might do, a Grand-jury of the said county of Allegheny then and there assembled,' &c.

"A very marked omission in these articles is the intent. No malice is averred, and no intent to act injuriously and oppressively. The first charge is followed only by a legal inference, viz: 'thereby degrading or endeavoring to degrade and villify the said John B. Lucas;' the second, 'thereby abusing and attempting to degrade the high office of President judge as aforesaid.'"[4]

The sentence of the Senate, delivered on 1803. Jan. 27, 1803, was:

"That Alexander Addison, President of the several courts of Common Pleas, in the fifth district of this State, shall be, and he hereby is removed from his office of President aforesaid, and also is disqualified to hold and exercise the office of Judge, in any court of law, within the commonwealth of Pennsylvania."

He who reads the report of this trial of Judge Addison will be filled with admiration for the true greatness manifested by the illustrious defendant, but none the less with contempt for the indignities put upon him, and will wonder that partisan zeal could so blind the men who sat as his judges. He did not long survive the shameful injustice of this impeachment, dying at Pittsburgh, where he then resided, on Nov. 24, 1807.[1]

Hon. Samuel Roberts.—On June 2, 1803, Samuel Roberts was commissioned president judge of the Fifth District, which office he held until succeeded in 1818 by Judge Baird. His associates during his term were the old associates, still surviving, and Rev. Boyd Mercer, commissioned Jan. 1, 1806. But soon after Judge Roberts' term began, by Section XII. of the act of Feb. 24, 1806,[2] another county was added to the Fifth District, which was then composed of Beaver, Allegheny, Washington, Fayette, and Greene. By the same act it was also provided,— 1803. 1806.

"SECT. XV. And be it further enacted, etc., That if a vacancy should hereafter happen in any county at present organized by the death, resignation, or removal of any associate judge, or otherwise, the Governor shall not supply the same, unless the number of associates shall be thereby reduced to less than two; in which case, or in case of any county hereafter organized, he shall commission so many as will complete that number in each county, and no more."

It was by the section quoted that the associate judges of the county were reduced to two in number, which continued until that office was abolished by the Constitution of 1874.

Hon. Samuel Roberts was born in Philadelphia, Sept. 10, 1761. His ancestors came to Pennsylvania with the first emigrants, and his grandfather, Owen Roberts, was sheriff of Philadelphia County, 1716–21. He was educated in Philadelphia, studied law with Hon. William Lewis, of that city, and was there admitted to the bar in 1793. The same year, at York, Pa., he married Miss Maria Heath. Subsequently, to practice his profession, he removed to Lancaster, thence to Sunbury; and while at the latter place was commissioned by Governor McKean to succeed Judge Addison, after the latter's removal by his unrighteous impeachment, and the same year removed to Pittsburgh. Upon the change made in the districts by the act of 1818, directly to be noticed, he ceased to sit as judge in Washington County, but continued as the president judge of the old Fifth District, by that act composed of Beaver, Butler, and Allegheny Counties, until his death at Pittsburgh in 1820. While upon the bench he wrote and published "Roberts' Digest of British Statutes in force in Pennsylvania," a work well known to the profession, a new edition of which was edited by Hon. Robert E. Wright and published in 1847.[3]

As already intimated, Washington County is no longer embraced in the old Fifth District. By the act of March 23, 1818,[4] after the creation of a new Fifth District, composed of Beaver, Butler, and Allegheny Counties, it was provided by 1818.

"SECT. 3. And be it further enacted, etc., That from and after the third Monday of October next the counties of Washington, Fayette, and Greene and Somerset shall be, and the same are hereby, erected into a separate judicial district, to be called a Fourteenth District, and a person of legal knowledge and integrity shall be appointed and commissioned by the Governor to be President and Judge, etc."

Hon. Thomas H. Baird.—Thereupon, on Oct. 19, 1818, Hon. Thomas H. Baird was commissioned as president judge, holding that office till he was succeeded by Judge Ewing in 1838. His associates during his term were Rev. Boyd Mercer, John Hamilton, and Thomas McKeever, Esqs.

The Fourteenth District was of long duration. It was modified by the act of March 29, 1824,[5] in this, that Somerset was taken to form with Franklin and Bedford the new Sixteenth District, leaving Washington, Fayette, and Greene to constitute the Fourteenth District, unchanged until by the act of Jan. 23, 1866, the Twenty-seventh District was created.[6] 1824.

Hon. Thomas H. Baird was the third son of Dr. Absalom Baird, one of the early and leading physicians, as well as a prominent civilian, of Washington County. Dr. Baird's father was John Baird, a Scotchman, who came to America with Braddock's army, and shared in "Braddock's Defeat," on July 9, 1755. He is said to have been killed on Grant's Hill (in Pittsburgh), in the defeat of Major Grant and his Highlanders, Sept. 14, 1758. Absalom Baird, educated by the widowed mother, studied medicine in Chester County, became a surgeon of the Pennsylvania line in the Revolutionary war, and in 1786 removed with his family to Washington, Pa. He was

[1] Judge Addison left to survive him his widow, who removed to Washington after his death; three sons,—John, who died without issue; Alexander, a brilliant young man, who studied law at Washington, and was admitted to the bar December, 1820, and in 1822 was accidentally killed by the falling of the chimney of a burning building in Washington; William, first studied law with Hon. T. M. T. McKennan, then medicine at Paris, and became an eminent physician, settled at Pittsburgh, married a Miss Ingles, and left among other children two sons, one of whom died abroad, the other, William, is at present a member of the Pittsburgh bar; four daughters,—Eliza, married Dr. Peter Mowry, and was the mother of four sons, none of whom survived her; Mary, married Samuel Hughes Fitzhugh, and left one son, who settled at Rochester, N. Y.; Jane, married first Alexander Johnston; second, Benjamin Darlington, by whom she left two children,—Benjamin, late postmaster at Pittsburgh, and a daughter who never married. Ann died about 1854, unmarried.

[3] Judge Roberts left eight children, five sons and three daughters. One of the daughters was married to the late Oldham Craig, deceased, for many years teller in the old Bank of Pittsburgh, and brother of the well-known historian, Neville B. Craig, deceased. Another daughter died many years ago, and the third resides in Michigan. Of the five sons,—Samuel, Edward J., Henry, Horatio, and Morgan,—all have died except Henry, who practiced medicine at Brownsville, Pa., and now resides in Fayette County. Edward J. was a paymaster in the United States army during the war of 1812, then clerk of the U. S. District Court for Western Pennsylvania till his death, leaving three sons,—Gen. Richard Biddle Roberts, practicing law at Chicago, Edward J. Roberts, city engineer for Allegheny City, Pa., and John H. Roberts, profession unknown.

commissioned a justice of the Common Pleas in 1789, was county lieutenant in 1792, sheriff in 1799, and died on Oct. 27, 1805.[1]

Judge Baird was born in Washington, Pa., Nov. 15, 1787; was educated at a classical school, under charge of David Johnston, in Brooke County, Va.; studied the law with Joseph Pentecost, and was admitted to the bar of Washington County in July, 1808, before he was quite twenty-one. His contemporaries at the bar were men of such ability that he must have been of high standing himself when he was commissioned president judge, on Oct. 19, 1818. His activity of mind led him much into business outside of the law, having been interested with Thomas McGiffin and Parker Campbell in the construction of the National road through Washington County, as well as in a number of manufacturing enterprises. The first survey for the Chartiers Valley Railroad, about 1830 or 1831, one of the first railroads prospected, was made largely, if not wholly, at his expense, so much was he interested in the internal improvements of his 1837. county. In December, 1837, he resigned his commission as judge, and removing to Pittsburgh, was engaged in the active practice of his profession there for about twelve years. He then retired to his farm near Monongahela City, where he resided until his death. In 1854 he was the candidate of the Native American party for judge of the Supreme Court, Hon. J. S. Black, the Democratic candidate, being the successful competitor. While at his leisure on his farm he was the author of many newspaper and pamphlet publications upon different subjects of social and political importance. Although denied a collegiate education, yet his classical attainments were great, and philological studies were to him a constant recreation. He was somewhat impulsive and irascible upon the bench, but always commanded respect for his sincerity, and confidence in his integrity. He died at the residence of his son-in-law, Charles McKnight, in Allegheny City, Nov. 22, 1866, and is buried in the cemetery at Washington.[2]

Hon. Nathaniel Ewing.—There being now a vacancy, and the office of president judge being still filled by appointment, on the 15th day of Feb-

1838. ruary, 1838, Hon. Nathaniel Ewing was commissioned by Governor Ritner to succeed Mr. Baird, and held the office until succeeded by Judge Gilmore, in 1848. During his term his associates were, as one set succeeded another, Rev. Boyd Mercer, Thomas McKeever, Samuel Hill, John Grayson, and James Gordon, Esquires.

Under the Constitution of 1838.—But the people of Pennsylvania by their delegates in convention, on Feb. 22, 1838,[3] amended the Constitution of 1790, in many particulars changing the judicial system. The constitution as amended, however, was not to be effective until Jan. 1, 1839.

By Article V., Section II.:

"... The president judges of the several courts of Common Pleas, and of such other courts of Record as are or shall be established by law, and all other judges required to be learned in the law, shall hold their offices for the term of ten years if they shall so long behave themselves well. The Associate judges of the courts of Common Pleas shall hold their offices for the term of five years if they shall so long behave themselves well. But for any reasonable cause which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment the Governor may remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature. . . ."

No substantial change was made in the organization or jurisdiction of the courts; but by Article VI., Sections I. and III., sheriffs, coroners, prothonotaries, and clerks were also made elective by the people, one for each office in the case of the sheriff and coroner, though as to the others the Legislature might provide whether they be held by one person or separately by two.

By Section VII. of the schedule the commissions of the law judges who should not have held their offices for ten years at the adoption of the amendments were to expire on the 27th of February next after the end of ten years from the date of their commissions, which provision enabled Judge Ewing, though appointed before the amended Constitution went into effect, to continue in office until Feb. 27, 1848.

Hon. Nathaniel Ewing was the son of William Ewing, Esq., and grandson of George Ewing, of Peach Bottom, York Co., who, it is said, was a cousin of the celebrated Rev. Dr. John Ewing, provost of the University of Pennsylvania, at Philadelphia, and one of the commissioners in the boundary line controversy. William Ewing, his father, came into Fayette County as a surveyor about 1790, and married Mary, daughter of Jehu Conwell, and settled in the Dunlap's Creek neighborhood, near Heistersburg. Nathaniel was born July 18, 1794, educated at Washington College, under the presidency of Dr. Matthew Brown, graduating with the honors of his class; taught a year in Delaware; returning to Washington studied law with Hon. Thomas McGiffin, and was admitted to the bar of Washington County in June, 1816. The next year he removed to Uniontown, Pa., where he began his professional business, and where he resided until his death. Appointed in 1838 to fill the vacancy in the office of president judge, caused by Judge Baird's resignation, his appointment would have been for life had not the amendment to the Constitution limited it to one for ten years. While he was upon the bench it was said

[2] The wife of Mr. Baird was Nancy McCullough, who survived him, but has since died. His children, Ellen, widow of Hon. R. R. Reed; Susannah and Jane, who died young; Sarah, widow of Mr. George Morgan; Mary, widow of Joseph Patterson, mother of T. H. B. Patterson, of Pittsburgh bar; Absalom, died young; Harriet; Eliza Acheson, wife of Mr. Robert Patterson, of the Presbyterian Banner; Thomas H., of the present Washington County bar; Susan C., died a young lady; Margaret; Emma, died a young lady; and Jane, widow of Charles McKnight, of Allegheny City.

of him by one of the judges of the Supreme Court himself a great lawyer, that he was the best Common Pleas judge in the State. The younger generation of the members of our bar often hear his name as a judge and lawyer mentioned by our elders, who practiced under him, in terms of very high respect. On his return to the bar he engaged in trials in court but occasionally, turning his attention to a great extent more to outside business enterprises, in which he was successful in accumulating much wealth. He never sought or accepted official preferment of any kind outside of his profession, though an ardent Whig in all political contests of his day. He died in 1874, in the eightieth year of his age.[1]

Hon. Samuel A. Gilmore.—The ten years' term of Judge Ewing having expired by virtue of the limitation referred to, Hon. Samuel A. Gil- 1848. more, on Feb. 28, 1848, was appointed and commissioned by Governor Shunk to succeed him as president judge. His associates during the time he presided in the courts of our county were Isaac Hodgens, William Vankirk, Abraham Wotring, John Freeman, James G. Hart, and Jacob Slagle, Esqs., as one set succeeded another.

Amendment of 1850.—But the Constitution as amended in 1838 was afterwards the subject of several additional amendments, one of which affecting the judiciary was that adopted by the General Assemblies of 1849 and 1850,[2] and ratified by the people in the October election of 1850, and 1850. which, wisely or unwisely, brought the selection of all the judges of the State directly within the power of the people. All the judges then became elective:

". . . The Judges of the Supreme Court by the qualified electors of the Commonwealth at large; the president judges of the several Courts of Common Pleas, and of such other courts of record as are or shall be established by law, and all other judges required to be learned in the law, by the qualified electors of the respective districts over which they are to preside or act as judges; and the Associate Judges of the courts of Common Pleas by the qualified electors of the county respectively."

There was no change made in the terms of the president judge and of his associates, and it was provided that the first election should take place at the next general election after the adoption of that amendment, and the commissions of all the judges then in office should expire on the first Monday of December following, when the terms of the new judges then elected should commence.

At the first general election held after this amendment was adopted, the second Tuesday of October, 1851, Hon. Samuel A. Gilmore was chosen by the people, commissioned by Governor 1851. Bigler on Nov. 6, 1851, and served from the first Monday of December of that year until succeeded by Judge Lindsey in 1861.

Judge Gilmore was the grandson of James Gilmore, Esq., who many years ago occupied the farm now owned by James G. Strean, Esq., a short distance southwest of Washington. His father, John Gilmore, studied the law at Washington, was admitted in August, 1801, and removing to Butler, Pa., married a Miss Purviance at that place, and there practiced his profession. The son, Samuel A. Gilmore, was born at Butler, studied the law, and was practicing there and in adjoining counties when first appointed president judge to succeed Judge Ewing in 1848. His first wife was a daughter of Judge Todd, at one time of the Supreme Court, and his second wife was a daughter of Arnold Plumer, Esq., of Venango County, who still survives him as his widow. Upon his appointment as president judge of the Fourteenth District he removed to Uniontown, Pa., where he resided till his death in May, 1873.

Hon. James Lindsey.—At the general election in 1861, in a contest with Hon. James Veech, of Uniontown, James Lindsey, Esq., of the Waynesburg bar, was the successful candidate, and 1861. having been duly commissioned, began his term of service as the president judge of the Fourteenth District on the first Monday of December, 1861. His associates during his service, too soon ended by his death, were James G. Hart and Thomas McCarrell, Esqs.

Hon. James Lindsey had the blood of the first settlers in his veins. Thomas Hughes, John Swan, and Henry Vanmetre were among the first pioneers on the waters of Muddy Creek, coming thither from the Shenandoah Valley in 1767–68. Charles Swan, son of John, married Sarah, daughter of Henry Vanmetre, and their daughter Mary, marrying William Collins, became the mother of Anne Collins, who married John Lindsey, and became the mother of James, the young judge. John Lindsey's father was James Lindsey, a Scotchman, who, coming from Lancaster County very early, settled at Jefferson, Greene County, and married Mary, a daughter of Thomas Hughes, Jr., who had married a daughter of John Swan, before mentioned. Hughes was Irish, Swan was Scotch, Vanmetre German, Lindsey Scotch,—three nationalities well blended into one. John Lindsey, the judge's father, was educated at Jefferson College, at Canonsburg, was a leading politician, once sheriff, and twice prothonotary of Greene County.

Hon. James Lindsey was the oldest of eleven children, six of whom survive him. He was born Nov. 21, 1827, received his education at Greene Academy, Carmichael's, Greene Co., was admitted to the bar of Waynesburg May 15, 1849, and elected judge in October, 1861, when not quite thirty-four years of age. At the August term, 1864, he was upon the bench at Washington, but had been ill with what was thought a slight attack of bilious fever before coming hither. On his way home after the end of the term he became too ill at Prosperity to proceed, and there remained overnight, but recovered so as to reach his residence, about six miles beyond Waynesburg, the next day. He was not considered seriously ill till on Thursday, Sept. 1, 1864, and died late that night. At once bar-meetings were held at Washington, Waynesburg, and Uniontown, at each of which minutes were prepared to be filed with the records, testifying the appreciation in which he was held by the bar of his entire district. In the minutes made by the Fayette County bar it was said,—

[1] In 1822, Mr. Ewing married Jane, the second daughter of Judge John Kennedy, of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania; she was the mother of one child, Hon. John K. Ewing (in late years also our president judge), and died in 1827. His second wife, who survives him as his widow, is the daughter of the late Rev. David Denny, of Chambersburg, Pa. By this marriage there are two children, a son Alexander, and a daughter Mary, lately married to Prof. J. J. Stephenson, who was connected with the geological survey of Pennsylvania in 1876. Hon. John Hoge Ewing, of Washington, still survives his brother, Judge Ewing, and of him there will be a sketch given in another part of this work.

"He came to the bench at . . . an age at which few members of the profession have more than mastered its rudiments, and scarcely any acquired distinction. By those unacquainted with him misgivings were naturally felt when the judicial ermine fell upon one so young. . . . But whatever fears Judge Lindsey's youth occasioned were quickly dissipated by the masterly hand with which he laid hold of his official duties, and by the apparent ease with which he carried his great burdens. How he has borne himself in his high office,—faithfully, impartially, without fear and without favor,—with what transcendent ability he has so discharged his grave and important duties, that upon not one act of his can the fault-finder lay his finger, to not one act of his can those who have the largest interest in his memory and cherish it most fervently revert with other than honest pride, and with the conviction that he did all and no more than became him, and that no man could have done better."

These sentiments were common to the profession of the district upon the sudden death of Hon. James Lindsey.[1]

After the death of Judge Lindsey, Governor Curtin, the war Governor of Pennsylvania, on Nov. 9, 1864, issued a commission to James Watson, Esq., of the Washington County bar, to hold the office of president judge of the district until the next general election in 1865. This commission was a surprise to Mr. Watson, as neither he nor his friends had asked for it, and it was declined, although with gratitude for the unsought honor.[2]

[1] Judge Lindsey married Sarah, daughter of Dr. Arthur Ingram, a leading physician of Greene County in his day. His widow, three sons, and one daughter survive him. His brother, W. C. Lindsey, was captain of Company A, Eighteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, and was killed in the streets of Hagerstown, Md., while leading a charge against Lee's retreating army three days after the battle of Gettysburg. A younger brother, R. H. Lindsey, is a successful young member of the Fayette County bar.

[2] Mr. Watson was born at Canonsburg about 1809, graduated at Jefferson College in 1828, and at once began the study of the law at Washington under the direction of the distinguished Hon. T. M. T. McKennan. He was admitted to the bar in October, 1831, and was at once taken into partnership with his preceptor, who then represented this district in Congress. This partnership continued until William McKennan, the son of his preceptor (now circuit judge of the United States for the Third Circuit), came to the bar, to wit, in June, 1837. He then continued the practice without a subsequent partnership until his death at his residence in Washington on April 15, 1875. The minutes of the bar meeting held the next day after his death very correctly state:

"As a lawyer he was clearheaded, painstaking, laborious, full of zeal for his clients, courteous to his opponents, pleasant and affable in his deportment to his brethren of the bar, while at all times and under all circumstances he was strictly honorable and upright. He was fond of his profession, few more so, but he had no ambition to make it a stepping-stone to office or preferment of any kind; and although he possessed in a high degree the elements of personal popularity, he uniformly declined political honors, and would never consent to be an applicant or candidate for any office whatever. He would not even allow honors to be thrust upon him, preferring always to be and remain in the ranks of his untitled brethren."

His wife, a sister of D. T. Morgan, Esq., survived him, and he is represented in the profession now by three sons,—David T., of Pittsburgh, James, New York City, and Wm. M., Pittsburgh.

Hon. J. Kennedy Ewing.—There was then a vacancy in the office of president judge, whereupon, on Nov. 19, 1864, J. Kennedy Ewing, the only son of Hon. Nathaniel Ewing by his first wife, 1864. the daughter of Justice Kennedy, was appointed and commissioned by Governor Curtin to fill the office until the next general election in 1865. His associates for his short term of service were James G. Hart and Thomas McCarroll, Esqs., and the manner in which his duties were discharged was satisfactory to the bar and suitors.[3]

At the general election Oct. 10, 1865, Hon. J. K. Ewing and Hon. S. A. Gilmore were the candidates for the office, the latter being successful, his next term, the third for which he was commis- 1865. sioned, to begin on the first Monday of December, 1865. But after that date the first term of the courts for Washington County was in February, 1866, before which latter date, however, to wit, on Jan. 25, 1866, an act of Assembly[4] was passed, by which Washington County was taken out of the old Fourteenth District, created in 1818, and with Beaver County made into a new district, called the Twenty-seventh. By the provisions of the act the Governor was to "appoint and commission a gentleman of integrity, learned in the law, to be president judge of said district, who shall hold his office until the first Monday of December next;" and at the next general election a president judge was to be elected under the then Constitution and laws of the State.

Hon. B. B. Chamberlin.—For the new Twenty-seventh Judicial District, composed of the counties of Washington and Beaver, on Feb. 3, 1866, Hon. B. B. Chamberlin, of the Beaver County bar, 1866. was appointed and commissioned by Governor Curtin as president judge, to hold until the first Monday of the following December, by which time an elected officer would be chosen. He presided at the May and August terms, 1866.

Hon. A. W. Acheson.—At the general election of October, 1866, the competing candidates were Hon. Alexander W. Acheson, of the Washington bar, as the nominee of the Republican party, and Hon. B. B.

His widow, three sons, and one daughter survive him. His brother, W. C. Lindsey, was captain of Company A, Eighteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, and was killed in the streets of Hagerstown, Md., while leading a charge against Lee's retreating army three days after the battle of Gettysburg. A younger brother, R. H. Lindsey, is a successful young member of the Fayette County bar.

[3] Judge J. K. Ewing is still living at Uniontown, but his attention being given to business pursuits he is not in active practice. He is represented, however, at the bar of his native county by two promising sons, Nathaniel Ewing, Jr., and Samuel E. Ewing.

Chamberlin, who, though previously a Republican, had been placed on the Democratic ticket. Mr. Acheson was elected, and on Nov. 15, 1866, was commissioned by Governor Curtin, and held his full term of ten years until succeeded by Judge Hart. His associates during his term were, first, James C. Chambers and John Farrer, Esqs.; second, Dr. Thomas W. Bradley and John Scott, Esqs.

During the time of Judge Acheson another somewhat important change was made in the judicial system. On Nov. 3, 1873, a new State Constitution was adopted in convention, which by the terms of the schedule went into effect Jan. 1, 1874. Article V. of this Constitution related to the judiciary, and it was provided by

"SECT. 5. Whenever a county shall contain forty thousand inhabitants it shall constitute a separate judicial district, and shall elect one judge learned in the law, and the General Assembly shall provide for additional judges as the business of the said districts may require. Counties containing a population less than is sufficient to constitute separate districts shall be formed into convenient single districts, or, if necessary, may be attached to contiguous districts as the General Assembly may provide. The office of associate judge, not learned in the law, is abolished in counties forming separate districts, but the several associate judges in office when this Constitution shall be adopted shall serve for their unexpired terms."

There was no other material change made in the organization of the courts; the judges remained, and will probably long remain, to be elected by the people.

The census of 1870 having shown that Washington County had a population of forty-five thousand six hundred and ninety, by the foregoing section she was entitled to be made a separate judicial district. Section XIII. of the schedule required the General Assembly at next session after the adoption of the Constitution to designate the several judicial districts as required by this Constitution. Whereupon by the act of April 9, 1874,[1] the Legislature created forty-three judicial districts, the twenty-seventh of which was to be composed of the county of Washington. And such is the number and composition of that district at this day. The time of the beginning of the judicial term has, however, been changed. Instead of the first Monday of December, as of old, by the act of April 30, 1874,[2] the term of all judges learned in the law is to begin on the first Monday of January next succeeding their election.

The terms of the associate judges, Dr. T. W. Bradley and John Scott, Esqs., expired the last day of November, 1876, and that office having been abolished by the Constitution of 1874, these gentlemen were the last to hold those positions in Washington County. The president judge continued upon the bench, but alone.

Hon. A. W. Acheson is the son of David Acheson, who emigrated from the County Armagh, Ireland, in 1788, and came directly to Washington, Pa., to join his brothers, John and Thomas, who had preceded him. John was a merchant and trader in the West as early as 1784; Thomas came hither in 1786, and having a turn for military affairs became a commissary-general in the war of 1812. The brothers were of Scotch lineage, sons of George Acheson, an elder of the seceding congregation of Market Hill, County Armagh. David Acheson in his early life was much interested in politics, connected with the "Republican" party of that day, representing Washington County in the Legislature in 1795, 1796, 1797, and 1804. Alexander W. Acheson was the second child of David by his second wife, Mary, daughter of John Wilson, Esq., who settled at Washington in 1789. He was born on July 14, 1809, at Philadelphia, where his parents resided for a time after their marriage; was educated at Washington College, graduated in 1827, studied the law with William Baird, brother of Judge Baird, and was admitted to the bar in June, 1832. After a short time passed in the West he began the practice of his profession in his native town, and with the exception of several terms of service as deputy attorney-general for Washington County, before by the act of May 3, 1850,[3] the election of district attorneys by the people was required, and his term as president judge, he has never held any public office. At the end of his term he returned to the bar, and associated with his son, Markus C., and nephew, James I. Brownson, Jr. He is still in active practice as the senior member of the Washington bar, having been, either as lawyer or judge, for fifty years employed in the courts of justice of Washington County.

Hon. George S. Hart.—At the general election in October, 1876, the competitors for the office of president judge were Hon. A. W. Acheson, on the Republican side, and George S. Hart, Esq., on the Democratic ticket. The latter gentleman was chosen and took his seat as president judge on the first Monday of January, 1877, which office he occupies at the present time. The paternal grandfather of Hon. George Scott Hart was from Eastern Maryland, settling in Westmoreland County at an early day. His father was John Hart, born in Westmoreland County, settled in Pittsburgh, and married a Miss Barr at that place, where, on July 29, 1824, the judge was born. On both sides he was of Scotch-Irish descent. The family removed to Washington in the spring of 1833, which afforded an opportunity to Judge Hart to be educated at Washington College, graduating in September, 1842, with, as some of his classmates, Caleb Baldwin, afterwards chief justice of Iowa, now deceased; J. Kennedy Ewing, son of Hon. N. Ewing, and at one time the president judge of the Fourteenth District, and Rev. Franklin Moore, afterwards a distinguished minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1867 the latter gentleman, delivering the class history at the reunion after twenty-five years, described Judge Hart, then at the bar, as having been the Sir Philip Sidney of his class. After graduation he taught a short time in Virginia, then studied law with Hon. John L. Gow, now deceased, and was admitted to the bar in August, 1846. At the same term of his admission he was appointed deputy attorney-general, succeeding Hon. A. W. Acheson in that office. After the office became elective he served a term of three years, beginning in 1850. In May, 1853, he acquired an interest in the Washington Examiner, of which paper he was the principal editor till the close of 1856, from which time he was devoted exclusively to his profession. For ten years and two months he was continuously a member of the school board of Washington, acting as their secretary all that time, a fact always mentioned in his history in connection with another fact, that, being a bachelor, he has been much interested in the education of the children of other people.

There has thus been given in this chapter a sketch of the judicial history of Washington County from 1781, when, under the Constitution of 1776, her courts opened with a large number of justices upon the bench; again, under the Constitution of 1790, with a president judge learned in the law, his associates soon reduced to two in number; so continuing, the county with other counties in the Fifth, then the Fourteenth, then the Twenty-seventh Judicial District, under the Constitution of 1838; and finally as a separate judicial district, as in the beginning, but with a single judge to administer the law, under the Constitution of 1874.

CHAPTER XIX.

XI.

The Court List—President Judges—Associate Judges—Deputy Attorneys-General and District Attorneys—Roll of Attorneys.

To close the history of the courts of Washington County, there is now subjoined a list of all the early justices, president judges, associate judges, deputy attorneys-general and district attorneys who have been connected with our courts from the beginning. This list has been carefully compiled from original sources,—the Pennsylvania Archives and Colonial Records, the records of the several courts, and, in many cases, from the original commissions themselves. Following there will be the roll of attorneys. In these lists the officers at present serving and the attorneys at present practicing will be designated by a *.

ROLL OF ATTORNEYS.

[For the names and dates in the following list of the gentlemen who have been admitted to practice in the several courts of Washington County credit is due to the industry of some of the junior members of the bar, each taking a part of the work: Joseph F. McFarland, from 1781; William S. Parker, from 1830; Robert W. Irwin, 1840; John S. Marquis, from 1850; Ralph C. McConnell, from 1860; J. F. Taylor, from 1870 to 1882.]

1781.

Hugh M.[6] Brackenridge, Oct.
Samuel Irwin, October.
David Sample, October.

1782.

Thomas Smith, January.
David Espy, January.
David Bradford, April.[7]
Robert Galbraith, April.
George Thompson, December.
Thomas Duncan, December.
David Redick, December.[8]
Michael Huffnagle, December.

1783.

John Woods, December.

[1] But his election being contested, the seat was awarded to Judge McCarrell.

[2] Great difficulty has been encountered in the endeavor to make this list complete. The records often fail to disclose the date of appointment or of qualification; sometimes only the fact of service between certain dates appears. The list, it is thought, contains the names of all who ever served, and by the words "served from," used when other information has not been obtained, is intended to cover a period thence to the next entry. Thus, Henry Purviance served as deputy attorney-general from March sessions, 1795, to April sessions, 1796, though the date of his appointment has not been obtained. A few biographical sketches may be found as foot-notes to the Roll of Attorneys.

[3] So written then by himself, without the "H."

[4] The following is found on record to No. 15, March ss., 1817:

"To all to whom these presents shall come, I, Amos Ellmaker, attorney-general of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, send greeting:

"Know ye that I hereby constitute and appoint William Baird, Esquire, of Washington, Attorney and counsellor at law, my Deputy, to implead and prosecute for, in the name and on behalf of the Commonwealth aforesaid, all criminals whatsoever for any offence done or perpetrated, or which may be done or perpetrated, within the County of Washington, and to sign all Indictments in and with my name, and to take all fees and perquisites to the same office belonging or appertaining, during the continuance of this deputation. In testimony whereof I have hereto set my hand this twenty-seventh day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixteen.

"Amos Ellmaker."

[5] Under the act of May 3, 1850; P. L. 654.

[6] The "M" soon afterward was changed to "H;" why is unknown.

[7] David Bradford was a native of Maryland, and had not been long in the county when admitted. In 1783 he was appointed deputy attorney-general for the county, and held that office for a long time. He is chiefly noted for the prominent part he took in the Whiskey Insurrection, having been the head and front of that offending. The amnesty proclamation issued by the government included all the insurrectionists save him; he then fled to Bayou Sara, in Louisiana Territory, where he died. He built the house now occupied by Mrs. Harding, on the west side of Main Street, a few doors north of Maiden, said to have been the first stone house built in Washington.

[8] David Redick was a native of Ireland. His wife was a daughter of Jonathan Hoge, the brother of David Hoge, the proprietor of Washington. He was elected a member of the Supreme Executive Council in 1786; represented the county in the Constitutional Convention of 1790; was chosen vice-president of Pennsylvania in 1788; and in 1791 was appointed prothonotary of Washington County. In the Whiskey Insurrection he also took a prominent part, but on the side of law and order, being one of the commissioners, Mr. Findley the other, to wait upon President Washington when on his way out with the army, and to explain the condition of affairs in the western counties. He died at Washington, Sept. 28, 1805. A daughter was the first wife of Dr. James Stevens, deceased.

[1] No minute is found of the admission of Hon. James Ross in our courts, but the records of Fayette County show that he was admitted in the courts of that county in December, 1784, which is satisfactory evidence that he was admitted here that year. Mr. Ross was born July 12, 1762, the son of Hon. George Ross, of York County. Following Dr. McMillan from the place of the latter's nativity, he taught in McMillan's school in the log cabin for a while, then upon the recommendation of H. H. Brackenridge began the study of the law. In 1790 he was in the Constitutional Convention of that year, and United States senator in 1794–1803. On Aug. 8, 1794, with Jasper Yeates and William Bradford, he was appointed on the commission to "confer with such bodies of individuals as you may approve concerning the commotions" then existing, during the Whiskey Insurrection. He died at Allegheny City, Pa., Nov. 27, 1847, leaving children of deceased daughters, and one son, James Ross, Jr., who was admitted to the bar, but never practiced. He has also died, unmarried. During the Whiskey Insurrection Hon. James Ross lived in Washington. See Brackenridge's His. Wh. Ins., 70, 174.

[2] The first president judge under the Constitution of 1790.

[3] Deputy attorney-general, 1795–96.

[4] Joseph Pentecost was the oldest son of Col. Dorsey Pentecost, with whom the reader of previous chapters is already familiar. After the death of his father he built the brick house now occupied by John Gamble, Esq., on part of the old Dorsey Pentecost estate, in North Strabane. He was a leading lawyer of his day, and a respected citizen, and is now represented in the county by a son, George Pentecost, of West Middletown. He died March 29, 1823.

[5] Parker Campbell is said to have been the most distinguished lawyer of his day, the old records of this and adjoining counties showing that he was extensively engaged in the trial of most of the causes instituted. He was born in Carlisle in 1768, married Elizabeth Calhoun, of Chambersburg. Their children were Nancy, who married Samuel Lyon; Elizabeth, who married first William Chambers, then the late John S. Brady, Esq.; Ellen, married John Ritchie; and three sons, Francis C., John, Parker, born in 1815, and lately died at Richmond, Va. Mr. Campbell died July 30, 1824. In the resolutions of the bar meeting, held immediately after his death, he is described as the "lamented advocate, the chief leader for many years of this bar."

[6] Obadiah Jennings was born near Baskenridge, N. J., Dec. 13, 1778. Educated at the Canonsburg Academy, he studied law with John Simonson, who was also from New Jersey. He settled at Steubenville, Ohio, where he practiced until 1811, when he returned to Washington. Turning his attention to theology, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Ohio in 1816. A short time before his death, which was at Nashville, Tenn., on Jan. 12, 1832, the College of New Jersey conferred upon him the degree of D.D.

[7] James Mountain was a brilliant Pittsburgh lawyer of his day, but practiced much here. In 1796 he was teaching in the Canonsburg Academy, and an advertisement in the Western Telegraphe in June of that year speaks in high terms of his classical attainments.

[8] Thomas McGiffin was the son of Nathaniel McGiffin, a Scotch-Irishman, who came to America before the Revolution; a soldier in the Pennsylvania line, in the battle of Brandywine and at Trenton, and suffered at Valley Forge; settled on Ten-Mile about 1781 or 1782. The son, Thomas, was born Jan. 1, 1784; educated at Canonsburg Academy; studied law with Parker Campbell, and admitted as above. The same year he went to Vincennes, Ind., where he began practice, and soon after removed to and remained a short time at St. Louis. In 1809, having returned to Washington, he continued in active practice here all his life. The last case he tried was the celebrated Vanatta murder case in Greene County. During his professional life he was at the same time much engaged in outside business enterprises, among others, with Parker Campbell and Thomas H. Baird, in the building of a large portion of the National road through Washington County. He was also deeply interested in politics; was personally intimate with Henry Clay, William H. Crawford, as well as many others of the leading men of that day; represented the county in the Legislature of 1836. He died Feb. 5, 1841, in his house on West Maiden Street, now occupied by Mr. John Baird. He left children: Maria, married Thomas Boyd, Fayette County; Nathaniel, Mount Vernon, Knox Co., Ohio; Julia, now deceased, married Rev. William Hamilton; Margaret, married Rev. W. C. McIlvaine, Peoria, Ill.; Thomas, admitted to the bar of Washington County in February, 1841, never practiced much, now near Fairfield, Iowa; George Wallace, graduated at Washington College in 1841, studied law but never practiced, died in 1858; Norton McGiffin, born Jan. 23, 1824, graduated at Washington College in 1841; studied law awhile, but in 1846 went to Mexican war; returned in 1848, and was sheriff 1858-61; in the war of the Rebellion he served as captain of Company E, Twelfth Pennsylvania Regiment, three months' service, the first company that left the county; afterwards as lieutenant-colonel Eighty-fifth Pennsylvania Volunteers, in the three years' service; he represented the county in the House of Representatives from 1880 to 1882, and in the spring of 1882 removed with his family to Ida Grove, Ida Co., Iowa.

[1] John Marshel was the son of Col. James Marshel, the county lieutenant (as to whom see biographical sketch in preceding pages), and is well remembered as the cashier of the old Franklin Bank of Washington. He never engaged in the practice of the profession.

[2] This was the Hon. Thomas H. Baird, who succeeded Hon. Samuel Roberts as president judge; his name is without the "H" at first.

[3] This was the celebrated Wellsburg lawyer, who practiced much in our courts. He was the son of John Doddridge, who settled near Middletown in 1773; a brother of Philip was Dr. Joseph Doddridge, author of "Notes on the Early Settlements, etc.," written in 1824. Philip died, a member of Congress, at Washington, D. C., on Nov. 19, 1832.

[4] Andrew Buchanan was the father of Hon. J. A. J. Buchanan, now of the Waynesburg bar.

[5] The brother of Hon. Thomas H. Baird.

[6] Rev. William McKennan, of Scotch lineage, emigrated from the north of Ireland; married Miss Wilson, Winchester, Va.; was long pastor of White Clay Creek congregation, Delaware, and for a large part of the time he was also in charge of the First Presbyterian Church of Wilmington, dying in 1809, at the age of ninety-four. His son, William McKennan, was born in Delaware in 1758; in June, 1776, entered a "Flying Camp" Regiment as second lieutenant; on April 5, 1777, commissioned first lieutenant Delaware regiment of foot, and served during the Revolutionary war, participating in the service which compelled the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, and being mustered out as captain, serving afterwards as colonel of militia. He married Elizabeth Thompson, whose father, John Thompson, married Dorothea, only sister of Governor Thomas McKean. In 1797, Col. McKennan removed to Charlestown, now Wellsburg, W. Va., and upon the election of Thomas McKean as Governor he removed to Washington County, and on Jan. 11, 1803, was appointed prothonotary and clerk, serving to the end of Governor McKean's term. He died Jan. 14, 1810, from the effects of a wound received in the battle of Germantown, Oct. 4, 1777. His wife survived him till 1839. Their children were William, John Thompson, Thomas McKean Thompson, David, James Wilson, and Anne. Thos. McK T. McKennan was born in New Castle County, Delaware, March 31, 1794; graduated at Washington College; married Matilda, daughter of Jacob Bowman, of Brownsville, in 1815; was deputy attorney-general for Washington County 1815-16; member of the United States House of Representatives from 1831 to 1839, and from May, 1842, to March, 1843; and was for a short time Secretary of the Interior during President Fillmore's administration. He died July 9, 1852. Of his children, two are now residents of Washington, Pa.,—Hon. William McKennan, born Sept. 27, 1816; graduated at Washington College in 1833; admitted to the bar in 1837; deputy attorney-general for the county 1837 to 1839; a member of the fruitless Peace Congress at Washington, D. C., 1861; appointed by President Grant United States circuit judge for the Third Circuit in 1869, which position he still holds. The other is Thomas McKennan, M.D.

[7] Mr. Gow was born in the town of Hallowell, Me., Sept. 28, 1797. His father, James, was a Scotchman from Glasgow; his mother, Lucy Gilman, of Puritan stock. His education was mostly obtained in the Hallowell Academy, but at an early age he went to Boston, Mass., thence to Fredericksburg, Va., where he supported himself by teaching while he studied the law and until he was admitted to the Fredericksburg bar. Soon he removed to Washington, D. C., and for several years was an assistant editor of the National Journal, a Whig paper, owned by Peter Force. He came to Washington, Pa., in 1824, and was at once admitted to the bar of this county. Soon afterwards, attention being attracted to his special fitness, he was put in charge of an English department in Washington College, so continuing for several years, when he then devoted himself exclusively to the law. Full of the New England ideas upon the subject of common-school education, when the present Pennsylvania system was proposed he became its earnest advocate, and when finally adopted in 1854, he was chosen the first superintendent of common schools for Washington County, and during his whole life his influence was a strong one in the cause of popular education. His practice at the bar continued, however, first in partnership with Mr. King, then with Thomas McGiffin, afterwards with his brother-in-law, Alexander Murdock, and when he died he had been in the successful practice of his profession for over forty years. On June 12, 1827, he married Mary H., daughter of Alexander Murdock, by whom there were twelve children, ten of whom at this writing are living useful lives, widely separate from each other. He died Aug. 17, 1866, and is now represented in the profession by his sons, John L., Jr., Washington, Pa., and George L., Greenfield, Iowa. Two sons are editors, Alexander M., Washington, Pa., and James M., Greenfield, Iowa. A daughter, Minnie, is the wife of M. C. Acheson, Esq., of the Washington bar.

[1] Robert Hamilton Koontz was a son of John H. Koontz, who came from Lancaster County to Washington, Pa., about 1792. He was born June 16, 1818, and after graduating at Washington College while quite young, studied the law with T. M. T. & William McKennan, and was admitted as above. He never held any public office, except that of deputy attorney-general for this county, by appointment under the old system, from February, 1848, to December, 1850. Mr. Koontz was a man of a very high degree of culture, literary and legal. Full of the finest quality of wit and humor, life to him was a bright spring morning; yet he was a laborious student and a successful lawyer. He it was who was always called upon for an address on public occasions, and his powers of oratory in such efforts were not more effective than he exhibited as an advocate at the bar. He died June 30, 1863.

[2] Hon. A. Murdoch is the grandson of John Murdoch, a native of Scotland, who removed from near Carlisle, Pa., to what is now North Strabane township in 1778. The third son of John Murdoch was Alexander, born in Carlisle in 1770; in 1803 married Elizabeth, daughter of Rev. Matthew Henderson; was appointed prothonotary and clerk in 1809, and held those offices until 1819; built the brick house on corner of Main Street and Pine Alley, now occupied and owned by his eldest daughter, the widow of Hon. John L. Gow, deceased; also what is now the principal part of the Fulton House building; in the mean time having purchased the "Morganza" tract, he subsequently removed thither, where he died in 1836. The seventh of his eleven children was Alexander, admitted to the bar as above. Mr. Murdoch while at the bar practiced chiefly in partnership with his brother-in-law, Mr. Gow. In April, 1861, he was appointed by President Lincoln United States marshal for the Western District of Pennsylvania, served four years; reappointed in April, 1865, and served two years, and again appointed by President Grant to same office in March, 1869, but resigned in December, 1872. The family is now represented at the bar by his son, John H. Murdoch.

XII.

Slavery and Servitude—Slavery in Pennsylvania—Act of 1780 abolishing Slavery—Slavery in Washington County—Special Act for Washington and Westmoreland Counties—Supplementary Act of 1788—Registry of Slaves—Registry of Servants—Statistics of Slaves, 1790–1840—The Underground Railway.

Slavery and Servitude.—As a final chapter of the civil and legal history of our county is placed the subject of slavery and servitude; for, though "God has sent forth all men free, and nature has made no man slave," yet there was a time when, even in Washington County, human beings were held and sold as slaves. To show how slavery was abolished in Pennsylvania, and how and when it ceased to exist with us, is the purpose of the following pages.

Slavery in Pennsylvania.—Coeval with the grant of the charter to William Penn, in April, 1681, and the first settlement of Pennsylvania, slavery entered that province. William Penn himself was a slaveholder. Nevertheless, from the very earliest date of the new government, the benign spirit of the Quaker element set itself against the continuance of the evil. The German settlers about Germantown, who were indeed of substantially the same religious belief with the Quakers, in the year 1688, but six years after the establishment of Penn's government, bore their testimony against the slave traffic, as follows:[1]

"We hear," they said, "that the most part of such negroes are brought hither against their will and consent, and that many of them are stolen. Now, though they are black, we cannot conceive there is more liberty to have them slaves as [than] it is to have other white ones. . . . But to bring men hither, or to rob and sell them against their will, we stand against. . . . Pray, what thing in the world can be done worse to us, than if men should rob or steal us away and sell us for slaves to strange countries; separating husbands from their wives and children. Being now this is not done in the manner we would be done at, therefore we contradict and are against this traffic in men-body."

This memorial was referred to the Quarterly Meeting, and thence to the Yearly Meeting, but no definite action was taken. However, subordinate meetings still continuing to remonstrate, in 1696 the Yearly Meeting advised that "Friends be careful not to encourage the bringing in of any more Negroes," and that those who have them be careful of their moral training. Four years afterward, in 1700, a minute of the Yearly Meeting of the Society of Quakers at Philadelphia says, "Our dear friend and Governor laid before the meeting a concern that hath laid upon his mind for some time, concerning the Negroes and Indians." And William Penn, in a will written about the same time, provided for the emancipation of his own slaves, and having also made recommendations to the Provincial Assembly looking in the same direction, upon the ground that there was no precedent for such legislation as he proposed, the Assembly declined to accede to his wishes. However, soon after settling into regular legislative action, the Assembly made from time to time frequent efforts to suppress the slave trade, yet as long as Pennsylvania remained an English colony every attempt to interdict the importation of African slaves was promptly suppressed by the English government.[1]

Nevertheless the Friends, or Quakers, still continued to bear testimony against slavery and the slave trade, and finally, in 1755, just in the beginning of the Indian wars which disturbed the country until and after the Revolution, a "rule of discipline was adopted for the disownment of all members of the Society who persisted in the practice of buying negroes. Three years afterwards Friends were advised to manumit their slaves; in 1776 this advice was enforced by discipline, and Friends were no longer permitted to retain their membership if they continued slaveholders.[2]

Except in particular localities, the Friends and, allied to them by similarity of principles, the Germans formed a majority of the settlers, and naturally it would not be long, after a separation from the mother-country would be completed, until the blot of slavery, now abhorred, would be erased. Proud, the early historian of the State, writing between 1760 and 1770, says of the inhabitants of that period:[3]

"The negroes, or black people, it is supposed, are less numerous in Pennsylvania and New Jersey than in most of the other colonies, in proportion to the number of inhabitants; the Legislature at different times having used the best endeavors in their power to discourage and prevent the impolitic and inhuman practice of the introduction and importation of them; a practice which has long prevailed in this part of the world, both in its nature and manner not only the great opprobrium of Christianity, but even the shameful disgrace of human nature itself."

Hence there is found in the minutes of the meeting of the Supreme Executive Council, on Feb. 5, 1779,[4] three years after the declaration of independence, an address by the Council to the General Assembly, containing inter alia the following paragraph:

"We would also again bring into your view a plan for the gradual abolition of slavery, so disgraceful to any people, and more especially to those who have been contending in the great cause of liberty themselves, and upon whom Providence has bestowed such eminent marks of its favor and protection. We think we are loudly called on to evince our gratitude in making our fellow-man joint heirs with us of the same inestimable blessings, under such restrictions and regulations as shall not injure the community, and will imperceptibly enable them to relish and improve the station to which they will be advanced. Honored will that State be in the annals of history which shall first abolish this violation of the rights of mankind, and the memories of those will be held in grateful and everlasting remembrance who shall pass the law to restore and establish the rights of human nature in Pennsylvania. We feel ourselves so interested on this point as to go beyond what may be deemed by some the proper line of our duty, and acquaint you that we have reduced this plan to the form of a law, which, if acceptable, we shall in a few days communicate with you."

This recommendation of the Supreme Executive Council, of whom Joseph Reed was president, and George Bryan vice-president, resulted in the passage by the General Assembly of "An act for the gradual abolition of slavery" on the 1st day of March, 1780. The celebrated preamble to this act, written by Vice-President George Bryan, though of some length, will here be given, that the reader of this day who remembers the great civil war, the slaveholders' Rebellion, may see how our own forefathers regarded the institution of slavery. It is as follows:[5]

"AN ACT for the gradual abolition of slavery.

"When we contemplate our abhorrence of that condition, to which the arms and tyranny of Great Britain were exerted to reduce us, when we look back on the variety of dangers to which we have been exposed, and how miraculously our wants in many instances have been supplied, and our deliverances wrought, when even hope and human fortitude have become unequal to the conflict, we are unavoidably led to a serious and grateful sense of the manifold blessings, which we have undeservedly received from the hand of that Being, from whom every good and perfect gift cometh. Impressed with these ideas, we conceive that it is our duty, and we rejoice that is in our power, to extend a portion of that freedom to others, which hath been extended to us, and release them from that state of thraldom, to which we ourselves were tyrannically doomed, and from which we have now every prospect of being delivered. It is not for us to enquire why, in the creation of mankind, the inhabitants of the several parts of the earth were distinguished by a difference in features or complexion. It is sufficient to know, that all are the work of an Almighty hand. We find, in the distribution of the human species, that the most fertile as well as the most barren parts of the earth are inhabited by men of complexions different from ours, and from each other; from whence we may reasonably, as well as religiously, infer, that He, who placed them in their various situations, hath extended equally his care and protection to all, and that it becometh not us to counteract his mercies. We esteem it a peculiar blessing granted to us, that we are enabled this day to add one more step to universal civilization, by removing, as much as possible, the sorrow of those who have lived in undeserved bondage, and from which, by the assumed authority of the Kings of Great Britain, no effectual legal relief could be obtained. Weaned, by a long course of experience, from those narrow prejudices and partialities we had imbibed, we find our hearts enlarged with kindness and benevolence towards men of all conditions and nations; and we conceive ourselves at this particular period extraordinarily called upon, by the blessings which we have received, to manifest the sincerity of our profession, and to give a substantial proof of our gratitude.

"And whereas the condition of those persons, who have heretofore been denominated Negro and Mulatto slaves, has been attended with circumstances, which not only deprived them of the common blessings that they were by nature entitled to, but has cast them into the deepest afflictions, by an unnatural separation and sale of husband and wife from each other and from their children, an injury, the greatness of which can only be conceived by supposing that we were in the same unhappy case. In justice, therefore, to persons so unhappily circumstanced, and who, having no prospect before them whereon they may rest their sorrows and their hopes, have no reasonable inducement to render their service to society, which they otherwise might, and also in grateful commemoration of our own happy deliverance from that state of unconditional submission, to which we are doomed by the tyranny of Britain, Be it, etc."

Section III. of the act provided that no negro or mulatto children who should be born within the State after the passage of the act should be deemed or considered as servants for life or slaves, and that all slavery of children by reason of the slavery of their mothers should be and was utterly taken away, extinguished, and abolished.

And Section IV. provided that every negro and mulatto child born within the State after the passage of that act, who would in case the act had not been passed been born a slave, should be deemed to be a servant until the age of twenty-eight years, to be held as servants bound by indentures are holden, and to like freedom, dues, and other privileges.

And Section V. provided that every person who was the owner of any negro or mulatto slave should register on or before the 1st day of November next, with the clerk of the peace of his county, his or her name and surname and occupation or profession, and also the names and ages of his or her slaves, in order to distinguish them from all other persons.

And Section VI. provided that the owners of unregistered slaves should be liable for their support and maintenance to the overseers of the poor.

By Section VII. negroes and mulattoes, whether slave or free, were to be tried for criminal offenses as other persons, except that a slave should not be permitted to testify against a freeman.

By Section VIII. when sentence of death should be passed upon a slave his value was to be found by the jury and paid by the State.

By Section IX. rewards for the taking up of runaway slaves and servants were to be the same as provided in cases of servants bound for years.

By Section X. it was provided that no man or woman, of any nation or color, except negroes or mulattoes registered as aforesaid, should be adjudged or held as slaves, excepting domestics attendant upon delegates in Congress from the other American States, upon foreign ministers and consuls, and upon persons passing through or sojourning in the State without becoming residents.

It will be seen that this act abolished slavery very gradually indeed. By its provisions a slave born prior to the act continued a slave for life, if registered. The children of registered slave mothers became servants for twenty-eight years, at the end of which time they became free, with freedom dues and privileges. But by this means slavery was certainly to disappear with that generation. And so it was that "at length, in 1780, Pennsylvania, first of all the States, passed an act for the gradual emancipation of all the slaves within its jurisdiction."[1]

Slavery in Washington County.—It will be remembered that Washington County was not erected until March 28, 1781, one year after the passage of the act abolishing slavery, but still formed a part of Westmoreland County; and also that the Virginia boundary along Washington County was not finally ascertained, run, and marked until the year 1785. For these reasons, and the resultant contentions arising out of the two jurisdictions, already discussed in previous pages, there were difficulties not only as to land titles, wills, and administrations, but also as to slaves. And hence it was that on April 13, 1782, the General Assembly passed an act which, as it is not printed in any of the editions of our laws, and is a part of our legal history, is now printed entire:

"An Act to redress certain grievances within the Counties of Westmoreland and Washington.

"Whereas, a number of the inhabitants of Westmoreland and Washington Counties have represented to the General Assembly that they labor under many inconveniences by reason that Before the Boundary was agreed to between the States of Virginia and Pennsylvania, many of the inhabitants aforesaid, conceiving themselves under the jurisdiction of Virginia, which exercised judicial Authority over them, had taken and subscribed the oath of Allegiance and Fidelity as prescribed by the laws and usages of the said state, are considered in many respects as not intitled to all the rights of free citizens of this State; and that for the reason above mentioned they have had no opportunity of entering or registering their slaves agreeable to the act of Assembly of this State for the gradual Abolition of slavery; and that a number of the records and papers containing the proceedings of the late counties of Yohogania, Monongalia and Ohio are now in the hands of the late Clerks, who are not Authorized to give exemplified copies thereof:

"Be it therefore enacted, &c., . . . that all and every Person or Persons inhabitants of the said counties of Westmoreland and Washington, whose names shall be found in the records hereinafter mentioned, & who shall be possessed of certified copies of their having taken the oath of Allegiance and fidelity as aforesaid, shall within six months after the publication of this act produce to the clerks of the General Quarter Sessions of the said Counties, respectfully, the said certified copies or certificates of their having taken the oath of Allegiance and fidelity to the State of Virginia before the said Boundary was agreed to, shall be and they are hereby declared to be, to all intents and purposes free citizens of this State.

"And be it enacted by the Authority aforesaid, that it shall and may be lawful for all such inhabitants of the said counties, who were on the 23rd day of Sept., 1780, possessed of Negro or Mulatto slaves or servants until the age of thirty-one years, to register such slaves or servants agreeable to the directions of the acts aforesaid for the gradual abolition of slavery, on or before the 1st day of January next, and the said master or masters, owner or owners, of such slaves or servants shall be entitled to his or their service as by the said act is directed, and the said slaves and servants shall be entitled to all benefits and immunities in the said act contained and expressed.

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the clerks of the Orphans Courts, the Registers of the probates of wills & granting letters of administration and the Recorders of deeds, for the respective counties of Westmoreland and Washington aforesaid, shall be authorized and empowered to call on the late clerks of the said counties of Yohogania, Monongalia, and Ohio, for all such papers and records in their custody or possession which relate to or affect the taking of the oath or affirmation of Allegiance, the probates of wills, granting letters of administration, and the Recording of Deeds, or other Indentures of Bargain and Sale, of any of the inhabitants of the said Counties of Westmoreland and Washington, and when they shall have received all or any part of the said papers and records as aforesaid they shall be lodged within their respective offices and become part of the records of said counties; and the said Clerks are hereby required and enjoined on demand as aforesaid to deliver up iptire and indefaced all such papers and records as aforesaid, and in case they or either of them shall refuse or neglect to deliver up the papers and records in manner and form aforesaid, they or either of them so neglecting or refusing shall forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred pounds to be recovered by action of debt in any Court of Common Pleas within this Commonwealth, for the use of the same.

"Signed by order of the House,

"Fredk. A. Muhlenberg, Speaker."

Before referring to the "Registry" of slaves and slave children, made under the act abolishing slavery, and the special act just quoted, attention is called to another act upon the subject, entitled "An Act to explain and amend an act Entitled an Act for the gradual abolition of Slavery," passed March 29, 1788,[2] which made quite an advance in the antagonism to slavery.

[1] III. Bryant's Hist. of the U. S., 177.

[2] III. Carey and Bioren, 269; II. Smith L., 443; II. Dall. L., 586.

By Section II. slaves brought into the State by persons intending to reside therein were to be deemed free persons; Section III., slaves or servants for a term of years were not to be removed out of the State without their consent; Section IV., persons possessed of children liable to serve till twenty-eight years old were required to make entry thereof with the clerk of the peace, in terms provided, on or before April 1, 1789, or within six months next after the birth of such child. By Section V. vessels builded and equipped for and employed in the slave trade were to be forfeited; Section VI., slaves or servants for terms of years were not to be separated, parents from children, husbands from wives; in Section VII. severe penalties were provided against forcibly carrying off a slave or a servant for a term of years; and Section VIII. required the justices of the Court of Common Pleas "to cause this act to be read at least twice in each term for the two terms next following the passing of this act."

With these several acts in mind, a small manuscript book, yellow with a century's age and cover worn, but complete, becomes of great interest. The first entry is copied verbatim:

"James Edgar, gentn., of Smiths township.

One woman named Press, Aged 21 years,

One Dto. Hannah, 5 Dto."

There is on record in our recorder's office, in Book L., vol. i., 703, this paper:

"Know all men by these presents that whereas I James Edgar of Smiths township and county of Washington and State of Pennsylvania being on the twenty-sixth day of November in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two in the township and county aforesaid possessed of a negroe girl as a slave and then of the age of five years did register the said girl being of the name of Hannah on the said day and so described in the office of the Clerk of the Sessions of the said County according to the Act of Assembly of Pennsylvania for the Gradual abolition of slavery whereby the said Negroe girl Hanna remained a slave to the said James Edgar and whereas I am under a serious conviction that involuntary servitude beyond a just compensation for maintenance and education is incompatible with a sense of duty to God and my fellow-creatures. I the said James Edgar do hereby release and forever quit claim to the said Hannah all my right or claim or all right and claim which any may derive under me to the time or service of the said Hannah after she shall have arrived at the age of twenty-seven years and do hereby declare that the said negroe woman Hanna as soon as she shall arrive at the age of twenty-seven years shall be and thereafter remain entirely free. In witness whereof I have hereto set my hand and seal this sixth day of January in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six.

"JAS. EDGAR.

The foregoing contains all the entries made under the act of 1780, as extended by the special act of 1782, already quoted. It is observed that they are not in chronological order, though given here in their order in the registry. This was doubtless because the papers were filed, and not put on record till afterwards, and not in the order of date.

After the registry, from which the above list is abstracted, is another immediately succeeding it, from which is here copied the heading and the first entry:

"The following is a list of Negro and Mulatto children Recorded agreeably to the Act of assembly intituled an Act to explain and amend an Act intituled an Act for the gradual abolition of Slavery, passed at Philadelphia on Saturday the twenty-ninth day of March in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight."

Total entries, 232.[1]

After the foregoing there is one other entry, and but one, which is as follows:

"James A. D. Henderson, of Morris township, Cumberland Presbyterian Minister, enters of record, a female mulatto child named Harriet, born of the body of Margaret, of Marion county, Kentucky, in the year A. D. 1836, on the 9th day of September, 1845.

"Cognovit, September 9, 1845.

"A. G. MARSHMAN, Clerk."

It was slow work indeed for the people of any country to become educated up to the idea that slavery in any form was wrong; witness the extraordinary paper executed and put upon record by Hon. James Edgar, a judge upon the bench and a man of the highest character in his day, found in a note to a previous page. And there is an extraordinary proceeding recorded as having taken place before the Provincial Council of Pennsylvania on Aug. 9, 1699.[2] Translating the record into modern English it is this: One Samuel Hadden appeared before the Council—a Quaker Council at that—and complained that he had bargained with one Samuel Cart, in Bristol, England, that if he would procure the latter seventeen passengers for Pennsylvania, he should then have his own passage free, and the passage for his wife and four children for fifteen pounds; that he had secured for Cart that number of passengers, and with them had brought his family and goods a distance of seventy miles, and put his goods on board; that then the said Cart would not permit the wife and children to embark unless the complainant would pay him five pounds for his own passage and as much for each one of his children; nor would Cart re-deliver his goods; that having but three pence left, the complainant was forced to sell to Cart two of his children, one for nine and the other for ten years, or else stay in England when his whole substance was carried elsewhere:

"and yfor Requesting ye Gov. & Council to Order His Children to be returned him, or else yt they order him satisfacon some other way. Samuel Cart appearing and having heard ye sd petion read, and after a tedious disput on ye matter between ye per and the sd Samll Cart, They both submitted ye difference to ye Lt. Gov. & Council, the per being poor & not able to go to law. Whereupon it was ordered yt the sd Samll Cart do return to ye sd Samll Hadden his son Adam Hadden, & yt the sd Samll Hadden give securitie to Samll Cart to pay him 8 pounds, &c."

Here was justice for you, administered in the shape of equity. Still, let us not look at our forefathers with the glasses we wear to-day.

When slavery and servitude had ceased to exist under the law in Pennsylvania, many of her people turned their attention to its extermination in other States, and there were not a few in Washington County who were always ready to aid the slave in his escape from his Southern master. In spite of the terrors of the Fugitive Slave law, there were bold men who did not hesitate to become station-agents of the Underground Railway, which had several routes across this county.

The roadway of this corporation was not always the same, though the stations and agents were always to be found. The fugitives from Virginia, below us on the south, seldom came down the Monongahela River, perhaps because that was a route which they would be expected to follow, but almost always traveled with guides across the country, along unfrequented ridges and valleys, until brought to a friendly station.

It is too soon to make known the names of persons who assumed the responsibility of caring for and aiding these fugitives on their way. They might be subjected to the reflections of those who think that a law, however wrong, should be obeyed until repealed. But whatever view be held as to this, no one would impute much wrong to the colored man who became the conductor of his brethren from slavery to freedom. And this enables the writer to close the subject with one incident, illustrating the method of running the Underground Railway.

In 1856 about a half-dozen sturdy fellows escaped

[1] "Under the law of March 29, 1788, registries of children liable to servitude continued in Fayette for more than half a century, and three hundred and fifty-four such registries were made in the county during the period from Feb. 5, 1789, to Jan. 12, 1839, after which latter date none have been found in the records."—History of Fayette County, by Major Franklin Ellis, 1882.

[3] This slave woman was Hannah Kelly, the grandmother of Charles C. Kelly, at this date the Republican candidate for the office of jury commissioner for Washington County. She was brought from Africa when about three years old, sold in Virginia from the ship, afterwards bought by one John Elliott, a merchant of Pittsburgh, and by his administrators sold to Mr. John Gardner. Mr. Gardner died in 1820, and the woman remained with the family till the death of Mrs. Gardner, in 1820. She herself died, Jan. 31, 1863, from a burning received on the first of that month. She was thought to be one hundred and ten years old at her death. Communicated by Mr. James Simpson, of Cross Creek township.

from their owner, living near Clarksburg, Va. They were under the guidance of an experienced conductor, who knew to whom to bring them. Arriving at Waynesburg, they were delivered over to a colored barber there, who fed them at a spring in a deep thicket across the creek, then brought them to a dry-house and stowed them away among the lumber. The owner was heard to be approaching, when for greater safety they were started to Rogersville. While the transfer was being made the owner arrived at Waynesburg with his posse, and began to search the town. The barber was out on the streets. Being the regularly commissioned conductor from that place, under the circumstances it was best he should easily be found. The owner met him, and charged him with a knowledge of his property. The barber trembled, but while the owner threatened, then coaxed, then scolded, he parleyed and joked and denied to gain time for the fugitives. At length the owner pulled out a roll of money and offered him three hundred dollars per head to disclose where the slaves were. A gentleman, then a student at Waynesburg College, who, unobserved himself, saw and heard this offer from within the door of the Hamilton House hotel, held his breath till he heard the rejection of it, accompanied by this remark, "No, sir; if I knowed where your slaves are, all the money in the South wouldn't git me to tell." That barber was Ermin Cain, the present janitor of our court-house.

The slaves were not found. Shipped from Rogersville to West Alexander, thence to West Middletown, for a time they were kept in that neighborhood until the owner's watch for them along the Ohio was ended. Then one night they were cautiously guided towards Washington, and at a blacksmith-shop in Canton township put into the hands of Samuel W. Dorsey, a colored barber at Washington, now deceased, who well knew how to get them into Canada, and that soon.

Let it be made known here now that among gentlemen of good position who were always ready to aid fugitives from slavery were many connected with the political party alleged to be in sympathy with the "institution," and whose uncompromising advocacy of their political principles was abundantly sufficient to conceal a most active employment as the humble and unpaid agents of the Underground Railway.

CHAPTER XX.

THE WHISKEY INSURRECTION.

In 1794, and a few preceding years (but principally from 1791 to the year first named), there occurred in the valley of the Monongahela and region contiguous to it a series of unlawful and violent acts, to which, collectively, was applied the term "The Whiskey Insurrection," a term which in that application has continued in use for seven-eighths of a century. These illegal and insurrectionary acts were done in the four (then) southwestern counties of Pennsylvania,—Washington, Allegheny, Westmoreland, and Fayette,—but of these four Washington was the chief actor, "the home of the Insurrection." It was in this county that the insurgent spirit first showed itself. Here it lived longest, and in this county more especially than in either of the three others it was violent and reckless during its continuance. The insurrectionary outbreak embraced an armed resistance on several occasions to the execution of certain State and national laws imposing an excise tax on distilled spirits and stills used for the manufacture of such spirits, a measure which was generally and peculiarly obnoxious to the people of these counties, particularly because they regarded it as calculated to bear with especial and discriminating severity on the industries of this section as compared with other parts of the country.

The first excise tax imposed in the province of Pennsylvania was that authorized in an act of Assembly passed March 16, 1684, entitled "Bill of Aid and Assistance of the Government."[1] As it was found to be objectionable to the sense of the people, that part of the bill relating to the collection of excise duties was repealed soon afterwards, and no similar legislation was had for more than half a century. In 1738 the Provincial Assembly passed "An act for laying an excise on wine, rum, brandy, and other spirits,"[2] but this, like its predecessor of 1684, was received with such unmistakable disfavor that it remained in force only a few months from the commencement of its operation. Again, in May, 1744, the Assembly renewed the measure, "for the purpose of providing money without a general tax, not only to purchase arms and ammunition for defense, but to answer such demands as might be made upon the inhabitants of the province by his Majesty for distressing the public enemy in America."[3] This enactment remained in operation but a short time. Another excise law was passed in 1756, but failed of execution; then for nearly sixteen years the people of Pennsylvania were undisturbed by governmental attempts to collect impost duties on spirits.

In 1772 the subject came again before the Assembly, and as a measure of revenue a new act was passed,[4] levying a duty on domestic and foreign distilled spirits. At first this law was not executed in reference to domestic liquors, nor was there any energetic attempt made for that purpose, particularly in the old counties of the province; but after Pennsylvania became a State, and her necessities were greatly increased by the Revolutionary war, then in progress, the law was re-enacted and put in execution,[1] and a very considerable revenue obtained in that way, the measure being at that time the less obnoxious because patriotic men were opposed to the consumption of grain in distillation at a time when every bushel was needed for the subsistence of the troops in the field fighting for liberty.[2] A large part of the proceeds collected at that time was appropriated to the "depreciation fund," created in this State (as in others, in pursuance of a resolution passed by Congress in 1780) for the purpose of giving to officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army an additional compensation, a measure which was manifestly just and necessary, because the value of their pay had been greatly lessened by the depreciation of the Continental currency.

After the close of the Revolution, laws imposing excise duties on distilled spirits remained on the Pennsylvania statute-books until 1791, but they were not generally enforced, and were exceedingly unpopular, especially in the western and southwestern portions of the State. During the period mentioned (some seven or eight years prior to their repeal in 1791), though the excise laws of the State were by no means generally enforced, the collection of the revenue tax on spirits was several times attempted, but never successfully executed in the southwestern counties. Such an attempt was made in Washington, Fayette, and Westmoreland Counties in the years 1785 and 1786, by an excise collector named William Graham, whose ill success in the attempt in Washington County is thus narrated by Judge Veech:

"In 1785 they [the Executive Council] sent out as collector for the three counties a broken-down Philadelphia Market Street tavern-keeper by the name of Graham. He collected some in Fayette without any obstacle. He then went to Westmoreland and got a little there, but in the darkness of the night, at his hotel, he was called to the door of his room by a man in disguise who told him he was Beelzebub, and had called for him to hand him over for torment to a legion of devils who were in waiting without." He saw his danger and escaped, but was afraid to stay longer, and "fled with all convenient speed into what he was told was the more sober and submissive county of Washington, then covering all west of the Monongahela. There he fared worse than at Greensburg." How badly the collector fared in Washington County is shown in a letter written by Dorsey Pentecost[3] to the Executive Council of Pennsylvania, as follows:

"Washington County, 16th April, 1786.

"Gentlemen:

"About ten days ago a Mr. Graham, Excise officer for the three western Counties, was in the exercise of his office in this County, seized by a number of People and Treated in the following manner, viz.: His Pistols, which he carried before him, taken and broke to pieces in his presence, his Commission and all his papers relating to his Office tore and thrown in the mud, and he forced or made to stamp on them, and Imprecate curses on himself, the Commission, and the Authority that gave it to him; they then cut off one-half his hair, cued the other half on one side of his Head, cut off the Cock of his Hat, and made him wear it in a form to render his Cue the most Conspicuous; this with many other marks of Ignominy they Impos'd on him, and to which he was obliged to submit; and in the above plight they marched him amidst a Crowd from the frontiers of this County to Westmoreland County, calling at all the Still Houses in their way, where they were Treated Gratis, and expos'd him to every Insult and mockery that their Invention could contrive. They set him at Liberty at the entrance of Westmoreland, but with Threats of utter Desolution should he dare to return to our County.

"This Bandittie I am told denounces distruction, vengeance against all manner of People who dare to oppose or even ganesay this their unparrelled behavior, and that they will support every person concerned against every opposition. I suppose they depend on their numbers, for I am told the Combination is large.

"I have thought it my duty as a good citizen to give your Honorable Board information of this matchless and daring Insult offered to Government, and the necessity there is for a speedy and Exemplary punishing being inflicted on these atrocious offenders, for if this piece of conduct is lightly looked over, no Civil officer will be safe in the Exercise of his duty, though some Gentlemen with whom I have conversed think it would be best, and wish a mild prosecution: for my part, I am of a different opinion, for it certainly is the most audacious and accomplished piece of outragious and unprovoked Insult that was ever offered to a Government and the Liberties of a free People, and what in my opinion greatly agrivates their Guilt is that it was not done in a Gust of Passion, but cooly, deliberately, and Prosecuted from

[1] In 1779 the Assembly enacted a law to prevent the distillation of all kinds of grain or meal, but in the October following the law was repealed so far as to permit the distillation of rye and barley.

[2] Findley, in his history of the Western Insurrection, says, "In the time of the Revolutionary war, when neither foreign rum nor molasses could be imported, the demand for domestic distilled spirits for the army and for general consumption became exceeding great, and the manufacturing of it became so profitable that not only the rye, but a great quantity of wheat was consumed by distillation. In many parts of the country you could scarcely get out of sight of the smoke of a still-house. The citizens became alarmed lest the army should suffer for want of bread for the troops, and forage for the horses. The clergy from the pulpits, and in some instances by judicial warnings of Presbyteries, inveighed against this alarming destruction of bread from the army and the poor, and against the still-houses, as the general nurseries of intoxication and licentiousness. There was no law then in force to prevent distillers from selling in small quantities, consequently those who loved to get drunk at a small expense resorted to the stills. The manners of our youth were much endangered by the number of the stills, and by associating with such as usually resorted to these receptacles of vice. The army soon felt the effects of this waste of grain to an alarming degree."

day to day, and there appears such a desolute and refractory spirit to pervade a Certain class of People here, particularly those concerned in the above Job, that demands the attention of Government, and the most severe punishment.

"I am not able to give the names of all concerned, nor have I had an opportunity of making particular enquiry, but have received the foregoing information from different people on whom I can rely, neither do I think they have as many friends as they suppose, or would wish to make the public believe. I have it not in my Power at this time to be as full and explicit as I could wish on this subject, as I have but Just time to hurry up this scrawl while the carrier is waiting."

This was the first actual violence committed in resistance to the execution of the excise laws in Western Pennsylvania. It occurred on the 7th of April, 1786, at a place near Cross Creek village. Graham made no further attempt to enforce collections, or to remain in Washington County; but prosecutions for riot were instituted against twelve persons charged with being concerned in the affair, and they were in due time found guilty and fined; but their fines were afterwards remitted. One of them was afterwards elected to Congress, and three times re-elected, serving in all eight years.

With regard to Graham and his appointment as excise collector, Findley says, "A person of more fair character and greater discretion would have been necessary for the successful discharge of that trust, but such did not apply." But Findley almost invariably defended, or at least apologized for, the acts of the insurgents and censured those engaged in attempts to execute the law. Judge Veech says of him (Findley), "He was an ultra partisan of the Republican or Anti-Federal school. He was considered one of the leaders of the opposition to Washington's administration, and being charged with instigating the Whiskey Insurrection, wrote his book to defend himself and abuse Hamilton. . . . In Garland's 'Life of John Randolph' he is said to have been habitually intemperate while in Congress, a statement which has some support from tradition."

After Graham's maltreatment and expulsion from the country, the office of collector was accepted by a Mr. Craig, who made some attempt to execute the duties, but, as is said by Brackenridge, "with no result but that of becoming infamous with the populace.[1]

Another attempt was made by a person of the name of Hunter, who made seizures in Pittsburgh in 1790, and instituted seventy suits against delinquent distillers; in these cases the suits were set aside for irregularity, and Hunter soon after left the country and resigned his commission." No further attempts at collection were made by officers in this district under the State law during its continuance. A bill for its repeal was introduced in 1790, and during its pendency in the Assembly a numerously signed petition of inhabitants of Westmoreland County was presented praying for the repeal of the excise law. The memorial and petition set forth:[2]

"That this is the only law passed since our Revolution that has been treated with general disapprobation, and reflected upon with universal abhorrence and detestation; and such has been the resentment of many of our fellow-citizens, which we are sorry to have occasion to confess that they have upon several occasions proceeded to unwarrantable lengths in opposing its operations.

"We do not deny that we are as strongly rooted in the habits, and as much addicted to the use of spirituous liquors as our brethren in the eastern part of the State; having emigrated from among them, we cannot be condemned for carrying their customs along with us. But independent of habit, we find that the moderate use of spirits is essentially necessary in several branches of our agriculture. In this new country laborers are exceedingly scarce, and their hire exceedingly high, and we find that liquor proves a necessary means of engaging their service and securing their continuance through the several important seasons of the year when the pressing calls of labour must be attended to, let the conditions be what they may. For these reasons we have found it absolutely necessary to introduce a numer of small distilleries into our settlements; and in every circle of twenty or thirty neighbours, one of these are generally erected, merely for the accommodation of such neighbourhood, and without any commercial views whatever. The proprietor thereof receives the grain (rye only) from the people, and returns the stipulated quantity of liquor, after retaining the toll agreed upon. In this manner we are supplied with this necessary article, much upon the same conditions that our mills furnish us with flour; and why we should be made subject to a duty for drinking our grain more than eating it, seems a matter of astonishment to every reflecting mind.

"These distilleries, small and insignificant as they are, have always been classed among the first objects of taxation, and have been highly estimated in the valuation of property. This, we conceive, might fully suffice, without extending revenue to the mean and humble manufacture produced by them. With as much propriety, a duty might be laid on the rye we feed to our horses, the bread we eat ourselves, or any other article manufactured from the products of our own farms.

[1] "Afterwards a man of the name of Craig accepted of the office of excise for the western counties. His son, who acted as his deputy, I was acquainted with; he behaved himself well and appeared to be successful, but his father getting into some quarrels, near the place of his residence, complaints went against him, and he was removed. . . . There were no riots but those against Graham; but as all those who held the office received some money, for which it was believed they never accounted (probably they did not receive more than was a competent compensation), those that paid at first, seeing others escape with impunity, refused to comply. They all knew that in the old counties it was generally paid only on foreign liquors."—Findley.

"Our remote situation from the channels of commerce has long ago prohibited the use of all imported liquors amongst us, and as we are aiming at independence in our manner of living, we have neither the abilities nor inclination to aspire to their use. We freely resign them to our eastern neighbours whom Providence has placed under the meridian rays of commercial affluence, and whose local situation confer on them many enjoyments which nature has denied to us; and whilst they are revelling in the luxuries of the most bountiful foreign climes, we are perfectly content with the humble produce of our own farms, and it is our only wish to be permitted to enjoy them in freedom."

The repealing act[1] was passed, and approved Sept. 21, 1781; but in the mean time Congress had passed the national excise law, which brought about the insurrection in the western counties of Pennsylvania.

Upon the adoption of the Federal Constitution, it became necessary to provide ways and means to support the government, to pay just and pressing Revolutionary claims, and sustain the army, which was still necessary for the protection of the frontier against Indian attack. "The duties on goods imported were very far from adequate to the wants of the new government. Taxes were laid on articles supposed to be the least necessary, and, among other things, on distilled liquors, or on the stills with which they were manufactured." At the suggestion of Alexander Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, a bill was framed, among the provisions of which was the imposition of an excise duty of four pence per gallon on all distilled spirits. This bill was passed by Congress, March 3, 1791, against the strong opposition of many members, including all those from the western counties of Pennsylvania.[2]

It was argued that the law of 1791 bore more heavily and unjustly on the interests of the region west of the Alleghenies than on those of any other part of the Union. Here a principal product of the farmers was rye. For this there was little home demand, and it could not be transported across the mountains at a profit, except in the form of whiskey. "A horse could carry but four bushels, but he could take the product of twenty-four bushels in the shape of alcohol. Whiskey, therefore, was the most important item of remittance to pay for their salt, sugar, and iron."[3] As a result of these peculiar circumstances, there was in this section a greater number of stills and a larger amount of whiskey manufactured than in any other region of the same population in any part of the country. "There were very few or no large manufactories where grain was bought and cash paid. There was not capital in the country for that purpose. In some neighborhoods every fifth or sixth farmer was a distiller, who during the winter season manufactured his own grain and that of his neighbors into a portable and salable article." And thus the people thought "they foresaw that what little money was brought into the country by the sale of whiskey would be carried away in the form of excise duties."[4]

In these western counties a large proportion of the inhabitants were Scotch-Irish, or of that descent, a people whose earlier home, or that of their fathers, had been beyond the sea, in a land where whiskey was the national beverage, and where excise laws and excise officers were regarded as the most odious of all the measures and minions of tyranny.[5] "They also remembered that resistance to the Stamp Act and duty on tea at the commencement of the Revolution began by the destruction of the tea and a refusal to [1] "An Act to repeal so much of every act or acts of Assembly of this State as relates to the collection of excise duties," provided, "Section 1. . . . That so much of every act or acts of Assembly as authorize the collection of any duty or duties upon wine, rum, brandy, or other spirituous liquors shall be, and the same are, hereby repealed.

"Section 2. Provided always, . . . That nothing herein contained shall be deemed or construed to prevent the recovery of all such duties upon the said articles as are now due to the Commonwealth, nor to release or take away any forfeiture or penalty which any person or persons may have incurred by reason of the said acts of Assembly; but that all prosecutions commenced, or which may be commenced in consequence thereof, may be prosecuted to as full effect as if such acts or parts thereof had not been repealed."

[2] The House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, too, recorded its protest against the national excise law. On June 22, 1791, it was by that body

"Resolved, That any proceeding on the part of the United States tending to the collection of revenue by means of excise established on principles subversive of peace, liberty, and the rights of the citizens ought to attract the attention of this House.

"Resolved, That no public urgency within the knowledge or contemplation of this House can in their opinion warrant the adoption of any species of taxation which shall violate those rights which are the basis of our government, and which would exhibit the singular spectacle of a nation resolutely oppressing the oppressed of others in order to enslave itself."

[3] "As late as the year of the insurrection, freight in wagons to Philadelphia cost from five to ten dollars per hundred pounds. Salt sold at five dollars a bushel, while iron and steel cost from fifteen to twenty cents per pound. In that fertile region grain was abundantly produced, but there was no market, while farmers east of the mountains were growing rich by means of the general war in Europe. Trade down the Ohio, despite its danger, had then no outlet, the lower Mississippi being in possession of the Spanish. The freight on a barrel of flour to Philadelphia was as much as it would bring in that market. 'Wheat,' says the Rev. Dr. Carnahan, 'was so plentiful and of so little value that it was a common practice to grind that of the best quality and feed it to the cattle; while rye, corn, and barley would bring no price as food for man or beast.' The only way left for the inhabitants to obtain a little money to purchase salt, iron, and other articles necessary in carrying on their farming operations was by distilling their grain and reducing it to a more portable form, and sending the whiskey over the mountains or down the Ohio to Kentucky, then rapidly filling up and affording a market for that article."—Papers Relating to the Whiskey Insurrection, Pa. Archives, vol. iv., 6.

[5] "To resist or elude the excise is one of the hereditary prerogatives of an Irishman, be he Protestant or Catholic. To kill an exciseman has been reckoned among them an ample expiation for a multitude of sins. By every native of the Emerald Isle it is regarded as the most humiliating badge of subjection which England has ever imposed; and if the parents have nothing else to transmit to their posterity, they bequeath to them unto the third and fourth generations a hatred of excise laws, and of all who make or enforce them. Nor was it much better in Scotland."

use the royal stamps; that the design was not to break allegiance to the British throne, but to force a repeal of these odious laws. They were, almost to a man, enemies to the British government, and had contributed their full proportion in service in establishing the independence of America. To them no other tax of equal amount would have been half so odious." It can scarcely be wondered at then that among a people holding such opinions the measure was regarded as a most unjust and oppressive one, nor that the more hot-headed and turbulent ones freely and fiercely announced their determination to oppose its execution even to the extremity of armed resistance to the government.

This rebellious sentiment was so wide-spread, so unmistakable in its character, and indicated by such open threats of violence to any officers who might be hardy enough to attempt the collection of the excise duty, that it became difficult to find any proper person willing to take the risk of accepting the office of chief inspector of the Western District. The position was finally accepted by Gen. John Neville,[1] of Allegheny County, a man who above nearly all others was, on account of his great personal popularity and unquestioned honesty and patriotism, the proper man for the place. But the confidence and respect of his fellow-citizens proved insufficient to screen him from their insults and violence when against these was weighed the fact that he had accepted an office the duties of which obliged him to attempt the execution of a law which they detested.

The popular excitement increased rapidly, the spirit of resistance became more determined, and soon found expression in a public act which may be said to have marked the commencement of the famous "Whiskey Insurrection." This was a preliminary meeting held at Redstone Old Fort (Brownsville), on the 27th of July, 1791, composed of people opposed to the execution of the law. At this meeting it was concerted that county committees should be formed in each of the four counties of Washington, Fayette, Westmoreland, and Allegheny, to meet at the respective county-seats and take measures looking to a common end,—successful resistance to the operation of the law. These committees were formed accordingly, and the temper and ideas of the men composing them may be judged from the proceedings had at a meeting of the Washington County Committee, held at the county-seat on the 23d of August, on which occasion resolutions were passed to the effect that any person who had accepted or might accept an office under Congress in order to carry the excise law into effect should be considered inimical to the interests of the country, and recommending to the people of their county to treat every person who had accepted, or might thereafter accept, any such office with contempt, and absolutely to refuse all kind of communication or intercourse with him, and to withhold from him all aid, support, or comfort. The Secretary of the Treasury (Alexander Hamilton) mentioned that among those present at this meeting at Washington were the following-named persons, all public officers of Pennsylvania, viz.: James Marshel, register and recorder of Washington County; David Bradford, deputy attorney-general of Pennsylvania; Henry Taylor and James Edgar, associates justices of Washington County; Thomas Crooks, William Parker, Eli Jenkins, and Thomas Sedgwick, justices of the peace; and Peter Kidd, major of Washington County militia. The resolutions passed at this meeting were printed in the Pittsburgh Gazette, the proprietor of which paper would doubtless have feared the consequences of a refusal to publish them if he had been so disposed.

Each of the four county committees deputed three of its members to meet at Pittsburgh on the first Tuesday of September following, for the purpose of expressing the sense of the people of the four counties in an address to Congress "upon the subject of the excise law, and other grievances." The meeting of delegates was held at Pittsburgh, as appointed, on the 7th of September, 1791, on which occasion (according to the minutes of the meeting) "the following gentlemen appeared from the counties of Washington, Westmoreland, Fayette, and Allegheny, to take into consideration an act of Congress laying duties upon spirits distilled within the United States, passed the 3d of March, 1791:

"For Westmoreland County: Nehemiah Stokely and John Young, Esqs.

"For Washington County: Col. James Marshall, Rev. David Phillips, and David Bradford, Esq.

"For Fayette County: Edward Cook, Nathaniel Bradley [Breading], and John Oliphant, Esqs.

"For Allegheny County: Col. Thomas Morton, John Woods, Esq., and William Plumer, Esq.

"Edward Cook, Esq., was voted in the chair, and John Young appointed secretary."

The meeting then proceeded to pass a series of resolutions, censuring the legislation of the late Congress, especially the obnoxious excise law, which they characterized as "a base offspring of the funding system, . . . being attended with infringements on liberty, partial in its operations, attended with great expense in the collection, and liable to much abuse," and declaring that "it is insulting to the feelings of the people to have their vessels marked, houses painted and ransacked, to be subject to informers, gaining by the occasional delinquency of others. It is a bad precedent, tending to introduce the excise laws of Great Britain, and of countrys where the liberty, property, and even the morals of the people are sported with, to gratify particular men in their ambitious and interested measures." The meeting also adopted a remonstrance to "be presented to the Legislature of Pennsylvania," and further "Resolved, That the foregoing representations [the series of resolutions adopted] be presented to the Legislature of the United States." An address was also adopted, which, together with the proceedings of the day, was ordered to be printed in the Pittsburgh Gazette, and the meeting then adjourned.

[1] "In order to allay opposition as far as possible," says Judge Wilkeson, "Gen. John Neville, a man of the most deserved popularity, was appointed to the inspectorship for Western Pennsylvania. He accepted the appointment from a sense of duty to his country. He was one of the few men of great wealth who had put his all at hazard for independence. At his own expense he raised and equipped a company of soldiers, marched them to Boston, and placed them, with his son, under the command of General Washington. Besides Gen. Neville's claims as a soldier and a patriot, he had contributed greatly to relieve the sufferings of the settlers in his vicinity. He divided his last loaf with the needy; and in a season of more than ordinary scarcity, as soon as his wheat was sufficiently matured to be converted into food, he opened his fields to those who were suffering with hunger. If any man could have executed this odious law, Gen. Neville was that man. He entered upon the duties of his office and appointed his deputies from among the most popular citizens. The first attempts, however, to enforce the law were resisted."

In reference to this meeting at Pittsburgh, and others of similar character, Mr. Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, said that, being "composed of very influential individuals, and conducted without moderation or prudence," they were justly chargeable with the excesses which were afterwards committed, serving to give consistency to an opposition which at length matured to a degree that threatened the foundations of the government.

On the 6th of September, the day before the meeting of the committees' delegates at Pittsburgh, the opposition to the law broke out in an act of open violence, said to have been the first of the kind committed in the western counties since the outrage on Graham, five years before. At a place near Pigeon Creek, in Washington County, a party of men, armed and disguised, waylaid Robert Johnson (collector of revenue for Allegheny and Washington), cut off his hair, stripped him of his clothing, tarred and feathered him, and took away his horse, "obliging him to travel on foot a considerable distance in that mortifying and painful situation." He was also compelled to resign his commission and to publish the fact in the Pittsburgh Gazette, which he did as follows: "Finding the opposition to the revenue laws more violent than I expected, regretting the mischief that has been done, and may from the continuance of measures [continue to be done]; seeing the opposition changed from a disguised rabble to a respectable party, I think it my duty, and do resign my commission. Robert Johnson." It was stated that the commission itself was surrendered by Johnson to David Hamilton. The case was brought before the District Court, out of which processes issued against John Robertson, John Hamilton, and Thomas McComb, three of the persons concerned in the outrage. The serving of these processes was confided by the then marshal, Clement Biddle, to his deputy, Joseph Fox, who in the month of October went into Allegheny County for the purpose of serving them; but he was terrified by the "appearances and circumstances which he observed in the course of his journey," and therefore, instead of serving them himself, sent them forward under cover by a private messenger.[1] The marshal (Mr. Biddle), in his report of this transaction to the district attorney, said, "I am sorry to add that he [the deputy, Fox] found the people in general in the western part of the State, particularly beyond the Allegheny Mountains, in such a ferment on account of the act of Congress for laying a duty on distilled spirits, and so much opposed to the execution of said act, and from a variety of threats to himself personally (although he took the utmost precautions to conceal his errand), that he was not only convinced of the impossibility of serving the process, but that any attempt to effect it would have occasioned the most violent opposition from the greater part of the inhabitants, and he declares that if he had attempted it he believes he would not have returned alive. I spared no expense or pains to have the process of the court executed, and have not the least doubt that my deputy would have accomplished it if it could have been done."

In Fayette County the collector of revenue, Benjamin Wells, was subjected to ill treatment on account of his official position. That Mr. Wells was peculiarly unpopular among the people of his district appears from the letters of Judge Alexander Addison,[2] and from other sources, and he was afterwards several times maltreated, and his house sacked and burned. These acts were done in 1793 and 1794, but the first instance of abuse to him appears to have occurred in the fall of 1791, as the Secretary of the Treasury in his report to the President, after narrating the circumstances of the attack on Robert Johnson, in Washington County, on the 6th of September, continues: "Mr. Johnson was not the only officer who, about the same period, experienced outrage. Mr. Wells, collector of the revenue for Westmoreland and Fayette, was also ill treated at Greensburg and Uniontown. Nor were the outrages perpetrated confined to the officers, they extended to private citizens who only dared to show their respect for the laws of their country."[3]

[1] The messenger sent by Fox was John Conner, a simple-minded old man, a cattle-drover, who was wholly ignorant of the dangerous character of his errand. He was seized, whipped, tarred and feathered, and left in the woods in a pitiable condition. The Secretary of the Treasury said that John Hamilton (colonel of the Mingo Creek battalion) was one of the party who committed this outrage.

[2] Judge Addison, in a letter addressed to Governor Mifflin (Pa. Archives, 2d Series, vol. iv., p. 62), said, "Benjamin Wells, so far as I have ever heard him spoken of, is a contemptible and unworthy man, whom, I believe, the people of this country would never wish to see in any office or trust with an object of any importance." But it should be remarked in this connection that the judge's opinion, as above expressed, may have been strongly biased by his own well-known personal dislike to Wells. In a communication by Alexander Hamilton to President Washington, the former related that on one occasion when Judge Addison was stopping, during a term of court, at a public-house in Uniontown, "Wells went to the same tavern, but was informed by the tavern-keeper and his wife that he could not be received there, assigning for reason that Judge Addison had declared that if they took him in again he would leave the house."—Pa. Archives, 2d Series, vol. iv., p. 292.

[3] Pa. Archives, 2d Series, vol. iv. p. 88.

Another outrage was committed in Washington County, in the month of October of the same year, on the person of Robert Wilson, who was not an excise officer, but "a young schoolmaster who was looking for employment, and carried with him very reputable testimonials of his character."[1] It was supposed that he was a little disordered in his intellect, and having, unfortunately for himself, made some inquiries concerning stills and distilleries, and acted in a mysterious manner otherwise, he was suspected of being in the service of the government. On this account he "was pursued by a party of men in disguise, taken out of his bed, carried about five miles back to a smith's shop, stripped of his clothes, which were afterwards burnt, and having been inhumanly burnt in several places with a heated iron, was tarred and feathered, and about daylight dismissed, naked, wounded, and in a very pitiable and suffering condition. These particulars were communicated in a letter from the inspector of the revenue of the 17th of November, who declared that he had then himself seen the unfortunate maniac, the abuse of whom, as he expressed it, exceeded description, and was sufficient to make human nature shudder. . . . The symptoms of insanity were during the whole time of inflicting the punishment apparent, the unhappy sufferer displaying the heroic fortitude of a man who conceived himself to be a martyr to the discharge of some important duty."[2] For participation in this outrage Col. Samuel Wilson, Samuel Johnson, James Wright, William Tucker, and John Moffit were indicted at the December Sessions, 1791; but before the offenders were taken upon the process of the court,[3] the victim, Wilson (probably through fear of further outrage), left that part of the country,[4] and at the June Sessions, 1792, the indicted persons were discharged.

Not long afterwards a person of the name of Roseberry underwent the humiliating punishment of tarring and feathering, with some aggravations, for having in conversation hazarded the very natural but unpalatable remark that the inhabitants of Washington County could not reasonably expect protection from a government whose laws they so actively opposed.

The demonstrations above mentioned comprise all of the more notable acts of violence which were done in these counties by the opponents of the law during the first year of its existence. On the 8th of May, 1792, Congress passed an act making certain changes in the excise law, among these being a reduction of about one-fourth in the duty on whiskey, and giving the distiller the alternative of paying a monthly instead of a yearly rate, according to the capacity of his still, with liberty to take a license for the precise term which he should intend to work it, and to renew that license for a further term or terms.[5] This provision was regarded as peculiarly favorable to the western section of the State, where very few of the distillers wished to prosecute their business during the summer. "The effect has in a great measure," said Hamilton, in 1794, "corresponded with the views of the Legislature. Opposition has subsided in several districts where it before prevailed,[6] and it was natural to entertain, and not easy to abandon, a hope that the same thing would, by degrees, have taken place in the four western counties of the State."

But this hope was not realized. The modifications made in the law, favorable as they had been thought to be to the western counties, did not produce acquiescence and submission among the people of this section. On the 21st and 22d days of August next following the passage of the modified law there was held at Pittsburgh "a Meeting of sundry Inhabitants of the Western Counties of Pennsylvania," the proceedings of which plainly indicated that the feeling of opposition had not been lessened, but rather intensified. At that meeting there were present the following-named delegates from the western counties, viz.: John Canon, William Wallace, Shesbazer Bentley, Benjamin Parkison, John Huey, John Badollet, John Hamilton, Neal Gillespie, David Bradford, Rev. David Phillips, Matthew Jamison, James Marshel, James Robinson, James Stewart, Robert McClure, Peter Lyle, Alexander Long, Samuel Wilson, Edward Cook, Albert Gallatin, John Smilie, Bazil Bowel, Thomas Gaddis, and John McClellan.

The meeting was organized by the choice of Col. John Canon, of Washington County, as chairman, and Albert Gallatin as clerk. The subject of the excise law was then "taken under consideration and freely debated; a committee of five members was appointed to prepare a draft of Resolutions expressing the sense of the Meeting on the subject of said Law;" and on the second day the resolutions were reported, debated, and adopted unanimously. After a preamble

[4] "The audacity of the perpetrators of these excesses was so great that an armed banditti ventured to seize and carry off two persons who were witnesses against the rioters in the case of Wilson, in order to prevent their giving testimony of the riot to a court then sitting or about to sit."—Alexander Hamilton to President Washington; Pa. Arch., iv., p. 89.

[5] "The act of May, 1792," says Judge Veech, "made some slight but immaterial changes in the law of 1791. It lowered the rates a little and allowed distillers to take and pay for monthly instead of yearly licenses, but raised the penalty for non-entry from $100 to $250. It also required offices of inspection and entry to be opened and maintained in each county, and that entries therein of stills, etc., should be made yearly in June, and only then. Without much time to think about it, many distillers complied with this requirement, whenever they had opportunity by the establishment of offices. Others hesitated until too late, and in the most deeply disaffected parts of the country many were deterred from compliance."

[6] Opposition to the law of 1791 was violent, not only in the "four western counties" of Washington, Fayette, Westmoreland, and Allegheny, but also in several other counties of the State, notably Chester, Bedford, Bucks, and Northumberland.

denouncing the excise law as unjust in itself, oppressive upon the poor, and tending to bring immediate distress and ruin on the western country, and declaring it to be their duty to persist in remonstrances to Congress, and every other legal measure to obstruct the operation of the law, the resolutions proceeded, first, to appoint a committee to prepare and cause to be presented to Congress an address stating objections to the law, and praying for its repeal; secondly, to appoint committees of correspondence for Washington, Fayette, and Allegheny, charged with the duty of corresponding together, and with such committee as should be appointed for the same purpose in Westmoreland, or with any committees of a similar nature from other parts of the Union. The committees appointed for this purpose for the three counties named were composed of the following-named persons, viz.: William Wallace, John Hamilton, Shesbazer Bentley, Isaac Weaver, Benjamin Parkinson, David Redick, Thomas Stokely, Stephen Gapen, Joseph Vanmeter, Alexander Long, William Whiteside, James Long, Benjamin Patterson, Samuel Johnston, William Plummer, Matthew Jameson, Thomas Gaddis, Andrew Rabb, John Oliphant, Robert McClure, and James Stewart.

The final declaration of the meeting was to the effect that, "Whereas, Some men may be found amongst us so far lost to every sense of virtue and feeling for the distresses of this country as to accept offices for the collection of the duty; Resolved, Therefore, that in future we will consider such persons as unworthy of our friendship; have no intercourse or dealings with them; withdraw from them every assistance, and withhold all the comforts of life which depend upon those duties that as men and fellow-citizens we owe to each other; and upon all occasions treat them with that contempt they deserve; and that it be and it is hereby most earnestly recommended to the people at large to follow the same line of conduct towards them."

It is difficult to understand how men of character and good standing, such as were a majority of those composing the Pittsburgh meeting, could have given their assent to the passage of these extreme resolutions. They were aimed in a general way (as appears on their face) at all who might be even remotely concerned on the side of the government in the collection of the revenue, but in particular, and more than all, at Gen. John Neville, against whom no charge could be brought, except that he had dared to accept inspectorship of the Western Revenue District.

Gen. Neville had found it almost impossible to obtain the use of a building in which to open an inspection office in Washington County; but, in the early part of August, 1792, he finally succeeded in renting from Capt. William Faulkner, of the United States army, a part of his house in the town of Washington, and gave public notice that the inspection office would be opened there on a certain day. But this action aroused the indignation of the people to such a pitch, and threats were so openly and freely made against the inspector's life, in case he should come to Washington for the purpose named, that, although he was a man not easily intimidated, he had the discretion to absent himself from the county-seat, and the office remained unopened. In reference to this affair, John Wilkins, Jr., said in a letter addressed to Gen. William Irvine, dated Aug. 31, 1792,[1] "They have frightened Gen. Neville lately very much at Washington. He had advertised his office in that town, and was to attend on certain days. On the day he was to come the road was waylaid by a number of armed men disguised; he heard of it and did not go; and a day or two ago these came to the town of Washington, disguised as before, broke into the place where the office of inspection was kept, and made search for him in expectation of finding him there. It is hard to tell to what lengths they might have gone had they found him."

The rage of the insurgents was also visited upon Capt. Faulkner for the offense of having rented his house to Neville for an inspection office. Being out in pursuit of some deserters near Pigeon Creek, in the same neighborhood where Robert Johnson was maltreated in the previous autumn, he was encountered by a number of disguised men, who reproached him with having let his house to the government officers, drew a knife on him, threatened to scalp him, tar and feather him, and burn his house if he did not solemnly promise to prevent all further use of it as an inspection office.[2] He was induced by their threats to make the promise demanded, and on the 21st of August gave public notice in the Pittsburgh Gazette that the office of the inspector should no longer be kept at his house.

On receiving intelligence of these occurrences, as also of the proceedings of the Pittsburgh meeting, the Secretary of the Treasury reported the facts to President Washington, who thereupon, on the 15th of September, 1792, issued a proclamation admonishing all persons to refrain and desist from all unlawful combinations and proceedings whatsoever having for their object or tending to obstruct the operation of the laws, declaring it to be the determination of the government to bring to justice all infractors of the law, to prosecute delinquents, to seize all unexcised spirits on their way to market, and to make no purchases of spirits for the army except of such as had paid the duty.

[1] Niles' Register, II. 54.

[2] "I can learn," wrote Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, "of no instance of the conviction and punishment of any person for a violence committed upon officers or private citizens, clearly on account of their agency under or friendly disposition towards the laws; which is the more remarkable, as the rioters in Faulkner's case are asserted to have passed in open day through the town of Washington, to have parleyed there with the inhabitants of the town, and to have been afterwards entertained at two or three houses."—Penn. Archives, 2d Series, vol. iv., 293.

A supervisor of the revenue (George Clymer) was sent into the western counties immediately afterwards to gain accurate information of and report on the true state of affairs; but his mission "had no other fruit than that of obtaining evidence of the persons who composed the meeting at Pittsburgh, and two of those who were understood to be concerned in the riot [against Capt. Faulkner], and a confirmation of the enmity which certain active and designing leaders had industriously infused into a large proportion of the inhabitants, not against the particular laws in question only, but of a more ancient date against the government of the United States itself." [1]

On the 1st of June, 1793, the inspector, Gen. Neville, gave notice in the Pittsburgh Gazette that offices of inspection and entry were opened at his own house at Bower Hill, at the house of Robert Johnson in Allegheny County, at Philip Reagan's, in Westmoreland, and at Benjamin Wells', in Fayette. This Robert Johnson was the same who had been attacked at Pigeon Creek in September, 1791, and compelled to resign his commission as deputy inspector. Evidently he had again accepted the commission and reopened the office. Benjamin Wells, although he reopened his office as advertised by Neville, was not permitted to do any business in it. His house on the Youghiogheny was repeatedly attacked, and was finally fired by a mob and destroyed, with all its contents, about the 1st of July in the following year. Philip Reagan's house, in Westmoreland (in which Wells had also opened an office for that county), was attacked, and the officers who occupied it were compelled to surrender their books and close the office. At about the time when Neville published the abovementioned notice of the opening of the several inspection offices, he "was burned in effigy at the place, and on the day of the public election, with much display, and in the presence of and without interruption from magistrates and other public officers."

In the early part of 1794 numerous outrages were committed by the opponents of the law in Washington and Allegheny Counties. In January of that year William Richmond had his barn burned, with all his hay and grain, in revenge for his having given information against the rioters who committed the outrage on Robert Wilson, the half-demented school-teacher. Robert Strawhan, a distiller, who had been among the first to comply with the law by entering his still, also had his barn burned. Both these outrages were committed in Allegheny County.

Gen. Neville, the inspector, in a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated February 27th, said he had received information that persons living near the dividing line of Allegheny and Washington had thrown out threats of tarring and feathering one William Coughran, a complying distiller, and of burning his distillery; and that it had also been given out that in three weeks there would not be a house standing in Allegheny County of any person who had complied with the laws; in consequence of which he (Neville) had been induced to pay a visit to several leading individuals in that quarter, as well as to ascertain the truth of the information as to endeavor to avert the attempt to execute such threats. It appeared afterwards that on Neville's return home he had been pursued by a body of men threatening vengeance against him. On their way these men called at the house of James Kiddoe, who had recently complied with the laws, broke into his still-house, fired several balls under his still, and scattered fire over and about the house. In March, Neville reported an increased activity in promoting opposition to the law, and that frequent meetings were being held to strengthen and extend the combination for that purpose; also that he was cognizant of a plan having been formed to collect a force to capture him, force him to resign his commission, and hold him prisoner, probably as a hostage.

In May and June new acts of violence were committed. James Kiddoe and William Coughran, the complying distillers before mentioned, sustained repeated injuries to their property. At different times Kiddoe had parts of his grist-mill taken away, and Coughran suffered greater injuries, having his still destroyed, his saw-mill rendered useless, and great

The Secretary also said, in a communication to President Washington, dated Sept. 2, 1794, in reference to this visit of the revenue officer,—

"It is mentioned in my Report that the Supervisor of the Revenue, in September, 1792, was sent into the refractory country, among other things to collect evidence of the persons concerned in the Riot in Faulkner's case. When at Pittsburgh he applied by letter to Alexander Addison, President of the court of Common Pleas, who resided in the town of Washington, to engage his assistance in taking the Depositions of persons who were named to him by the Supervisor, as able to testify concerning infractions of the Laws, and in causing some of the best informed Witnesses to attend a Circuit Court of the United States about to be holden at York Town. The Judge, not content with declining an agency in the business, in answer to the application digresses into a Censure on the Judiciary System of the United States, which he represents as 'impracticable, unless it be intended to sacrifice to it the essential principles of the liberty of the Citizens, and the Just authority of the State Courts,' and afterwards declares, that were it his duty to do what was requested of him (which, however, he states in a manner different from what the Supervisor seems to have intended), 'he should do it with reluctance, because he should be serving a cause which he thought unfavorable to the liberty and Just authority of the State Courts.'

"Without examining the sufficiency of the reasons which led to declining the agency proposed to him, without commenting upon the observations which seek to derive a part of the Justification for it from the resentment of the people against the Laws, and the danger of losing their confidence by a compliance with what was desired of him, the propriety of which in the mouth of a Magistrate might well be contested, it cannot admit of a doubt that there was great unfitness in a Judge of Pennsylvania indulging himself with gratuitous invectives against the Judiciary System of the Government of the Union. . . . It is difficult to perceive in such a digression the evidence of a temper cordial to the institutions and arrangements of the United States. The particulars of this affair have been long since in possession of the Governor." In addition to the above, the Secretary writes (as showing that Judge Addison was a sympathizer with the insurrection in the days of its popularity), that "Mr. Stokely, a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature for Washington, states that Judge Addison wrote a letter or letters in opposition to his election to the Legislature, and among other objections to him, mentioned his having applied for, or having had an intention to obtain, an office in the excise."—Penn. Archives, iv. 290, 292.

damage done to his grist-mill. On the last visit of the law-breakers to Coughran a written note was left requiring him to publish in the Pittsburgh Gazette an account of the injuries which he had sustained, threatening in mysterious but unmistakable language that, in case of his refusal or neglect to do so, he would receive another visit, in which his property would be destroyed by fire. The note was signed "Tom the Tinker,"—a name which had its origin on this occasion, but which at once went into popular use as a significant synonym for the ruthless power of the insurgent party,—their battle-cry and watch-word.[1]

Gen. Neville had, as already mentioned, found the greatest difficulty in obtaining a place in which to open an inspection office in Washington County, but he at last succeeded in renting for that purpose the house of John Lynn, in Canonsburg. This was in May, 1794, in time for the opening of the office for the business of the following month, June being the time for receiving the annual entries of stills. But he was here met by the same trouble which had been experienced previously in the town of Washington. "In the night of the 6th of June," says Secretary Hamilton,[2] "about twelve persons, armed and painted black, broke into the house of John Lynn, where the office was kept, and after having treacherously seduced him to come down-stairs and put himself in their power, by a promise of safety to himself and his house, they seized and tied him, threatened to hang him, took him to a retired spot in the neighboring wood, and then, after cutting off his hair, tarring and feathering him, swore him never again to allow the use of his house for an office, never to disclose their names, and never again to have any sort of an agency in aid of the excise, having done which they bound him naked to a tree and left him in that situation till morning, when he succeeded in extricating himself. Not content with this, the malcontents, some days after, made him another visit, pulled down part of his house, and put him in a situation to be obliged to become an exile from his own home, and to find an asylum elsewhere."[3]

Soon after the Lynn affair in Canonsburg, Maj. David Lenox, a United States marshal, was sent West with a large number of writs to be served on non-complying distillers in Allegheny, Washington, and Fayette Counties, and a few against certain persons in the last-named county who had been concerned in the riots at the house of the excise officer, Benjamin Wells. "The marshal of the district," said Secretary Hamilton, "went in person to serve these processes. He executed his trust without interruption, though under many discouraging circumstances, in Fayette County. He then proceeded to Washington and Allegheny Counties, where he served all but one, which was against a distiller named William Miller, who lived on Peters Creek, in Allegheny County, on the road from Pittsburgh to Washington, and about fourteen miles from the former place. For some cause which does not appear he delayed serving this last process, and went to Pittsburgh. On the following day (July 15th), in company with Gen. Neville, he rode out to serve the writ on Miller, and did so, but on their return towards Neville's house he was beset on the road by a party of from thirty to forty armed men, who, after much irregularity of conduct, finally fired on him, but, as it happened, without injury either to him or the inspector." This is Secretary Hamilton's account of the affair. Findley says of the same occurrence that "On leaving the place [Miller's] a number of men were observed as if in pursuit of them,

[1] TOM THE TINKER was a name which the law-breakers not only used individually for the purposes of disguise, but also applied to the insurgent body collectively, and to the secret and dreaded power of the organization, if organization it could be called. As to the origin of the name, Brackenridge says, "A certain John Holcroft was thought to have made the first application of it at the time of the masked attack on William Coughran, whose still was cut to pieces. This was humorously called mending his still. The menders of course must be tinkers, and the name collectively became Tom the Tinker." Advertisements were put upon trees and in other conspicuous places with the signature of Tom the Tinker, admonishing or commanding individuals to do or not to do certain things under the penalty of retribution at the hands of the mysterious Tom in case of non-compliance. Menacing letters with the same signature were sent to the Pittsburgh Gazette with orders to publish them, and the editor dared not refuse to comply, though he did so unwillingly. Often the persons to whom these threatening notices were addressed were commanded to see that they were published in the Gazette, and they always complied; for they knew that refusal or neglect to do so would bring upon them the destruction of their property and endanger their lives.

"This Tom the Tinker," says Judge Lobengier, "was a new god added to the mythology at this time, and was supposed to preside over whiskey-stills and still-houses. Whoever stoutly hurrahed for Tom the Tinker was of unquestionable loyalty with the whiskey-boys; while those who could not were branded as traitors to this new deity and their country." Judge Veech says of the mysterious god that it was supposed "his Olympus was on some of the hills of Mingo or Peters Creek. But truly he was a multiform deity, or at least he was Briarean in his functions. His mundane recreations were to destroy the stills and mills and burn the barns of complying distillers, and terrify others into non-compliance. He sometimes warned before striking, but the warnings and blows were always in the dark and of difficult detection." Findley says it afterwards appeared that the letter left at Coughran's still house was not written by John Holcroft as was first supposed, and that the person who did write it and who thus originated the name "Tom the Tinker" was never discovered.

[3] Dr. Carnahan gives a different account of this affair. He says, "The first acts of violence were done to the deputy inspectors, men generally of low character, who had very little sensibility, and who were willing, for the paltry emolument of the office, to incur the censure and contempt of their fellow-citizens. These sub-excise men were seized by thoughtless young men and received a coat of tar and feathers, more through sport than from deliberate design to oppose the law. Of several cases of this kind which occurred I shall mention one, which in part fell under my notice. About the last of June or first of July, 1794, John Lynn, a deputy inspector residing in Canonsburg, Washington Co., was taken from his bed, carried into the woods, and received a coat of tar and feathers, and he was left tied to a tree, but so loosely that he could easily extricate himself. He returned to his house, and after undergoing an ablution with grease and soap and sand and water, he exhibited himself to the boys in the academy and others, and laughed and made sport of the whole matter." This account of Carnahan's, however, omits, as will be noticed, all reference to the assault which, the secretary says, was made on Lynn's house several days afterwards.

and one gun was discharged, not, however, it is believed, with a design to do execution." Findley, and other apologists for the acts of the insurgents on this and other occasions, carries the idea that the sole cause of the firing on the marshal was that he was accompanied by Gen. Neville. Miller, it is said, afterwards told H. H. Brackenridge that "he was mad with passion when he reflected that being obliged to pay two hundred and fifty dollars and the expenses of going to Philadelphia would ruin him, and his blood boiled at seeing Gen. Neville along to pilot the officer to his very door." After being fired on by the party of men, who were from a harvest-field near by, the marshal and Gen. Neville pursued their way unmolested, the former going to Pittsburgh, and the latter to his home at Bower Hill.

This attack proved to be but the prelude to one of the most daring outrages committed during the continuance of the insurrection. The service of the writs by the marshal had greatly incensed the disaffected people; and the feeling against Gen. Neville had been increased threefold in its bitterness by his appearance with Maj. Lenox at William Miller's. At the time when the two United States officers came to Miller's house there was some kind of a military gathering being held not far away, at the Mingo Creek Meeting-house. Precisely what was the nature and object of this gathering does not appear. One account says it was a rendezvous of the Mingo Creek regiment, which had met there "in order to form a select corps of militia as their quota of the eighty thousand men required by the Government by act of Congress." Findley says, "Doctor Beard [Dr. Absalom Baird], the brigade inspector for Washington County, was there hearing appeals made by some of a battalion which had been called upon for its proportion of the eighty thousand men required." But the cause of the meeting is immaterial. There were present at the Mingo Creek Meeting-house at the time mentioned a large number of militiamen belonging to Col. Hamilton's "Mingo Creek Battalion," of whom more than fifty had their firearms with them. While they were so gathered, but just as they were about to separate and return to their homes, the announcement was made to them (probably by William Miller, on whom the process had been served that afternoon) "that the Federal sheriff (as they styled the marshal) had been serving writs in Allegheny County and carrying the people to Philadelphia for not complying with the excise laws, and that he was then at Gen. Neville's house." This announcement created among the militiamen an intense excitement, and a determination to take vengeance on the marshal and the inspector. During the night a party was made up, numbering thirty-seven[1] armed men, including their leader, John Holcroft (the reputed original Tom the Tinker), and before daylight on the following morning they marched from Mingo, taking the road leading to Neville's house, which was about twelve miles distant.

Gen. Neville's "Bower Hill" estate was on Chartiers Creek, about seven miles in a southwesterly direction from Pittsburgh. The mansion, situated on the highlands which rise from the creek bottoms, was large, and for those days an exceedingly elegant and aristocratic one. In its rear and upon one of its flanks were the outhouses, and several small buildings occupied by the negroes of the Neville family. Taken together, the "Bower Hill" establishment was the finest and most imposing to be found at that time in Pennsylvania south of the Monongahela. Before this mansion, at an early hour in the morning of the 16th of July, appeared the armed party from Mingo Creek, with John Holcroft at their head. Marshal Lenox was not at Neville's, as they supposed, having gone to Pittsburgh the previous evening, as before mentioned. Gen. Neville had intended to ride to town that morning, but when nearly ready to set out he espied the approaching party, and surmising their purpose he postponed the journey and immediately made preparations for defense. When Holcroft's party came up they found the house closed and bolted against them; but Gen. Neville boldly appeared at an upper window and demanded to know the purpose of their visit. An evasive and "suspicious" answer being given by the party outside, "they were without further provocation fired on from the house, and after returning the fire they were fired on by the negroes from the adjoining buildings." This quotation is from Findley, who in this instance, as in all others, did his best to show that the insurgents were the injured party rather than aggressors. Another account is to the effect that Holcroft's party having demanded the surrender of Neville's commission and official papers, and being answered by a peremptory refusal, first fired on the house and received in return from the inmates (including the negroes) so prompt and vigorous a volley that they became intimidated and withdrew to reorganize, gather reinforcements, and return with augmented numbers to carry out their original design.

In this first attack on Neville's house no one was killed on either side. After the departure of Holcroft's party, Gen. Neville rode to Pittsburgh, and there communicated the events of the morning to his brother-in-law, Maj. Kirkpatrick, who, in view of the probability of another attack, advised him to obtain assistance from the garrison of the fort at Pittsburgh. Application to that effect was made to Maj. Butler, the commandant, who thereupon detailed a subordinate officer and ten men for the purpose. Neville then returned to his house, and did what was practicable to put it in a condition of defense against the expected attack. Kirkpatrick came up afterwards with the eleven soldiers from the garrison.

[1] This is the number given by Brackenridge. N. B. Craig says the party was nearly one hundred strong. Findley says, "Between thirty and forty flew instantly to their arms and marched towards Mr. Neville's, about twelve miles distant, where they appeared early the next morning."

When Holcroft's party retired from Neville's they returned to Mingo Creek, narrating to all whom they saw (doubtless with much exaggeration) the events of their visit to Neville's. The indignation of the insurgents and their sympathizers was great, and a large force was raised without delay to rendezvous during the succeeding night at Couch's fort, a few miles from Neville's house. At that place, on the morning of the 17th of July, there were assembled nearly five hundred men, most of them fully armed and prepared for that which all understood to be the object of the gathering, an attack on Neville. The greater part of these men were from Mingo Creek and that vicinity, but there were also many from the settlements farther north and west.[1] It is related that in the midst of the excitement there appeared upon the scene a venerable clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Clark, who made an earnest appeal to the infuriated multitude, imploring them not to become law-breakers and criminals, and using all the power of his eloquence to dissuade them from their purpose, but in vain. After such slight organization as was thought necessary the insurgent force moved from the rendezvous towards Bower Hill. Its leader was James McFarlane, who was then a major of militia, and who had previously done honorable service as a lieutenant in the war of the Revolution.

The large party (or, as it has sometimes been called, the "insurgent army"), led by McFarlane, moved rapidly towards the Neville mansion. The general, fully expecting a second visitation, was on the alert, and by some means became aware of the movements and great strength of the approaching party while they were yet a considerable distance away, and believing that his life would be in danger in the presence of such a large and greatly excited crowd, very wisely retired towards Pittsburgh, leaving the defense of the house to Maj. Kirkpatrick, the soldiers, and the negroes. The insurgent party soon arrived, and finding that the house was closed and barricaded, and also (to their surprise) that it was garrisoned by soldiers, halted for consultation, and finally advanced a flag of truce, demanding that Neville should surrender himself, with his commission, inspection-books, and official papers. The flag returned, reporting that Neville was not in the house. Again a flag was sent, with the demand that six persons of the besieging party be allowed to search the house for the inspector and the papers. A peremptory refusal was returned, whereupon the flag was sent for the third time, now with notice for the women and children to leave the house. This was complied with, and a desultory firing was then commenced on both sides, but no general assault was made on the house, the assailants contenting themselves for the time with firing from cover, like Indians, while the defenders replied occasionally from the windows. Finally, during a temporary lull in the firing, Maj. McFarlane stepped out from behind a tree which he had been using as a shelter, and on doing so was fired on from the house, receiving a bullet-wound in the groin, from which he died in a few minutes. It was alleged by the insurgents that a white flag had been treacherously displayed at an upper window, and which, being regarded by McFarlane as a signal for a cessation of hostilities, caused him to expose himself as a target for the fatal shot, which, as they also claimed, was fired by Maj. Kirkpatrick himself.

At the death of McFarlane the insurgents became furious with rage, and boldly advancing from their cover, set fire to the barn and outbuildings. As the flames spread it became evident that the house must also be destroyed, and realizing this, and consequently the hopelessness of further resistance, Maj. Kirkpatrick surrendered. The house was entirely consumed with all its contents, except the liquors, which the assailants were careful to save, by breaking open the cellar and rolling out the casks before the house was burned. The casks were opened and most of the men became intoxicated, but it does not appear that such was the case with the principal leaders.[2] Among the contents of the house which were destroyed was a large sum in money and bonds. All the outbuildings were burned, except a meat-house, which was spared, and a guard placed on it at the request of the negroes, who said the bacon contained in it was all that they had left to depend on for their subsistence.

The prisoners taken by the insurgents at Bower Hill were Kirkpatrick, the soldiers, Ensign Sample, Maj.

[1] It appears, however, that all were not present who had been warned or were expected to report at the rendezvous, and in the next issue of the Pittsburgh Gazette there was published the following warning from the mythical personage understood to represent the insurgent power, viz.:

"Advertisement.

"In taking a survey of the troops under my command, in the late expedition against that insolent exciseman, John Neville, I find there were a great many delinquents now amongst those who carry on distilling. It will therefore be observed that Tom the Tinker will not suffer any certain class, or set of men, to be excluded the service of this my district, when notified to attend on any expedition in order to obstruct the execution of the law, and obtain a repeal thereof. And I do declare, upon my solemn word, that if such delinquents do not come forth on the next alarm, in equipments, and give their assistance, as in them lies in opposing the execution, and obtaining a repeal of the excise laws, he, or they, will be deemed as enemies, and standing opposed to the virtuous principles of republican liberty, and shall receive punishment according to the nature of the offence, and that at least the consumption of his distillery.

"TOM THE TINKER."

"July 19, 1794.

This notice in the Gazette was prefaced by the following, addressed to the editor and proprietor of that paper:

"MR. SCULL,—I am under the necessity of requesting you to put the following in your next paper. It was found posted on a tree near my distillery.

"JOHN REED.

"July 23, 1794."

[2] "Notwithstanding their rolling out the liquors and drinking them," says Brackenridge, "there is not to be found in the history of riots an instance of greater forbearance and less of savage ferocity."

Lenox the marshal, Maj. Isaac Craig, and Col. Presley Neville, the son of the general; young Neville, with Majs. Lenox and Craig, having come up from Pittsburgh, and arrived at the scene of action at about the time of Kirkpatrick's surrender. The soldiers were at once liberated, and allowed to depart for Pittsburgh unmolested. Kirkpatrick succeeded in making his escape; being assisted to do so by David Hamilton, of Ginger Hill, Washington Co., who was present with the attacking party. Maj. Craig was liberated. Col. Presley Neville and Maj. Lenox, the marshal, were disarmed and set at liberty on a kind of parole, embracing (as was alleged by the insurgents) an agreement on the part of the marshal that he would serve no more writs, and would make no return of those which had been served, and would surrender his person when such surrender should be demanded. It was claimed that Col. Neville also agreed to hold himself as a prisoner on parole; but the existence of such an agreement was denied both by the marshal and Col. Neville.

Having done their work of devastation at Neville's, the rioters marched southward, taking with them the body of Maj. McFarlane, which they buried in the old graveyard at the Mingo Creek meeting-house, where his grave may still be seen, marked by a stone bearing an inscription to his memory. At the time of his burial there were present at and around the old Mingo Creek meeting-house a great assemblage of sympathizing people, many of them sad and thoughtful in view of the possible consequences of the lawless acts that had been done, but the great majority in a half frenzied state of mind, and wild with rage against Gen. Neville and Maj. Lenox. It was proposed and vehemently advocated to march in a body a thousand strong (which number of men could easily have been raised) from Mingo Creek to attack Pittsburgh and capture the inspector and the marshal, but this project was opposed by the committee which had been chosen to deliberate upon the situation and control the action of the assemblage. The committee decided that instead of the proposed plan of marching to Pittsburgh in a body, David Hamilton and John Black should be sent to that town, to meet Neville and Lenox; to demand of the former a resignation of his commission, and of the latter that the writs which he had served should be surrendered (as it was claimed he had promised to do), in order to prevent the possibility of their being returned. Hamilton and Black proceeded on their way, being accompanied by the committee as far as Shockan's tavern, four miles south of Pittsburgh, where they left the committee and rode into town.[1] There they found Neville and Lenox, and made known to them the errand on which they had been sent by the committee. Both the inspector and the marshal refused compliance with the demands made on them, the marshal positively denying that he had, while a prisoner, promised to give up the writs. Having received these final and decisive answers Black and Hamilton remained in Pittsburgh overnight, and in the morning crossed to the south side of the Monongahela on their return to the committee, whom they expected to find still in session at Shockan's tavern, but on their arrival there, found that the committee had returned to Mingo Creek, where the two men followed them to report what they had done in Pittsburgh.

In the evening of July 18th, a few hours after Hamilton and Black delivered the committee's message to Gen. Neville and Maj. Lenox, the latter two fled from Pittsburgh, passing down the Ohio in a small boat in the midst of a heavy thunder-storm, afterwards landing on the Virginia shore, and making their way through that State and Maryland to the East, where Neville remained until the army crossed the mountains to quell the insurrection.

When Hamilton and Black reported to the committee the result of their mission in Pittsburgh, a meeting was at once called, to be held at the Mingo Creek Meeting-house on Wednesday, the 23d of July. It was ostensibly to be a meeting of the "committee," but it was notified through all the eastern and central parts of Washington and Allegheny Counties and in the western parts of Westmoreland and Fayette. On the appointed day there was a great assemblage of people at the old church. "Many of the best men of the land were there, some upon compulsion, others to prevent, if possible, rash measures." There was a delegation from Pittsburgh, among whom were George Robinson, chief burgess of the borough, Col. William Sample, Peter Audrain, Josiah Tannehill, William H. Beaumont, and Hugh H. Brackenridge. Among those present from Washington were David Bradford (deputy attorney-general) and Col. James Marshel, who had been county lieutenant in the trying times of the Revolution. Craig Ritchie was there from Canonsburg, and Col. Edward Cook, formerly county lieutenant of Westmoreland, and then associate judge in Fayette County. Brackenridge, of Pittsburgh, attended, as he says, with the expectation of finding it a committee meeting, but he found "a large assemblage or mass-meeting, some from a distance, but the majority consisting of those who had been engaged in the riot and outrage at the house of the inspector." The avowed purpose of the leaders was to commit the whole western country "to adoption of the crimes already perpetrated, and by combination to procure impunity."

[1] An account of the journey of Hamilton and Black to Pittsburgh, and of the business on which they went there, on the day following the burning of Neville's house, is found in an affidavit made by John Black before William Meetkirk, a justice of the peace for Washington County, in May, 1795, as follows:

"Being about to go to Pittsburgh, I fell in with a body of people collecting for the burying of Captain James McFarlane, who had fallen at the burning of Gen. Neville's house; David Hamilton had been deputed by a committee of these people to go to Pittsburgh to return the pistols taken from the Marshal, and to have a fulfillment from him of what had been agreed upon on his part. Understood from Hamilton that he had consented to go, in order to prevent the people from coming in themselves and doing mischief, for there was danger of their going in at that time. Went with Hamilton to Pittsburgh, and met the Marshal and Colonel Neville. Hamilton explained his business, returning the pistols, and required a fulfillment of what was agreed upon, viz.: that he would serve no further writs, and not return those that were served. The Marshal said he had not agreed not to return the writs. A query was then in the mind of Hamilton, what effect the returns would have. At his request I went to Mr. Brackenridge to ask his opinion, as a lawyer. He said it was a delicate point, and he would talk to the Marshal. On this he went out, and came in with the Marshal and Col. Neville. Upon that, I went out, and, after some time, returned; and Mr. Brackenridge said he was not much acquainted with the practice of the Federal courts, but would consult, and give his opinion in the morning. He gave his opinion in writing; which Hamilton thought would not be satisfactory to the committee. It was understood that the committee would be sitting till he returned. It was proposed to return by Neville's house; and it was our wish that some of the gentlemen of Pittsburgh should go with us. General Gibson, Doctor Bedford, Mr. Brackenridge, and others had consented to go. The day looking for rain, or for other cause, some declined going. Mr. Brackenridge came; I understood him to be about to go forward to the committee, to see if he could not satisfy the people in respect to the Marshal. In my conversation with Mr. Brackenridge, with respect to the burning of General Neville's house, he said it was an unhappy affair, and was afraid it would turn out a civil war, that government would call out the militia, that we were the militia ourselves, and have to be at war with one another."

The meeting having been organized by the choice of Col. Edward Cook as chairman and Craig Ritchie as secretary, proceeded to business, which was in a great degree the delivery of and listening to inflammatory speeches. "There was," says Brackenridge,[1] "the appearance of gloom and distrust in the countenances of all, especially of those who had taken an active part in the recent riots. The fury of the moment had passed off, but time had not yet been given for cool reflection; those who were committed began to have some vague idea of being involved in treasonable acts. The gloom of these was not that of sorrow or repentance; the unextinguished fire of rage still glowed in their bosoms, and required but little to fan it into fierceness. No one knew how far to trust his next neighbor; and however much he might be opposed to violence himself, he was afraid that the first person he addressed might be one of the enragé, and himself suspected of incivism, for a vague and undefined apprehension hung over all, rendering life itself insecure. . . . Every countenance discovered a strong sense of the solemnity of the occasion, those who had been involved not more than those who were afraid to be involved. It will be asked, how came any one there who was afraid to be involved? I have accounted for my being there; but how came David Bradford, James Marshel, Edward Cook, and Craig Ritchie there? I select these instances. As to Marshel and Bradford, I am at a loss to say anything by way of opinion or deduction. I can only state what I have understood from others, or what is within my own knowledge. Not having had the least communication with Marshel or Bradford prior to that day, or on that day, on the subject, I have nothing of my own knowledge. I have understood from others that after the first attack on the house of the inspector, when the adjacent country was about to be roused to a second attack, persons went to the town of Washington and called on Marshel and Bradford to come forward on that occasion, which they declined. The expression of Bradford reported to me is, 'I cannot act; you may do as you think proper.' He alluded, or was supposed to allude, to his being prosecuting counsel for the commonwealth, and in that case not at liberty to do what others might. After the destruction of the house, persons went to Marshel and Bradford, demanding of them to come out and support what had been done, or they would burn their houses. They had a claim upon them, as having been conspicuous in the deliberative committees with regard to the excise law, and alleged that Bradford had encouraged them to do what they had done by his words when he was urged to take part before the burning. 'I encourage!' said he. 'Good God! I never thought of such a thing.' 'Yes you did encourage,' said they; 'and if you do not come forward now and support us you shall be treated in the same or worse manner as the excise officer.' He found himself thus under the necessity of taking part; and that being the case, he would seem from that time to have adopted the most violent counsels. Marshel was also obliged to take part, and, having done so, to pursue a violent course. I am of opinion that both of these men acted in the first instance under a subordination to popular influence. Be this as it may, it is not from a solicitude to make an apology for them that I state this, but from a wish to show the truth of the transaction. Edward Cook also came, probably at the solicitation and under the fear of the people. Craig Ritchie and many others I know did. They had with great difficulty avoided going to the attack on the house of the inspector, but could not avoid at least the appearance of being with the people now."

So much for the opinion expressed by the elder Brackenridge as to the motives which actuated some of the principal men who were present at Mingo Church on the 23d of July, 1794. Now with regard to the proceedings of the meeting held at that time and place. In his "History of the Western Insurrection," page 60, et seq., H. M. Brackenridge says, "The first thing which took place after the opening of the meeting was the reading a letter which was presented by Benjamin Parkinson from Col. [Presley] Neville (and which had been brought by one of the Pittsburgh party), stating that his father and the marshal [Lenox] had left the county; that the marshal had not considered himself bound by that part of his engagement which was to surrender himself when demanded, and for which engagement he (Neville) had become sponsor, because, after the engagement made, and the marshal dismissed upon it, he had been again arrested and was indebted to himself for his escape. That with regard to what had been done by them, they had burned his father's house, and they might burn his, but he had enough beyond their reach. As men of honor, he conceived, they ought to approve the intrepidity of Kirkpatrick in defending the house of a friend. It is observed by Mr. Brackenridge (father of the writer) that this letter had a bad effect on those to whom it was addressed, had better have been written in a different spirit, and; better still, not written at all. His praise of Kirkpatrick did not accord with public opinion, and his allusion to the particular case only excited indignation, as it was generally believed, perhaps erroneously, that McFarlane had fallen by his hand when, deceived by a flag of truce, he stepped into the open space of the road to command the assailants to cease firing. Besides, the defiant tone, the boast of wealth tended to exasperate instead of awakening within them a proper sense of the wrong they had committed. It added not a little to the embarrassment of the situation of those who now attended the meeting at his solicitation.[1]

"This and some other letters being read and remarked upon, Benjamin Parkinson addressed the chair. 'You know,' said he, 'what has been done; we wish to know whether what has been done is right or wrong, and whether we are to be supported, or left to ourselves?' These ominous words were followed by silence for some time. The Pittsburgh party was struck with astonishment, and Mr. Brackenridge declares that he felt in agony of mind for himself and his associates in that assemblage of persons who appeared to be excited to desperation, and feeling themselves thus placed in a situation to vote against a proposition perhaps at the peril of their lives or to give a direct sanction to treason. They felt somewhat relieved when Marshel, who followed, observed that the question was not as to what had been done, but what was to be done in the future? Bradford now rose, and in a most inflammatory speech sustained what had been done and applauded the rioters, demanding that it be put to vote whether those present gave their approval, and would pledge themselves to support those who had attacked and destroyed the house of the inspector. His violent declamation was of considerable length, 'and yet,' says Mr. Brackenridge, 'from my knowledge of the man, I doubt whether he spoke according to his wish, or according to the humor of the people, and through fear of them.' There was again a dead silence for some time after he had concluded. Those who were implicated were no doubt eager and anxious for the vote, and the others, at least the more reflecting, were alarmed at this unexpected predicament in which they were placed.

"Marshel came to Mr. Brackenridge and requested him to speak. This gentleman had already settled in his mind some outline of an address, but called on so unexpectedly, and knowing that the popular current was strongly against him and his associates (the persons who had come up with him to the meeting from Pittsburgh), he was much at a loss what to say; but the situation was too urgent to admit of such delay or reflection. One of his associates, Mr. Audrain, in his statement declared that he never felt himself in a situation so embarrassing in his life. Mr. Brackenridge, observing the eyes of the audience turned upon him, advanced to the middle of the aisle, toward the chair, and began in a slow, deliberate, and even hesitating manner, encountering the angry scowls of the principal leaders, who were in favor of pushing the people to still greater acts of violence."

It appears from the accounts of Brackenridge's speech on this occasion that he (as well as his friend Audrain) found himself in an extremely embarrassing situation, for although he "had already settled in his mind some outline of an address" which would satisfy the excited multitude without giving utterance to words which might be quoted against him in case of disaster (which, in his far-sightedness, he realized might result) to the insurrectionary movement. But there was no alternative; the people expected a speech from him, and he proceeded. "He began by giving a narrative of what had taken place in Pittsburgh, the withdrawal from the country of the marshal and the inspector, who were supposed to have descended the river," and made merry in the recital of the hasty manner in which one of the Neville party (Maj. Craig) had closed the inspection office in town, tearing down the cloth or paper sign over the door, and sending the mutilated fragments of it to the insurgents in proof of the fact. To Parkinson's question, "whether what has been done is right or wrong?" he returned an evasive answer, saying that the act of burning Neville's house might be morally right, it was legally wrong and treasonable, and that the President might call out the militia to enforce the law. At this there was sensation of rather an alarming nature among the audience, which the speaker made haste to allay by assuring them that the President, before proceeding to such a measure, would reflect on the difficulty of securing the obedience of the Eastern militia to orders to march against the people in the West; that those of the middle counties and of the upper parts of Virginia and Maryland would obey only with the greatest reluctance, if at all, and that if any troops could be obtained, it would be only those from the seaboard portions and from New Jersey; and that for these reasons the President would doubtless be disposed to grant an amnesty. But the request for such amnesty would, he said, come with better grace from those who were not implicated than from those who were already so, and "that it was not the interest of the latter to involve others, but to let them remain as they were, in order to act as mediating men with the government.[1] At this point in the speech Parkinson and others began to show signs of exasperation, and therefore he attempted to restore them to good humor by telling his hearers that the President had repeatedly shown himself anxious to avoid war, especially civil war, and cited the instance in which the United States government had receded from its position in regard to the Presque Isle establishment, on account of the threats of the Indian chief Cornplanter, with a few beggarly Senecas at his back, spicing his address with a burlesque of Cornplanter and the Secretary of War making speeches to each other on the subject. Finally, he proposed the calling of a larger meeting, to include representatives from the whole revenue survey, and that in the mean time a delegation (of which he offered to be one) be sent to the President, though the precise object for sending such delegation does not appear. At the end of the speech most of the audience adjourned to the spring near by for the apparent purpose of drinking. "In the mean time Mr. Brackenridge collected his companions and advised them to leave the ground without delay, to avoid the danger of being again called on by the meeting; but in order to avoid the appearance of retiring in haste, he returned to the ground to show himself for a few moments, and then joined his company and departed." By his attendance and speech at the Mingo Creek meeting he had identified himself with the insurgents (at least in the estimation of the government officials); but if his object had been to gain popularity with the multitude, he had, for the time, failed in his object, though he afterwards secured and held it during the continuance of the insurrection.

[1] Meaning H. H. Brackenridge, who, as he says in his "Incidents of the Western Insurrection," went to the Mingo Creek meeting only at the earnest solicitation of Col. Presley Neville, between whom and himself "an apparent friendship had existed up to this period, although there was a different feeling on the part of some of the [Neville] connection with Mr. Brackenridge."

In a letter written by Col. William Sample,[2] who was present with Brackenridge at the Mingo Meeting-house on the 23d of July, he gives an account of some of the occurrences there, as follows:

"SIR,—At your request, I shall give you a short detail of the circumstances leading to, and of the principal traits of your conduct at Mingo Meeting-house. I remember that it was the general opinion of the inhabitants of Pittsburgh, that it would be prudent that a number of persons should be sent from this place to meet those who were collecting from various parts of the country. No instructions, to my knowledge, were given to those who went. But I understood the general purport of our going there, was to hear and report. You asked me if I would make one of the number that would go. I hesitated for some time, and until I asked the opinion of Col. Presley Neville, which was 'I see no harm in your going there if you choose to venture, and if you do, I will thank you to carry a letter for me to the chairman of the committee, contradicting some false aspersions which have been industriously circulated, respecting the Marshal and myself being released upon our words of honor to hold ourselves as prisoners on demand, that night my father's house was burned.' I accepted the office, and came back to you, and told you I would go. When we arrived at Jacob Friggley's house, near the meeting-house, in the course of various conversations, a tall man there, with red hair, frequently expressed a warmth of affection for Presley Neville; seemingly commiserated his situation, and took some credit to himself in rescuing him when he was made prisoner, the night aforesaid; but at the same time, was still making some sarcastic observations on his [Col. Neville's] father. I found the temper of the people was wound up to a very high pitch, and I took this favorable opportunity of delivering Col. Neville's letter to him, after finding his name was Parkinson and that he had considerable influence; telling him that the Colonel had desired me to deliver this letter to him in case I should find him, and requested he would deliver it to the chairman. He readily took it and it was the first thing brought on the carpet at the meeting. The secretary read the letter, but no observations followed. After some silence, a person stood up and made a motion that the burning of Gen. Neville's house, and those concerned in it, should be justified and supported. I could observe the people of the meeting considerably agitated. Col. Marshal, of Washington, was the first who ventured to oppose this motion, and he appeared to do so both with fear and trembling. After this speech was over, David Bradford arose, and beckoned to Benjamin Parkinson (as Capt. Josiah Tannehill informed, who had mixed with the crowd and happened to sit down on the forms close by him), asked him if the relation Col. Neville had given in the letter was true? To which question Parkinson answered, putting his hand to his breast, it is true. Mr. Bradford then dropping the subject of the letter, began a most violent and inflammatory oration in support of the first motion. I observed Mr. Brackenridge, in the course of this oration, who being seated at the west end of the church, and opposite to the principal part of the Pittsburghers, who had seated themselves at the east corner by themselves, in great agitation, often throwing his head down on his hand, and in the attitude of study. At length, Mr. Bradford's speech being ended, Mr. Brackenridge advanced nearly to the middle of the house, and opposite the chairman, and began his speech, slowly and irregularly; for the current of the people's prejudices seemed to be strongly against him. He first opened the reasons why the few persons from Pittsburgh came there; that they were not instructed, nor had they delegated powers to agree, or to disagree, on any proposition that might be made; they came only to hear and report. He took various methods of diverting the audience from the speech that preceded his. Sometimes he would give a sarcastical stroke at the excise, and the inventors of it, and then tell some droll story thereto relating, in order, as I apprehend, to unbend the audience's mind from the serious tone to which they had been wrought up. He viewed the subject before him in various lights; and then entered warmly on his main argument, which was, to dissuade the audience from the first proposition. He told them in direct words that he hoped they would not involve the whole country in a crime which could not be called by a less name than high treason; that this would certainly bring down the resentment of the general government, and there would be none left to intercede.

"The audience seemed petrified, thunderstruck with such observations, and when he had done not a person seemed desirous of renewing the arguments. Silence ensued for some time, and then the company broke up, and some went to drink at the spring, and others in little knots or clubs were dispersed over the green. Those who came from Pittsburgh, finding that the audience was to be called to the church once more, took this opportunity to make the best of their way to Jacob Friggley's. The company met again, but I know not that they did any business of consequence, for Mr. Brackenridge was soon with us, and we took our horses and returned to Pittsburgh."

After the departure of the Pittsburgh delegation the meeting was re-convened, and after the delivery of inflammatory harangues by Bradford, Marshal, and others was dissolved, the last and most important business of the day being the adoption of a resolution or call, which during the succeeding week was published and widely circulated through the counties of Washington, Allegheny, Westmoreland, and Fayette, as follows:

"By a respectable number of citizens who met on Wednesday the 23d inst. at the meeting-house on Mingo Creek, it is recommended to the township of the four western counties of Pennsylvania, and the neighboring counties of Virginia, to meet and choose not more than five, nor less than two representatives, to meet at Parkinson's Ferry on the Monongahela, on Thursday the 14th of August next, to take into consideration the condition of the Western Country."

Three days after the meeting at Mingo Creek Church there was committed an act of outlawry as bold and daring as the burning of Gen. Neville's house, and even more momentous in its results. This was the robbery of the United States mail, on its way from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia. The project originated in Washington County, with David Bradford. His first idea and plan was to capture the eastern mail from Washington, on its way from that town to Pittsburgh, hoping thereby to ascertain from its contents the real sentiments of the citizens of Washington concerning the recent outrage at Neville's. This plan he made known to Col. Marshel, David Hamilton, and John Baldwin, either at the Mingo meeting or while on their way there, and asked their co-operation and assistance in carrying it out. It appears that this proposition did not find favor with Hamilton and Baldwin, though for what reason is not apparent, as one of them, at least, took part in the scheme which was afterwards adopted in its stead, which was to seize the eastward-bound mail from Pittsburgh,[1] which was done on the 26th of July, on the post-road between Pittsburgh and Greensburg, Westmoreland Co., at a point about twenty-two miles east of the first-named town, the robbery being done by William Bradford (a cousin of David) and John Mitchell, which last-named person was employed for the purpose by David Hamilton. These men, having obtained possession of the mail-pouch, took out the Pittsburgh and Washington packages, and returned the pouch, with its other contents, to the carrier. They then rode to the Monongahela, crossed the river at Parkinson's Ferry, and delivered the stolen mail matter to Benjamin Parkinson. He reported with it to Bradford, who then (in company with Parkinson and Col. James Marshel and Alexander Fulton) took it to the "Black Horse Tavern," kept by Henry Westbay, in Canonsburg. There it was taken to a private room, where it was opened and examined by Bradford, in presence of Marshel, Parkinson, Fulton, Col. John Canon,[2] and Thomas Speer, of Canonsburg, and two or three others. The mail from Wash-

[1] Concerning this mail robbery, Judge Alexander Addison, in a letter to H. H. Brackenridge, dated Jan. 18, 1795, said,—

"I have been pursuing the plan for robbing the mail, and can trace it no higher than Bradford. It was proposed by him to Marshal, on their way to the Mingo Meeting-house. Baldwin and David Hamilton were in company, and it was put on them to execute it. The object to be obtained was to know the opinions of the people on the business carried on. The post to be robbed was the post from Washington to Pittsburgh; and it was only when Baldwin and Hamilton sent word that they could not perform their part, and when it was too late to intercept the mail to Pittsburgh, that the plan was changed to what was really executed. Bradford sent his cousin William, and David Hamilton, I believe, sent John Mitchell, who executed the business. My information is from a good source, and may be depended on."

In reference to the same matter, H. M. Brackenridge (son of H. H. Brackenridge) said,—

"On the failure of the first scheme of stopping the mail from Washington, Bradford determined to intercept that from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia, in order to find out what was written by persons in the former place to those at the head of the government. He sent his cousin, William Bradford, while David Hamilton sent an obscure, ignorant man of the name of John Mitchell, who perpetrated the deed. The post was intercepted when about ten miles from Greensburg, on the 26th of July, three days after the Mingo meeting. The packets from Washington and Pittsburgh were taken out. They were carried by Benjamin Parkinson to Washington, and thence accompanied by Bradford and Marshal to Canonsburg, a small village about seven miles distant. On the Washington packet being opened, no letters on the late affairs from any individuals of that place were found, but there were some from individuals of Pittsburgh, and as eavesdroppers seldom hear any good of themselves, these letters contained matters which gave great offence, especially to Bradford."

[2] "John Canon and a Mr. Speer, a store-keeper in Canonsburg, were invited to the tavern, and the mail was opened. In the course of conversation at the tavern it was asked what will be done with those known to be connected in the attack and burning of Neville's house? Bradford replied, 'They will be hung,' and suggested that the only way to protect them was to involve the whole western country in the matter, and that the numbers concerned would prevent extreme measures on the part of the government."—Carnahan.

ington was found to contain nothing objectionable, but in the Pittsburgh package there were discovered five letters, the contents of which threw Bradford into a rage, and placed the writers under the ban of the insurgent leaders. These letters were from Col. Presley Neville to Gen. Morgan; Gen. Gibson to Governor Mifflin; James Bryson to Governor Mifflin; Edward Day to the Secretary of the Treasury, and from Maj. Thomas Butler (commandant at the fort) to the Secretary at War. These letters were kept by Bradford; the rest of the mail was re-sealed and restored to the packages to be returned to the office at Pittsburgh.

The discovery by these letters of the strong sentiment of opposition that existed among the principal men in Pittsburgh to the lawless acts of the insurgents gave great alarm to Bradford and others, and he lost no time in taking new measures calculated to further inflame the minds of the disaffected, and to bring the wavering ones to side with the insurrectionists. Seventeen days must yet elapse before the appointed meeting of delegates at Parkinson's Ferry, and during that time the excitement might to a great extent subside, and a reaction set in. Dreading such a result, he, with the others who were gathered at the "Black Horse" in Canonsburg on the day of opening of the Pittsburgh and Washington mail, issued from that place a circular, addressed to the militia officers of the four western counties of Pennsylvania, as follows:

"Sir,—Having had suspicions that the Pittsburgh post would carry with him the sentiments of some of the people in the country respecting our present situation, and the letters by the post being now in our possession, by which certain secrets are discovered hostile to our interest, it is therefore now come to that crisis that every citizen must express his sentiments, not by his words, but by his actions. You are then called upon as a citizen of the western country to render your personal service, with as many volunteers as you can raise, to rendezvous at your usual place of meeting on Wednesday next, and thence you will march to the usual place of rendezvous at Braddock's Field,[1] on the Monongahela, on Friday, the first day of August next, to be there at two o'clock in the afternoon, with arms and accoutrements in good order. If any volunteers shall want arms and ammunition, bring them forward, and they shall be supplied as well as possible. Here, sir, is an expedition proposed in which you will have an opportunity of displaying your military talents, and of rendering service to your country. Four days' provisions will be wanted; let the men be thus supplied.

[Signed] "J. Canon, B. Parkinson,
D. Bradford, A. Fulton,
T. Spears [Speer], J. Lockny [Lochry],
J. Marshel.

"July 28, 1794."

[1] Braddock's Field was the place where the annual brigade musters were held.

The significance of this circular was only partially apparent. It was evidently a call for a general rendezvous of the militia at Braddock's Field, but it did not set forth the ulterior object of the leaders, which was (at least with Bradford) to march on the town of Pittsburgh, besiege and reduce the fort, seize the magazines and all the arms, ammunition, and equipments to be found in the fort and town; also to capture the writers of the obnoxious letters, and imprison them in the jail at Washington. This part of the plan, though not declared in the call, became immediately and generally known, and it was at once apparent that among the people of the county there was a general approval of the project. "When an officer disapproved the circular letter," says Brackenridge, "he did not dare to conceal from his battalion or company that he had received such a notice;[2] and when communicated, it was the people commanding the officer, and not the officer the people,—'Call us out, or we will take vengeance on you as a traitor to the country.' The whole country was one inflammable mass; it required but the least touch of fire to ignite it. I had seen the spirit which prevailed at the Stamp Act, and at the commencement of the Revolution from the government of Great Britain, but it was by no means so general and so vigorous amongst the common people as the spirit which now existed in the country."

With reference to the readiness displayed by officers and soldiers to obey these orders, emanating as they did from no responsible authority, Judge Addison said that in consequence of the danger of Indian incursions having often rendered it necessary in this region to assemble the military force without waiting for orders from the government, "it had become habitual with the militia of these counties to assemble at the call of their officers, without inquiring into the authority or object of the call. This habit, well known to the contrivers of the rendezvous at Braddock's Field, rendered the execution of their plan an easy matter. They issued their orders to the officers of the militia, who assembled their men, accustomed to obey orders of this kind given on the sudden and without authority. The militia came together without knowing from whom the orders originated, or for what purpose they met. And when met it was easy to communicate from breast to breast more or less of the popular frenzy, till all felt it or found it prudent to dissemble and feign that they felt it."

But many among the more influential and conservative people disapproved of, and were alarmed at, the intended demonstration. Several of these remonstrated with Bradford and Marshel, protesting against the carrying out of their dangerous plan, and insisting on the issuance of another circular countermanding the march of the troops to the rendezvous.[1] Finally Bradford appeared to yield, and sent out circulars, one of which was as follows:

[2] "Great exertions, however, were made in communicating the circular letters, and though many who probably wished to suppress them durst not, there were some who did keep their secret, and some clergymen and others, in the south of Washington County, were active and successful with their neighbors in dissuading them from going."—Findley, p. 97.

"DEAR SIR,—Upon receiving some late intelligence from our runners, we have been informed that the ammunition we were about to seize, was destined for Gen. Scott, who is just going out against the Indians. We therefore have concluded not to touch it. I give you this early notice, that your brave men of war need not turn out till further notice.

"Yours &c.,

"DAVID BRADFORD.

"COL. DAVID WILLIAMSON"

These circulars, however, were issued only two or three days before the time appointed for the rendezvous, and this, together with the absurd character of the notice, prevented their having any effect except in a few instances. In general the men were determined to march, and did march to the field.

"No sooner was the news of this frivolous counter order rumored through the town of Washington—which being in the midst of a farming population and entertaining feelings more in common with them than those of the town of Pittsburgh, where there was more trade and more government influence—than the people of Washington broke out into a furious rage, called a meeting at the court-house, and those of the country hearing of it, came rushing in under still greater excitement. James Ross, United States senator, who then resided there, in a speech of great earnestness of two hours endeavored to dissuade the populace. Thomas Scott, of the House of Representatives, Thomas Stokely, of the State Senate, David Redick, prothonotary, Henry Purviance, and others of the bar exerted themselves to effect the same object. James Marshel was in earnest to retract, and spoke publicly. Bradford, seeing the violence of the multitude, by which he was always swayed, was more inflammatory than he had ever been; denied that he had given his consent to the countermand, and asked with confidence who was the scoundrel who would say he had consented. There happened to be no one present who could contradict him or was willing to do so. It was now carried by a vote that the march to Braddock's Field should proceed. To show their displeasure with Marshel, the door of his house was tarred and feathered that night; threats of personal injury were thrown out, and he was compelled to declare his readiness to go."[2]

[1] "When Col. [John] Hamilton and some others had discovered the design of attacking the garrison [at Pittsburgh], and persuaded Bradford and Marshel to countermand the orders, he told them that the arms were for an expedition against the Indians, under General Scott. Bradford, without even consulting Marshel, or answering a word to Hamilton, wrote the countermand, and handing it to Hamilton, asked him if that would do. He inserted in a postscript what he had been told of Scott's expedition as a reason for the countermand; this first brought the design of the rendezvous to light; but it seems it was now given up; but the rendezvous being carried on, some who attended still believed that to have been the object of it, till they were convinced of its being laid aside by the event."—Findley.

The reported intention of the insurgent leaders to march from the appointed rendezvous on the 1st of August to attack the fort and despoil the town of Pittsburgh was generally known by the inhabitants of that place, and they were in consequence in a state of great anxiety, which was intensified to the wildest consternation by the arrival there in the afternoon of the day preceding that fixed for the mustering at Braddock's Field of a committee from Washington, bringing, as it was understood, from the leaders of the insurrection a message and demand of such importance that its immediate consideration and acceptance was necessary if the town was to be saved from destruction. In this alarming situation of affairs notices were at once sent out to the inhabitants of the place to attend a meeting to be held at the court-house in the evening of that day (July 31st), for the purpose of adopting measures to insure the public safety.

The meeting, composed of very nearly all the male adults of the town of Pittsburgh, assembled at an early hour in the evening, and an organization was soon effected by the choice of Gen. Gibson as chairman, and Matthew Ernest secretary. The main business was at once announced,—to hear and act upon a communication brought by the committee from Washington, viz.: Absalom Baird, William Meetkirk, Henry Purviance, and Gabriel Blakeney. The mail-packets which had been taken from the post-rider on the Philadelphia road near Greensburg, five days before, had been delivered to them by Bradford and Marshel, to be returned to the Pittsburgh post-office, with all their contents except the letters of Neville, Gibson, Bryson, Day, and Butler. But this was not the principal object of their mission. They brought the intelligence that Bradford and his satellites had taken great umbrage at the contents of the suppressed letters; that they were determined to take vengeance on the writers, and that the people who were even then on their march to the rendezvous at Braddock's Field were in a state of ungovernable fury, and apparently determined to destroy Pittsburgh,[3]—a resolve which would undoubtedly be put

[3] "The common language of the time in the country was, they were going to take Pittsburgh; some talked of plundering the town. It was an expression used, that as the old Sodom had been burned by fire from heaven, this second Sodom should be burned by fire from earth. The shop-keepers were told at their counters, by persons cheapening their goods, that they would get them at a less price in a few days. The very women coming in from the country would say, 'That fine lady lives in a fine house, but her pride will be humbled by and by.' Persons were coming to the blacksmiths with old guns, that had lain by a long time, to be repaired. Others were buying up flints and powder from the stores; there were many who were supposed to be from distant parts, no one in the town knowing them. Some were supposed to be spies, to see the condition of the garrison or the town; without appearing to have anything to do, they were seen to be lounging about from place to place. . . . It was now understood that preparations were everywhere making throughout the survey, and especially on the south [west] side of the Monongahela and in the neighborhood of that river, for the contemplated rendezvous at Braddock's Field. Maj. Butler had been industrious to improve the defenses of his garrison; Maj. Craig, the in execution on the morrow, unless some effective means were at once taken to prevent it. It was to give this warning to the people of that town, and to assist in devising some means to avert its destruction, that the men of the Washington committee now came; and it was with great difficulty that they had made their way there at all, for they had several times been stopped on the road by people in the interest of the insurgents, who wished to prevent any warning as to the true state of affairs from reaching the people of the doomed town, as they then supposed Pittsburgh to be.

These facts having been communicated to the meeting by a committee who had been appointed for conference with the Washington delegation, the question at once came up, what should be done to avert the stroke that seemed about to fall. The gentlemen from Washington gave it as their opinion that but two measures were practicable at best, and that either one, or even both of these, if adopted, would be as likely to fail as to succeed. One of these was that the proscribed persons be at once banished[1] (or, in other words, that they leave the town with the appearance of banishment), and the fact announced without delay to the insurgent leaders; and the other, that the citizens of Pittsburgh should march in a body to Braddock's Field, there to appear to fraternize with the insurgents, and convince them that the people of Pittsburgh were not their enemies, but friends.

These propositions were at once brought before the meeting and fully considered. All agreed that something must be done, and done immediately. If the forces should move on Pittsburgh with hostile intent, the destruction of the town was sure, for the assailants would number thousands,—the greater part fighting men who had seen service in the Revolution and Indian campaigns,—while the defenders would not exceed three hundred, including the forty or fifty men who formed the garrison of the fort, and it was suspected that even among the townspeople there were some who, having no property at stake, would be likely to go over to the enemy in case of an attack in strong force. Among the dwellings of the town there were none of any strength to resist an assault; all were mere wooden structures which could easily be burned over the heads of the inmates. The fort itself was but a slight stockade, which, although it would afford security against rifle-shots, was but weakly garrisoned, and could be soon carried by a heavy assaulting force without the aid of artillery, and even if the enemy should decline to assault it would fall after a siege of a few days, as it was but lightly provisioned. It could afford little protection to the citizens by its artillery, for the guns were light, and the work stood a mile away from the cluster of buildings called the town. These circumstances being duly considered, it was evident that the idea of resistance was not to be entertained, and thereupon the people unanimously adopted the only course offering a probability of safety, namely, to banish the proscribed persons, and to march en masse to the insurgent rendezvous on the following day, as will be seen by the minutes of the meeting,[2] which are here given, viz.:

"At a meeting of the inhabitants of Pittsburgh, on Thursday evening, July 31, 1794, to take into consideration the present condition of affairs, and declare their sentiments on this delicate crisis. A great majority, almost the whole of the inhabitants of the town assembled. It being announced to the meeting that certain gentlemen from the town of Washington had arrived, and had signified that they were intrusted with a message to the inhabitants of the town relative to present affairs, a committee of three persons were appointed to confer with them, and report the message to the meeting. The persons appointed were George Wallace, H. H. Brackenridge, and John Wilkins, Jr. These gentlemen made a report to the meeting, to wit: That in consequence of certain letters sent by the last mail, certain persons were discovered as advocates of the excise law, and enemies to the interests of the country, and that a certain Edward Day, James Bryson, and Abraham Kirkpatrick were particularly obnoxious, and that it was expected by the country that they should be dismissed without delay; whereupon it was resolved it should be done, and a committee of twenty-one were appointed to see this resolution carried into effect.

"Also that whereas it is a part of the message from the gentlemen of Washington, that a great body of the people of the country will meet to-morrow at Braddock's Field, in order to carry into effect measures that may seem to them advisable with respect to the excise law, and the advocates of it.

"Resolved, That the above committee shall, at an early hour, wait upon the people on the ground, and assure the people that the above resolution, with respect to the proscribed persons, has been carried into effect.

"Resolved, also, That the inhabitants of the town shall march out and join the people on Braddock's Field, as brethren, to carry into effect with them any measure that may seem to them advisable for the common cause.

"Resolved, also, That we shall be watchful among ourselves of all characters that, by word or act, may be unfriendly to the common cause; and, when discovered, will not suffer them to live amongst us, but they shall instantly depart the town.

"Resolved, That the town committee shall exist as a committee of information and correspondence as an organ of our sentiments until our next town meeting. And that whereas, a general meeting of delegates from the townships of the country on the west of the mountains will be held at Parkinson's Ferry on the Monongahela on the 14th of August next,

"Resolved, That delegates shall be appointed to that meeting, and that the 9th of August next be appointed for a town meeting to elect such delegates.

"Resolved, also, that a number of handbills be struck off at the expense of the committee, and distributed among the inhabitants of the town, that they may conduct themselves accordingly."

Immediately after the passage of these resolutions the people dispersed. The committee of twenty-one at once warned Kirkpatrick, Bryson, and Day to leave quartermaster, had removed into it with his family. Col. Neville had prepared to defend himself in his own house. Under these circumstances it was thought advisable by the citizens to call a town-meeting, to consider what was to be done for their own safety and that of the place thus threatened with destruction."—H. M. Brackenridge's History of the Western Insurrection.

[1] "We gave it as our opinion that the town was in imminent danger of being destroyed if some of the obnoxious characters were not sent away, for that we ourselves have been insulted on the road coming there by some people when they understood we were going to Pittsburgh, for they said we were going there as spies to tell the people to get out of the way, and that we ought to be taken prisoners, and they actually raised a party to follow us for that purpose, as we were afterwards informed."—Affidavit of William Meetkirk, one of the Washington Committee.

the town,[1] and also placed the proceedings of the meeting in the hands of John Scull, proprietor of the Pittsburgh Gazette, with orders to print six hundred copies, adding to the resolutions the certificate of the committee that the proscribed persons had already been warned, and had complied by leaving the town. The printed handbills to this effect were placed in the hands of the Washington committee to be distributed among the people at the rendezvous.

The people of Pittsburgh had done all in their power to appease the wrath which was held against them by a large proportion of the insurgents and those sympathizing with them among the inhabitants of the four counties (particularly those of Allegheny and Washington), but there was little sleep in the town that night, and all looked forward with dread to the morrow, which was more than likely to close on the smoking ruins of their homes.

At Braddock's Field on the appointed day there gathered a vast and excited multitude (variously estimated at from five thousand to eight thousand men), of whom a large proportion were militiamen and volunteers under arms. More than half of those present were men of Washington County, as were nearly all of the principal leaders. Among the great throng of persons assembled there, very few were favorable to the government and to the execution of the law. Such as were there of this class had come to the rendezvous lest their absence might be made a cause for proscription.[2] But they were compelled, out of regard for their personal safety, to conceal their real sentiments; and some of them had even assumed the rôle of leaders, for the purpose (as they said afterwards when the insurrection had been crushed) of gaining the confidence of the disaffected multitude, and then by organization and judicious management to restrain them from proceeding to outrage and rebellion. The Hon. Hugh H. Brackenridge was one of these, and there were some among the Washington County leaders whose course has been similarly explained. There were also present at Braddock's Field on this occasion some who went there merely as spectators, without any strong feeling on either side; but by far the greater part were in full sympathy with the insurgent cause. Mr. Brackenridge, who was a member of the Pittsburgh committee and marched with them to the field in accordance with the resolutions of the meeting above mentioned, gave the following description of what he saw there on the memorable first and second days of August:

"The ground where Braddock fought is on the east side (right bank) of the Monongahela, and on the same side with the town of Pittsburgh. The militia from Washington had therefore to cross the river in order to come upon the ground. They had crossed in great numbers at the same ford where Braddock did, and were now on the ground. They were dressed in what we call hunting-shirts, many of them with handkerchiefs on their heads; it is in this dress they equipped themselves against the Indians. They were amusing themselves with shooting with balls at marks, and firing in the air at random with powder only. There was a continual discharge of guns, and constant smoke in the woods and along the bank of the river. There appeared great wantonness of mind, and a disposition to do anything extravagant. We [the Pittsburgh committee] had advanced within the camp, as it was called, when the committee halted, and waited for Gen. Wilkins at the head of the Pittsburgh militia to approach. I saw him march by us, and discovered in his countenance a sufficient evidence of a sense of danger. Though I knew him to be a man of great personal intrepidity, yet I did not wonder at his apprehensions. Nothing but his appearing at the head of the militia could have saved him. I was thinking of his danger, when I turned my head a moment and was struck with the sight of the very man I was most afraid of, Andrew McFarlane [brother of James McFarlane, who was killed at the burning of Gen. Neville's house], just by me. He was dressed in a blue coat, with a dark visage, lowering countenance, and a rifle in his hand, looking at me. I

[1] No compulsion was necessary to induce the obnoxious persons to leave Pittsburgh, as demanded by the insurrectionists; but it afterwards appeared that they did not withdraw to any great distance, or go with any intention of remaining long away. "It was agreed," says H. M. Brackenridge, "that the proscribed should leave the town ostensibly as if banished, and that those who remained behind, some of whom would have been banished also, should put on a mask of being with the mob called 'the people, and the insurgents at Braddock's Field.' . . .

"Two days after the alarming march of the Whiskey Boys from Braddock's Field, it was rumored that Kirkpatrick had been seen in town. This rumor was traced to one of the inhabitants, on which the committee was called upon to inquire of that person, and to admonish him, in case he had circulated a false report. As the committee was assembling, Major Craig and Col. Neville were met coming from the garrison, and on being interrogated, acknowledged that Kirkpatrick was then in the garrison, having returned to town. The fact caused indignation in the committee; they considered themselves ill used, after the exertions they had made to save Kirkpatrick, and the dangers to which they had been exposed on his account and that of his connections, and resolved that Craig and Neville should be seized in his stead. The former returned to the garrison; the latter came before the committee . . . and stated that Kirkpatrick had returned for want of an escort, having been dogged by a party from whom his life was in danger. The committee undertook to furnish the escort, which was done; and he escaped by a circuitous way, until he reached the mountains, where he took the direct road to Philadelphia.

"Edward Day had gone down the river; Bryson was concealed a few days at the house of Robert Galbraith, Esq., the prosecuting attorney, who resided a few miles out of town. The country getting wind of it, collected in a mob, and surrounded the house at night, and insisted on searching, but in the mean time he had left the place. Gibson and Neville, at the instance of the Pittsburgh committee at Braddock's Field, had been allowed ten days to prepare for their departure, with passports for their security."—History of the Western Insurrection.

[2] Mr. Brackenridge, in describing the general feeling prevailing at that time throughout the western counties, says, "A breath in favor of the law was sufficient to ruin any man. Is was considered as a badge of Toryism. A clergyman was not thought orthodox in the pulpit unless against the law. A physician was not capable of administering medicine unless his principles were right in this respect. A lawyer could have got no practice without at least concealing his sentiments if for the law, nor could a merchant at a country store get custom. On the contrary, to talk against the law was the way to office and emolument. To go to the Legislature or to Congress you must make a noise against it. It was the Shibboleth of safety, and the ladder of ambition."

eyed him in my turn, but did not venture to speak. . . . After some time he turned about and went away. The next object that arrested my attention was Bradford walking before a number of battalions that had just crossed the river, and were ranged on the bank to be viewed by him. . . .

"Having been some time on the ground I fell in with Benjamin Parkinson. . . . He was in a group of men whom I knew to be warm in the cause. . . . All or most of them had been at the conflagration of the house of the Inspector. . . . They sat in a group on the ground, each with his rifle in his hand, or lying by him. I sat with them. The conversation turned upon the burning of the house, and they expressed great rage against Kirkpatrick, who had been the cause of burning it, and of the death of James McFarlane, by his refusing to let the house be searched for the Inspector's commission and papers. They expressed resentment against Major Butler for sending out soldiers to the house of the Inspector. They had inquired for Ormsby, who had accompanied Neville, the younger, and the Marshal from Pittsburgh. I said he was upon the ground, but was scarcely worth looking after. . . . I did not know that in the mean time the young man had been on the point of assassination. Fifteen men had painted themselves black as the Indian warriors do when they go to war. They had gone in search of Ormsby. Zedick [Enoch?] Wright, of Peters Creek, had discovered it, and having a good will for the family, or from motives of humanity, made haste to give him the intelligence of it, a few minutes, not a quarter of an hour, when they were seen to pass by openly in pursuit of him. He made his way to Pittsburgh in the course of the day by devious routes, and lay concealed in the barracks of the old garrison until the whole cavalcade was over. . . .

"People were coming in from every quarter all that day, generally armed, but some without arms. It was impossible to know the real sentiments of almost any one amongst the multitude, how far they were there from necessity or of choice. Every man was afraid of the opinions of another. Sometimes a word dropped, which might be construed away if not well taken, would lead to a confidence. The great bulk of the people were certainly in earnest, and the revolutionary language and the ideas of the French people had become familiar. It was not tarring and feathering as at the commencement of the Revolution from Great Britain, but guillotining,—that is, putting to death by any way that offered. I am persuaded that if even Bradford himself that day had ventured to check the violence of the people in any way that was not agreeable to them, and had betrayed the least partiality for the excise law, or perhaps even of a remission of his zeal against it, he would have sunk in an instant from his power, and they would have hung him on the first tree. . . . Certain it is that his influence was great. I saw a man wade into the river, lift cold water from the bottom of the channel, and bring it in his hat to him to drink. Applications were made to him that day for commissions in the service.[1] Nevertheless, whatever his idea might have been, he would have seen the extent of his power if he had ventured to tell the people that they should return without going to Pittsburgh. It was the object of all men who were apprehensive of the consequences to dissuade from this, but it appeared doubtful through the whole day whether or not it was practicable. It was afterwards found that it was not."

The troops bivouacked for the night upon the mustering-ground, and when the shadows of evening fell hundreds of fires blazed brightly in the woods and along the slopes of the historic field. The men stretched themselves in careless comfort on their blankets or upon the bare ground. Many were hilarious, and all were good-humored and cheerful, except the Pittsburgh people, who still felt great anxiety in view of what might be the fate of their town on the morrow. Besides this they had another source of discomfort in the fact that, not having come with the expectation of remaining overnight, they brought no provisions with them, and were consequently suffering from hunger. Some of the Pittsburghers attempted (notwithstanding the order that all should remain on the ground through the night) to steal away and return to town to procure food, but as they were still regarded with suspicion their movements were closely watched, and they were compelled to remain. "In the evening," said John Wilkins, of Pittsburgh,[2] "I intended coming to town, and met with some of my neighbors who wished the same; we came as far as Judge Wallace's. A man came after and acquainted us that no man should go to Pittsburgh that night,—another severe stroke. However, the order must be obeyed. I then got into a farmhouse for the night." They were told that, for their own safety, as well as that of their town, they must stay at the rendezvous no matter how hungry they might be, for if their absence was discovered they would be suspected of deserting the cause, and the consequences would be serious. At the time when the party attempted to leave and return to town the fact was immediately noticed, and a clamor raised, but Col. Marshel, who was friendly to them, sent a messenger to order them back, and when they had returned he and a few others took care to let the fact be known among the men in all the battalions.

[1] "David Bradford assumed the office of major-general; mounted on a superb horse in splendid trappings, arrayed in full martial uniform, with plumes floating in the air and sword drawn, he rode over the ground, gave orders to the military, and harangued the multitude. Never was mortal man more flattered than was David Bradford on Braddock's Field. Everything depended on his will. The insurgents adored him, paid him the most servile homage in order to be able to control and manage him."—Carnahan.

[2] In a letter to Gen. Irvine, dated Aug. 19, 1794; Penn. Archives, 2d Series, vol. iv. pp. 168–72.

"About midnight," says Brackenridge, "I rode through the camp where the people were lying at the fires in their blankets or without. I made a pretense of inquiring for the Pittsburgh battalion, and with this in view at the same time to let them know the Pittsburgh people were still on the ground. My principal object was to ascertain the determination of the people with regard to their coming to Pittsburgh. I found the universal sentiment to be that they would see the town. There was little sleep in the camp. The firing and shouting had ceased, but there was a continued conversation.

"Passing on to a range of fires, I found Hamilton's battalion [composed of the Mingo Creek men]. This had arrived late in the evening. It had been long expected, and was called the 'bloody battalion.' The greatest part of it had been at the burning of the Inspector's house. We expected desperate measures when these came. It was commanded by John Hamilton, a man very moderate and reasonable, and who was disposed to restrain the people from acts of violence, and with that view had come with them. David Hamilton, his cousin, was the first that accosted me, and wishing to serve me with the people, called out, 'This is a true Whig, but what do you think of that d—d fellow, James Ross? He has been here, and all through the camp, persuading the people not to go to Pittsburgh.' . . . Returning to a farm-house just by the camp, where some of our committee were, I communicated the result of my observations. Some of them had been through the camp in the same manner, and had the same impressions that I had with regard to the impossibility of preventing the people from coming to town."

At an early hour on the following morning a council of officers was called, and a committee of three persons from each battalion chosen to say what should be done. The committee retired to a grove and organized, with Col. Edward Cook as chairman. They were harangued by Bradford, who put the question what was to be done with certain objectionable persons who still remained in Pittsburgh,—Maj. Butler, commandant of the garrison, Gen. Gibson, Maj. Isaac Craig, and others. It was decided to take no action against Majs. Butler and Craig until the Parkinson's Ferry meeting, to be held on the 14th. The deliberations of the committee were interfered with by a great crowd of people who gathered around them. These began to grow impatient when the cases of Craig and Butler were under consideration, and plainly informed the committee that they should take the matter into their own hands if there was much more delay. Then Bradford at once proposed that the entire body should march to Pittsburgh, and in this he was seconded by Brackenridge, who, despairing of success in opposition to the project, conceived the idea of guiding and controlling the lawless movement by apparent acquiescence. "Yes," said he, "by all means let us go, if for no other reason than to give a proof to our opponents that we are capable of maintaining the strictest order, and of refraining from all excesses. Let us march through the town, muster on the banks of the Monongahela, take a little whiskey with the people, and then move the troops across the river." The plan was adopted. Officers were appointed,—David Bradford and Edward Cook, generals, and Col. Gabriel Blakeney, officer of the day,—and under their command the entire body moved over the Monongahela road to Pittsburgh, Brackenridge leading the column as guide, on account of his knowledge of the country and the roads.

As soon as it was fully decided that the troops should march to Pittsburgh, and some time before the column was formed and put in motion, Bradford very thoughtfully sent the Pittsburgh committee forward to notify the people of the movement. One of those who went in advance for this purpose was John Wilkins, who, in the letter before quoted from, says, "I did not go into camp [from the farm-house where he had passed the preceding night] until nine o'clock Saturday morning; the first orders I received were that the committee of twenty-one must go immediately to town, and acquaint the women, etc., that the army was determined to march into town, but that they were coming in peace; that all stores and taverns should be shut, and no liquors sold to the men, but that if any refreshments were given by the inhabitants, it must be carried to the place where the men would halt on the commons; as also to procure all the craft and bring them to a certain part of the river in order to carry the men over the Monongahela. I was one of the first five who reached town; we first called on Major Butler, and informed him that the men were all marching into town, that they intended no harm either to him or the town, but only wished to show themselves, then march every man to his own home.

"We had scarce finished our instructions until the front appeared. I then rode to a place where I could see the length of the line. They marched in files, and in good order, leaving a small space in between each Battalion. They appeared to be upwards of two and a half miles long, and by the space of ground they took up there might be between five and six thousand, some said seven or eight thousand. A great number of people left them at Braddock's Field; one Battalion from Westmoreland went from thence in a body."

The insurgent column (in reality numbering fully four thousand five hundred men) entered Pittsburgh at a little after twelve o'clock, and marching down the main street of the town (keeping out of sight of the fort) "halted at the large flat of ground opposite Maine house." The inhabitants were terror-stricken, but exerted themselves to the utmost to please their unwelcome guests, many of them setting before their doors tables covered with such refreshments as they had at command. The committee had ordered the taverns closed, but the landlords were called on, and willingly set out their whiskey free of charge. Large quantities of liquor were furnished by others of the inhabitants, and H. H. Brackenridge said the amount furnished by him individually was four barrels. "I thought it better," he says, "to be employed in extinguishing the fire of their throats than of my house, and most other persons thought in the same manner."

Immediately after the entrance of the army into the town the men of the Pittsburgh battalion (who marched in the rear) left their places, and set themselves actively at work carrying water to the place where the other troops were halted. "Members of the committee," says Brackenridge, "set the example by carrying water and whiskey to these 'Whiskey Boys,' as they have since been called." It appears that there was liquor in plenty, and furnished without stint. The quantity consumed by four thousand five hundred thirsty and excited men must have been enormous, and it is a wonder that in their semi-intoxication they could have been prevented from firing the town, as had been so freely threatened. But this desirable object was accomplished, and beyond the thorough frightening of the inhabitants very little serious damage was done during the brief stay of the "army."

There were some of the leaders (in fact, nearly all of them) who did not wish to have the town destroyed. It is certain that Major-General Bradford was of this number, for if he had wished to see it burned, the lightest word from him would have caused the torch to be applied. Another, Col. James Marshel, of Washington, was in an agony of mind, fearing that it would be done by the half-drunken riflemen in spite of his efforts to prevent it. He with others co-operated most earnestly with the leading people of Pittsburgh to get the troops across the Monongahela to the south side as soon as possible. If the water had been high it would have taken many hours to cross them, for only three or four flat-boats could be collected from the ferries as a means of transportation; but the river was at so low a stage that it could be forded by the mounted men, who formed the greater part of the army. These were piloted across by H. H. Brackenridge, who knew the fording-place, a short distance above the mouth of the Allegheny. Meanwhile, the few boats were being used for the transportation of the infantry, and before sunset nearly the entire army had been crossed in safety to the south side of the Monongahela. The boats were returned to the north side, and the citizens of Pittsburgh breathed freer, though their apprehensions were by no means entirely removed, for there still remained on the north side nearly two hundred of the insurgents, who could not be induced to cross the river, being determined to remain overnight in the town, and any commotion raised or shots fired by these, indicating, as it would, a collision between them and the citizens, would cause the horsemen of the main body to return from the south side, in which case the consequences would doubtless have been deplorable.

During the night the men who were on the south side of the river set fire to the buildings of Maj. Kirkpatrick, on the bluff opposite Pittsburgh, and succeeded in destroying his barn at that place, though the dwelling was saved. Meanwhile a part of the men not included in the body which had been enticed across the Monongahela had become somewhat riotous in Pittsburgh, and set fire to the town residence of Maj. Kirkpatrick. It had been their intention to destroy his house, as well as those of Neville, Gibson, and others, but the consummation of this design had been prevented, largely by the interference of Col. Marshel, Col. Edward Cook,[1] and Andrew McFarlane, brother of Maj. McFarlane, who was killed in the attack on Neville's house at Bower Hill, two weeks before. A company dressed in butternut-dyed hunting-shirts and under command of a Capt. Riddle were foremost in this attempt to burn Kirkpatrick's house. If they had succeeded in it, there is little doubt that the principal part of the town would have been burned; but after the quelling of this outbreak the night passed without any further disturbance. In the following morning the main body of the host that had bivouacked on the opposite side of the Monongahela marched southward from the river, and long before sunset on that Sabbath-day the last stragglers of the rearmost bands had crossed the stream from Pittsburgh and disappeared from the vicinity.

An account of the turbulent proceedings at Braddock's Field and Pittsburgh was forwarded without delay to the State and national authorities, and on the 7th of August the President of the United States issued a proclamation, reciting in its preamble that "combinations to defeat the execution of the laws laying duties upon spirits distilled within the United States, and upon stills, have from the time of the commencement of those laws existed in some of the western parts of Pennsylvania, . . . that many persons in the said western parts of Pennsylvania have at length been hardy enough to perpetrate acts which I am advised amount to treason, being overt acts of levying war against the United States," and com-

[1] Concerning this affair, the following card was published in the Pittsburgh Gazette: "We, the undersigned, on behalf of ourselves and the great body of the column that marched from Braddock's Field on the 3d of August, 1794, think it necessary to express our disapprobation of the disorderly proceeding of those of the troops who were concerned in setting fire to the house of Abraham Kirkpatrick, on the hill opposite the town of Pittsburgh, also of the attempt made by others of burning his house in the town, as these acts were not within the sentence of the committee of volunteers in Braddock's Field, and therefore there could be no authority for carrying them into effect. We consider it as a blemish on the good order of the march of the column through the town of Pittsburgh and their cantonment in the neighborhood of it. It has been endeavored to be removed as much as possible by repaying the tenant of Kirkpatrick's his damages." The signatures to this card of explanation and disclaimer were headed by that of Edward Cook, which was followed by those of Col. Marshel and thirteen others prominent in the insurrection.

manding "all persons being insurgents, as aforesaid, and all others whom it may concern," to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes on or before the 1st of September following; moreover, warning all persons "against aiding, abetting, or comforting the perpetrators of the aforesaid treasonable acts, and requiring all officers and other citizens, according to their respective duties and the laws of the land, to exert their utmost endeavors to prevent and suppress such dangerous proceedings." At the same time the President called for troops to be raised and equipped in the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and New Jersey, and to be held in readiness to march at shortest notice, for the purpose of suppressing the insurrection and enforcing the law. The quotas of the States were assigned as follows:

	Infantry.	Cavalry.	Artillery.	Total.
Pennsylvania	4,500	500	200	5,200
New Jersey	1,500	500	100	2,100
Maryland	2,000	200	150	2,350
Virginia	3,000	300	.....	3,300
	11,000	1,500	450	12,950

On the same day Governor Mifflin, of Pennsylvania, issued his proclamation directing that the State's quota of men be armed and equipped as speedily as possible, "and to be held in readiness to march at a moment's warning," and a second proclamation was issued calling together the Assembly of the State in special session. Previously (on the 6th of August) the Governor had appointed Chief Justice McKean and Gen. William Irvine to proceed immediately to the disaffected counties, to ascertain the facts in reference to the recent acts of violence and lawless gatherings, and, if practicable, to induce the people to submit to the law.

The President, on the day next following the issuance of his proclamation, appointed James Ross, United States senator, Jasper Yeates, associate judge Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and William Bradford, Attorney-General of the United States, commissioners on the part of the United States, with full instructions and ample powers, to repair forthwith to the western counties, for the purpose of conferring, at their discretion, with individuals or bodies of men, "in order to quiet and extinguish the insurrection."

The call for a meeting of delegates from the townships of the four western counties of Pennsylvania and the neighboring counties of Virginia, adopted and issued by the Mingo Creek meeting of July 23d, has been mentioned. This was supplemented by another call, issued by Maj.-Gen. Bradford at Braddock's Field on the 1st of August, in the following circular letter:[1]

"To the Inhabitants of Monongahela, Virginia:

"GENTLEMEN,—I presume you have heard of the spirited opposition given to the excise law in this State. Matters have been so brought to pass here that all are under the necessity of bringing their minds to a final conclusion. This has been the question amongst us some days, 'Shall we disapprove of the conduct of those engaged against Neville, the excise officer, or approve?' Or, in other words, 'Shall we suffer them to fall a sacrifice to Federal persecution, or shall we support them?' On the result of this business we have fully deliberated, and have determined, with head, heart, hand, and voice, that we will support the opposition to the excise law. The crisis is now come, submission or opposition: we are determined in the opposition. We are determined in future to act agreeably to system; to form arrangements guided by reason, prudence, fortitude, and spirited conduct. We have proposed a general meeting of the four counties of Pennsylvania, and have invited our brethren in the neighboring counties in Virginia to come forward and join us in council and deliberation in this important crisis, and conclude upon measures interesting to the western counties of Pennsylvania and Virginia. A notification of this kind may be seen in the Pittsburgh paper. Parkinson's Ferry is the place proposed as the most central, and the 14th of August the time. We solicit you by all the ties that an union of interests can suggest to come forward and join us in our deliberations. The cause is common to us all. We invite you to come, even should you differ with us in opinion. We wish you to hear our reasons influencing our conduct."

The events of the first days of August at Braddock's Field and Pittsburgh and of the two or three succeeding weeks seemed to mark the culmination of the popular frenzy on the subject of the excise law, and from the 15th of July to the last of August was the period of the greatest excitement that exhibited itself during the insurrection. During the interval of time between the great muster at Braddock's and the day appointed for the meeting at Parkinson's Ferry, great numbers of "liberty-poles" were erected by the insurgents in various parts of the four counties, and upon these were hoisted flags, bearing such inscriptions as "DEATH TO TRAITORS," "LIBERTY AND NO EXCISE." Few persons were found hardy enough to refuse assistance in the erection of these poles, for to do so was to be branded as an enemy to the cause, and a fit subject for the vengeance of Tom the Tinker. One of these "liberty-poles" was erected in the town of Washington on the 24th of August, its raising being attended by scenes of great excitement and commotion. Similar poles were erected at about the same time at a great number of places in different parts of the county. They stood, bearing their threatening flags and inscriptions, until the tide of insurrection began to turn before the menace of military force, and then those who had raised them were glad enough to see them fall, and to deny all agency in their erection.

On the 14th of August, according to appointment, the meeting of delegates from the several counties was opened at Parkinson's Ferry (now Monongahela City), the place of meeting being near the river-bank "on an eminence under the shade of trees,"[1] near which had just been erected a tall liberty-pole, from which floated a flag bearing the inscription, "Equal Taxation and no Excise—No Asylum for Traitors and Cowards." There were two hundred and twenty-six delegates present, of whom ninety-three (more than two-fifths of the whole number) were from the townships of Washington County, forty-three from Allegheny, forty-nine from Westmoreland, thirty-three from Fayette, two from Bedford, and six from Ohio County, Va. Gathered around the delegates as they sat in convention was a greater number of spectators, many of them armed.

The meeting was organized by the appointment of Col. Edward Cook and the Hon. Albert Gallatin, both of Fayette County, respectively as chairman and secretary. The proceedings were opened by a speech from David Bradford, in which he rehearsed the events which had occurred,—the coming of Marshal Lenox; the service of the writs; the attack on and destruction of Gen. Neville's house, and the death of McFarlane; the meeting at Mingo Creek; the great mustering of the clans at Braddock's Field; the march through Pittsburgh, and the expulsion from that town of the proscribed persons, at the latter point reading the objectionable letters which had been intercepted, commenting on their contents in severest terms, and in general advocating extreme measures against those who were recreant enough to side with the government by assisting or approving the execution of the laws. This speech was followed by another from Col. Marshel, which was less extreme but yet firm in support of the insurrection and its purposes.

At the time when the meeting convened, the proclamations of the President and Governor Mifflin had not been received, and neither the commissioners for the State nor those for the United States had made their appearance or been heard from, but during the proceedings there came news of the calling out of the troops, that the two delegations were on their way from Philadelphia, and that two of the United States commissioners had just arrived at Greensburg.[2] The receipt of this intelligence marked the culminating point of the insurrection. It fell like a thunderbolt on those assembled at Parkinson's Ferry, and the fact became at once apparent that a reaction had commenced, and that the tide of opinion had, with nearly all the leaders, begun to set against the adoption of violent measures.

It was claimed for some of those who at this meeting developed a strong opposition to the plans of Bradford and other extremists that their course was prompted by the same desire which had at first induced them to range themselves among the disaffected,—that of appearing to assume leadership for the purpose of curbing the lawless element, and diverting its energies from the track leading to open violence and rebellion. But there is little doubt that their action at this time was in no small degree due to their late realization of the fact that the United States government had resolved to put down lawlessness at whatever cost, that it would exert all its powers, if necessary, to enforce obedience, and that as against that power the cause of the insurrectionists was hopeless. Brackenridge, an able and far-sighted man, had realized from the first that this result was probable, and in his connection with the insurgent movement, all his acts had been done, and all his speeches made, in a manner to admit of a double interpretation, so as to allow him to keep his popularity with the insurrectionists, and yet not compromise him with the government. Gallatin, a wily and prudent man, had foreseen that such might be the result, and his course had been much the same, though less adroit than that of Brackenridge. Findley was a time-server, and with all his bitterness against the administration of Washington, and all his love of office and popularity, he was careful to avoid advancing to a point from which he would be unable to recede. But nearly all the other leaders believed, or appeared by their actions to believe, that their combination was extensive and strong enough to defy the government and force it to terms, but when the announcement was made that the commander-in-chief of the Revolutionary armies had invoked the military power to crush them, they were in a single hour awakened from their delusion, and the cry which before had been à l'outrance was now sauve qui peut, though each one was careful to conceal his misgivings from the others.

[1] H. M. Brackenridge says, "The place was an open field on the banks of the river with fallen timber and stumps, with a few shade-trees instead of buildings for the accommodation of this important assembly, whose deliberations might be attended with the most serious consequences for good or evil."

[2] In a letter written by William Findley to Secretary Dallas, dated Aug. 23, 1794, he mentions that he was present at the meeting at Parkinson's, and says, "Messrs. Yates and Bradford came to Greensburg the morning of the meeting, and wrote by express to me of their pacific intentions and authority, which being communicated to the meeting had a salutary effect, and a committee of discreet men were appointed to confer with the commissioners at Pittsburgh, but unfortunately the newspapers came next morning with the President's proclamation and the orders for an armed force as a substitute for judicial proceedings; this irritated and inflamed those even who had been formerly moderate and regular, and greatly increased the difficulty of accommodation."

Col. James Marshel, who in the first of the meeting had introduced a series of very strong resolutions, was thoroughly subdued by the alarming news from the East, "and from that moment," says Brackenridge, "he acted with the friends of the government with sincerity." Bradford alone, of all the leaders, stood defiant, even more so than before. In a fiery speech he demanded that measures be taken to prepare for repelling "invasion," declaring in effect that a show of vigorous military preparation would be sure to overawe the government and enable them to dictate their own terms. His speech found no favor with any of the other leaders, and was replied to in opposition by several of them; but the insurgent rank and file who were present, sided with him almost unanimously. "I lay that night," says H. H. Brackenridge, "at a farm-house in the neighborhood, with a hundred or more of the gallery spectators and of the assembly about me; the whole cry was war."

At the reassembling of the meeting on the morning of the 15th of August, a committee composed of Albert Gallatin, H. H. Brackenridge, and Herman Husbands, of Bedford County, who had been appointed to remodel the resolutions previously offered by Col. James Marshel, submitted the result of their labors, which was read before the meeting and afterwards passed, though somewhat modified. During the forenoon the United States commissioners came to a house not far from the place of meeting, which, as Findley says, "rendered the situation of the friends of order more delicate," which means that they were so placed that if they flocked to the commissioners, each one anxious to have the first word, and to record himself as a "friend of order," the fact would at once be known to the body of the insurgents, and a loss of popularity would be the result; whereas if they kept aloof from the commissioners it might place the ban of the government upon them as obdurate adherents to the insurgent cause. Most of them, however, forgot in their fears, all considerations of popularity with the masses, and the hopes of future election to office, and some of them insisted that the meeting should never adjourn until terms had been made with the commissioners, but this result was not accomplished.

The resolutions reported by the committee were passed in a modified form as before stated. The second of the series provided for the appointment of a standing committee, to consist of one member from each township, charged with various duties, among which was the drafting of a remonstrance to Congress, praying for a repeal of the excise law. They were also "to have power to call together a meeting, either of a new representation of the people or of the deputies here convened, for the purpose of taking such further measures as the future situation of affairs may require; and in case of any sudden emergency to take such temporary measures as they may think necessary." The closing resolution was to this effect, "That a committee, to consist of three members from each county, be appointed to meet any commissioners that have been or may be appointed by the government, and report the result of this conference to the standing committee." The standing committee (consisting of sixty persons) met, and appointed the committee to meet the commissioners of the United States and those of Pennsylvania, as provided by the final resolution. This committee of conference was composed as follows:

For Washington County: David Bradford, James Marshel, and James Edgar.

For Allegheny County: Hugh H. Brackenridge, Thomas Moreton, and John B. C. Lucas.

For Fayette County: Albert Gallatin, Edward Cook, and James Lang.

For Westmoreland County: John Kirkpatrick, George Smith, and John Powers.

For Bedford County: Herman Husbands.

For Ohio County, Va., William Sutherland.

The meeting of the delegates at Parkinson's Ferry adjourned at two o'clock P.M. on the 15th of August. The Committee of Sixty, after having appointed and instructed the committee of conference, adjourned to meet at Redstone Old Fort (Brownsville) on the 2d of September.

The commissioners for the State arrived at Pittsburgh on the 17th of August, and those appointed by the President came immediately afterwards. On the 20th the two bodies met the committee of conference which was appointed at Parkinson's Ferry. At this meeting preliminary proceedings were taken, which resulted in propositions by both bodies of commissioners, who declared explicitly that the exercise of the powers vested in them to suspend prosecutions, and to promise a general amnesty and pardon for past offenses, "must be preceded by full and satisfactory assurances of a sincere determination in the people to obey the laws of the United States." The members of the committee who took the most prominent part in the proceedings were Bradford and Marshel, of Washington; Gallatin and Cook, of Fayette; and Brackenridge, of Allegheny County. All these, with the exception of Bradford, were in favor of acceding to the propositions of the commissioners, and this was found to be the sense of the committee; but they had no power to act, further than to report the result of the conference to the standing Committee of Sixty. That committee had adjourned to meet at Redstone Old Fort on the 2d of September, as before mentioned, but upon the conclusion of the conference with the commissioners at Pittsburgh the time of their meeting was changed and made five days earlier,[1] though this change

[1] Following are extracts from a communication addressed by the committee of conference to the United States commissioners:

"PITTSBURGH, Aug. 22, 1794.

"GENTLEMEN,—Having in our conference at considerable length stated to you the grounds of that discontent which exists in the minds of the people of this country, and, which has lately shown itself in acts of opposition to the excise law, you will consider us as waiving any question of time gave great offense to Bradford and other extremists. The change of time was made in deference to one of the conditions imposed by the commissioners, viz.: "It is expected and required by the said commissioners that the citizens composing the said standing committee do, on or before the first day of September next, explicitly declare their determination to submit to the laws of the United States, and that they will not, directly or indirectly, oppose the execution of the acts for raising a revenue on distilled spirits and stills."

Accordingly, on the 28th of August, the standing committee (the "Committee of Sixty") met at Redstone Old Fort (Brownsville), to receive and act upon the report of the committee of conference. Of the sixty members of the committee, fifty-seven were in attendance, of whom twenty-three were from Washington County, thirty from the three counties of Westmoreland, Allegheny, and Fayette, one from Bedford, and three from Ohio County, Va. While the members of the committee were assembling a large military company crossed the Monongahela from the western side, by John Krepps' ferry, to the site of the present town of Bridgeport, then crossed Dunlap's Creek to the Old Fort. The company consisted of about seventy men on foot, all fully armed, and some of them dressed in a kind of military uniform, and fifteen or twenty horsemen also fully armed, and all in the uniform of the day and region, the principal garment of which was the omnipresent hunting-shirt. The entire company, which was under command of Capt. Crawford, of Muddy Creek, was made up of men from that section of Washington County. They attended the meeting for the purpose of showing their sympathy with the insurrection and their defiance of the government, and to administer chastisement to Samuel Jackson,[1] of Fayette County, for having (as was reported) applied a contemptuous epithet to the august Committee of Sixty, otherwise styled by their adherents the "Committee of Safety." As they paraded the single street of the place they made quite a formidable appearance, and contributed no little towards keeping up the excitement and spirit of defiance among the mass of people; but it had no such effect on the leaders, for nearly all of them were thoroughly cowed and resolved on submission, making the best terms possible for themselves. Judge Alexander Addison said[2] "that the minds of all men appeared to be strongly impressed with a sense of the critical situation of the country, and the minds of almost all with a fear of opposing the current of the popular opinion," and that "these impressions were greatly increased by the appearance of a body of armed men assembled there from Muddy Creek, in Washington County." The armed party remained at Brownsville until night, when they were prevailed on by the more prudent of the leaders to recross the river and return to their homes; but Findley says that during their stay at Brownsville, "by their presence and threats, they overawed the meeting."

The business of the meeting was opened by the submission of the conference committee's report and a speech upon it by Mr. Gallatin, who urged the adoption of a resolution in acceptance of the terms offered by the commissioners, and set forth the dan-of the constitutional power of the President to call upon the force of the Union to suppress them. It is our object, as it is yours, to compose the disturbance. . . . We have already stated to you in conference that we are empowered to give you no definite answer with regard to the sense of the people on the great question of acceding to the law, but that in our opinion it is the interest of the country to accede, and that we shall make this report to the committee to whom we are to report, and state to them the reasons of our opinion, that so far as they have weight they may be regarded by them. It will be our endeavor to conciliate not only them, but the public mind in general to our views on this subject. We hope to be assisted by you in giving all that extent and precision, clearness and certainty to your propositions that may be necessary to satisfy the understandings and engage the acquiescence of the people. . . . As we are disposed, with you, to have the sense of the people taken on the subject of our conference as speedily as may be, with that view we have resolved to call the committee to whom our report is to be made at an earlier day than had been appointed, to wit, on Thursday, the 28th instant, but have not thought ourselves authorized in changing the place at Redstone Old Fort, on the Monongahela.

"By order of the Committee,

"EDWARD COOK, Chairman."

Less conciliatory but more curious was the reply of the Ohio County (Va.) committee to the United States commissioners, viz.:

"PITTSBURGH, Aug. 23, 1794.

[1] Samuel Jackson was a Quaker of great respectability, a man of some wealth, and in part owner of a paper-mill on Redstone Creek. He was conscientiously opposed to the use and manufacture of whiskey, and naturally sided against the insurgents. This caused them to regard him as a foe, and the enmity was increased by a remark which he had made concerning the meeting at Parkinson's Ferry, calling it a "scrub congress." It was for this offense that the Muddy Creek men now visited him, took him prisoner, marched him to Brownsville, and arraigned him before the Committee of Sixty. Violence might and probably would have been done him but for the interposition of Judge Brackenridge, a member of the committee, but an acquaintance and personal friend of Mr. Jackson. On the appearance of the latter the judge took the matter into his own hands. He addressed the meeting, saying that Samuel was certainly very culpable for having applied so disrespectful an epithet to such an august and legitimate assemblage of the sovereign people, but that it was probably from lack of thought and reflection more than from sinister design, and that on this account the proper punishment to apply to him would be to pay him in his own coin by stigmatizing him as a "scrub Quaker." The effect was just what the judge had intended. Tom the Tinker's boys yelled with delight, and after admonishing the scrub Quaker to be more careful of his language in the future allowed him to depart with no other maltreatment than the jeers of the Muddy Creekers and their compatriots.

ger of using force in resistance to the law, the impossibility of these western counties contending successfully against the force of the United States, and the evident necessity of submission. "Mr. Gallatin, although a foreigner who could with difficulty make himself understood in English, yet presented with great force the folly of past resistance and the ruinous consequences to the country of the continuance of the insurrection. He urged that the government was bound to vindicate the laws, and that it would surely send an overwhelming force against them. He placed the subject in a new light, and showed the insurrection to be a much more serious affair than it had before appeared."[1] Brackenridge followed Gallatin in an argument to the same end, though urged in a different manner. His speech was followed by a violent one from Bradford, who scouted the idea of "surrender," as he called it, denounced those who advocated the making of terms with the commissioners, and strenuously advocated continued resistance, in which he was almost unanimously supported by the large assembly of people present, who greeted his speech with the most enthusiastic cheers. The business of the day proceeded amid scenes of wild excitement, and no result was reached.

On the 29th the meeting was opened by Gallatin, who made another long and sensible speech in favor of accepting the terms of the commissioners. Other addresses to the same end were made by speakers of the previous day. Bradford was of course prominent in the debate, and his speech at this time was more violent than any he had previously made. He boldly advocated the project of erecting a new and independent government.[2] He cited the revolutions in America and in France as models for imitation, and as inducements to hope for the success of these counties against the government, which he said was rendered reasonably certain on account of their peculiar situation, as separated from the eastern country by almost insurmountable natural barriers. He proposed the immediate raising of an army to meet any government force that might be sent against them, to drive it back in rout and possess themselves of its arms and ammunition, after which they could easily hold their country against all invaders and secure independence beyond all doubt. His whole speech was manifestly intended to keep up the opposition to government and to prevent the adoption of the resolutions proposed by Gallatin.

The leaders, with the exception of Bradford and a few others of less prominence, had fully made up their minds to abandon the wreck of the insurrection, but the followers had apparently at that time little thought of submission, and were as violent and determined on opposition as ever, and so strong an influence did this exert, even on the leaders who knew that the cause was hopeless, that they dared not openly and fully avow their sentiments and place themselves on record. "Such was the fear of the popular frenzy that it was with difficulty that a vote could be had at this meeting. No one would vote by standing up. None would write a yea or nay, lest his handwriting should be recognized. At last it was determined that yea and nay should be written by the secretary on the same pieces of paper, and be distributed, leaving each member to chew up or destroy one of the words while he put the other in the box," thus giving each member an opportunity of concealing his opinion, and of sheltering himself from the resentment of those from whom violence was to be apprehended, or whom he wished to avoid offending. In this way a balloting was had, and in the adoption of the resolutions by a vote of thirty-four to twenty-three, as announced, though it was afterwards found that six votes had been cast in the negative under a misapprehension of its import, so that but for this mistake the vote would have stood forty for, and seventeen against, the resolution.[3] When the result was declared, so strongly in

[1] Judge Wilkeson.

[2] With reference to this speech of Bradford, Findley says, "Reports were circulated that Bradford, who lodged on the Washington side of the river that night, had bound himself firmly with a number of others to support the opposition by force of arms until government would be brought to agree unequivocally to their own terms; it appeared by what followed that the idea of a complete revolution was now taken up by Bradford, and it was certain that several of the most obstinate of those who originated the present violent measures were among the spectators, and perhaps some of them members of the committee; but Marshel and others of the most respectable men among them had totally withdrawn from their interest." Judge McKean, one of the commissioners, in a letter to Attorney-General Ingersoll, dated Pittsburgh, Aug. 29, 1794, said, "In case a reconciliation and amnesty had not taken place many (I believe a majority of the people here) threatened to become British subjects, to remove into the Indian country, or at all events to detach themselves from the laws of the Union, and be independent of any government except one formed by themselves. Indeed, their speeches and actions have been most extravagant; a frenzy seemed to be diffused through the country; the still voice of reason drowned, and the wildest chimeras to have taken possession of men's minds. One might be led to think it was the work of magic, or owing to some physical cause."

[3] The following letter, in reference to this meeting and the result of the voting, was written by the Pennsylvania commissioners to Governor Mifflin. It is dated Pittsburgh, Aug. 30 (2 o'clock P.M.), 1794:

"We have this moment received a copy of the proceedings of the Committee of Sixty, called the Committee of Safety, at Brownsville yesterday, which we have the honor to enclose to you. Exclusive of the knowledge of the sentiments of these gentlemen, to be derived from the Resolutions they have passed, we have good information that the sense of those present, being fifty-seven in number, was taken by ballot on the question 'whether they would acquiesce in the terms of reconciliation proposed by the Commissioners of the United States;' and that it was carried in the affirmative by thirty-four votes against twenty-three as the votes were counted, although in reality six had put in their ballots in the negative in a mistake, so the true state of the numbers was forty for, and seventeen against, submission. We have been told there were a considerable number of Spectators there (one company of militia with their arms), who appeared to be variously affected, though our information is that the majority were for pacific measures."—Pa. Arch., 2d Series, iv., pp. 218, 219.

But the United States commissioners took a somewhat different view of the significance of the proceedings at the Brownsville meeting. In their report, made September 24th, they said,—

"The underwritten were informed by several of the members of that meeting, as well as other citizens who were present at it, that the report of the committee of conference and the proposals of the commissioners were unfavorably received; that rebellion and hostile resistance against the United States were publicly recommended by some of the members, opposition to his views, Bradford left the meeting in anger and disgust.[1] Nearly all the spectators also withdrew as soon as the vote was declared, and the committee was left almost alone to complete their business.

The main resolution adopted at the Brownsville meeting was as follows: "Resolved, That in the opinion of this Committee it is the interest of the people of this Country to accede to the proposals made by the Commissioners on the part of the United States. Resolved, that a Copy of the foregoing resolution be transmitted to the said Commissioners."

But instead of giving the assurances required by the commissioners, the Committee of Sixty showed a disposition to temporize, and in the hope of obtaining better terms they further "Resolved, That a Committee be appointed[2] to confer with the Commissioners on the part of the United States and of the State of Pennsylvania, with instructions to the said Committee to try to obtain from the said Commissioners such further modification in their proposals as they think will render them more agreeable to the people at large, and also to represent the necessity of granting further time to the people before their final determination is required. . . . That the said Committee shall publish and communicate throughout the several counties the day at which the sense of the people is expected to be taken. That on the day thus published the following question be submitted to the citizens duly qualified to vote, according to the election law of the State, of the Counties of Westmoreland, Washington, Fayette, Allegheny, and that part of Bedford which lies west of the Allegheny mountains, in Pennsylvania, and of Ohio County, Virginia,—Will the people submit to the laws of the United States upon the terms proposed by the Commissioners of the United States?"

The persons appointed to form the committee under these resolutions were John Probst, Robert Dickey, John Nesbitt, Herman Husband, John Corbly, John Marshal, David Phillips, John Heaton, John McClelland, William Ewing, George Wallace, Samuel Wilson, and Richard Brown.

The meeting continued in session at Brownsville for two days, and adjourned on the 29th of August. It was the last meeting of the kind[3] held during the insurrection, and virtually marked its close, as the meeting held at the same place three years before (July 27, 1791) had marked its opening, that being the first public meeting held in opposition to the excise law.

The committee appointed at the Brownsville meeting met the commissioners of the United States and those of Pennsylvania in conference at Pittsburgh on the 1st of September, at which meeting "it was agreed that the assurances required from the citizens of the Fourth Survey of Pennsylvania [the four western counties] should be given in writing, and their sense ascertained in the following manner:

"That the citizens of the said survey (Allegheny County excepted[4]) of the age of eighteen years and upwards be required to assemble on Thursday, the 11th instant, in their respective townships, at the usual place for holding township meetings, and that between the hours of twelve and seven, in the afternoon of the same day, any two or more of the members of the meeting who assembled at Parkinson's Ferry on the 14th ultimo, resident in the township, or a justice of the peace of said township, do openly propose to the people assembled the following questions: Do you now engage to submit to the laws of the United States, and that you will not hereafter, directly or indirectly, oppose the execution of the acts for raising the revenue upon distilled spirits and stills? And do you also undertake to support, as far as the laws require, the civil authority in affording the protection due to all officers and other citizens? Yea or nay? . . . That a minute of the number of yeas and nays be made immediately after ascertaining the same. That a written or printed declaration of such engagement be signed by all those who vote in the affirmative, of the following tenor, to wit: 'I do solemnly promise henceforth to submit to the laws of

and that so excessive a spirit prevailed that it was not thought prudent or safe to urge a compliance with the terms and preliminaries prescribed by the underwritten or the commissioners from the Governor of Pennsylvania, . . . and the underwritten have been repeatedly assured that if the question had been publicly put, it would have been carried in the negative by a large majority.

"The conduct of the meeting at Brownsville, notwithstanding the thin veil thrown over it by the resolve already mentioned [that it was expedient to comply with the terms proposed by the commissioners], was said to be considered by many, and especially by the violent party, as a rejection of the terms. It was certainly a partial rejection of those proposed by the underwritten, and a total one of the preliminaries prescribed by the State commissioners, who had required assurances from the members of that meeting only, and not from the people themselves."—Penna. Arch., 2d Series, vol. iv. pp. 353–54.

[1] "Bradford stood appalled; his power and influence were at an end; he withdrew from the place almost immediately and was not heard of again until some days after, when he was one of the first to hasten to seize the horns of the altar, or, in other words, to take the benefit of the amnesty, in the midst of his deserted followers, who now cried out, 'Dagon, how art thou fallen!' But being excepted, on account of his last act, and perhaps on account of his robbery of the mail, he took to the river and escaped."—Brackenridge.

[2] The following letter from the chairman of the committee was addressed to the United States committee:

"BROWNSVILLE, 29th August, 1794.

"GENTLEMEN,—Difficulties having arisen with us, we have thought it necessary to appoint a committee to confer with you in order to procure, if possible, some farther time, in order that the people may have leisure to reflect upon their true situation.

"I am, Gentlemen, your most obᵗ. Humble Servᵗ,

"EDWARD COOK."

[3] Two meetings were afterwards held at Parkinson's Ferry, not, however, to consider the acceptance or rejection of terms, but to send out ambassadors in hot haste to the President and the commander of the army to urge the acceptance of their submission, to give assurances of good conduct in future, and to avert if possible the march of the military forces to the Monongahela.

[4] The citizens of Allegheny County were required to "meet in their respective election districts on the said day, in the same manner as if they were assembled in townships."

the United States; that I will not, directly or indirectly, oppose the execution of the acts for raising a revenue on distilled spirits and stills; and that I will support, so far as the law requires, the civil authority in affording the protection due to all officers and other citizens.' This shall be signed in the presence of the said members or justices of the peace, attested by him or them, and lodged in his or their hands.

"That the said persons so proposing the questions stated as aforesaid do assemble at the respective county court-houses on the 13th inst., and do ascertain and make report of the numbers of those who voted in the affirmative in the respective townships or districts, and of the number of those who voted in the negative, together with their opinion whether there be such a general submission of the people in their respective counties, that an office of inspection may be immediately and safely established therein; that the said report, opinion, and written or printed declarations be transmitted to the commissioners or or any one of them at Uniontown on or before the 16th instant."

On the part of the United States, the commissioners agreed that if the assurances should be given in good faith, as prescribed, no prosecution for treason or any other indictable offense against the United States committed in this survey before the 22d of August, 1794, should be commenced before the 10th of July, 1795, against any person who should, within the time limited, subscribe such assurance and engagement, and perform the same, and that on the 10th of July, 1795, there should be granted "a general pardon and oblivion of all the said offenses;" but excluding therefrom every person refusing or neglecting to subscribe the assurances and engagement, or who having so subscribed should violate the same, or willfully obstruct the execution of the excise laws. On behalf of the State of Pennsylvania, the commissioners, McKean and Irvine, promised that if the proposed assurances should be given and performed until July 10, 1795, there should then be granted (so far as the State was concerned) "an act of free and general pardon and oblivion of all treasons, insurrections, arsons, riots, and other offenses inferior to riots committed, counseled, or suffered by any person or persons within the four western counties of Pennsylvania" subsequent to the 14th of July, 1794, but excluding from its operation every person refusing or neglecting to subscribe to such agreement, or violating it after subscribing.

The Pennsylvania commissioners left Pittsburgh on the 3d of September, and Messrs. Yeates and Bradford, United States commissioners, proceeded east soon afterwards. Both bodies were requested by the Governor and the President respectively to remain until after the announcement of the result of the popular vote;[1] but for some reason only James Ross remained to carry the signatures to Philadelphia.

[1] See Pa. Archives, 2d Series, vol. iv. pp. 260, 261.

On the day appointed, September 11th, elections were held in (nearly) all the townships or election districts of Washington, Westmoreland, Allegheny, and Fayette. The result was that in all the four counties votes were cast for submission by three thousand two hundred and eighty of the thirteen thousand eight hundred taxable inhabitants. Thus it appeared that the vote for submission was cast by less than one-fourth the taxables, and by probably less than one-sixth of the whole number classed as voters under the terms granted by the commissioners, which embraced all male citizens of the age of eighteen years old and upwards. Yet great efforts had been made by a few of the more thoroughly cowed leaders (such as Col. James Marshel and some others), as well as by many well-disposed individuals of good standing who had never been with the insurgents, to induce the people to sign the submission; and this was especially true of the clergy in general. Brackenridge says they were conspicuous in this work; that "the Rev. John McMillan, of Washington County, and the Rev. Mr. Porter, of Westmoreland County, very influential clergymen, exerted themselves with their congregations and elsewhere with much effect." Findley says Mr. Porter "labored publicly and privately with success from the beginning to prevent the spirit of disorder from spreading in his congregation," and that Dr. McMillan, of Washington County, "refused to administer the sacrament of the Lord's Supper to his congregation until they would submit to the laws."

The result of the elections and the apparent continuance of the rebellious sentiment among the great majority of the people was regarded as extremely unsatisfactory by both the commissioners of the United States and those of Pennsylvania; and that this was especially the case with reference to the county of Washington[2] is apparent in a report made by the

[2] No return of the election in Washington County was made in regular form to the commissioners. The report made and signed by David Bradford and twenty-seven others, superintendents of the elections, was as follows:

"We, the subscribers, members of the committee who met at Parkinson's Ferry on the 14th August last, and justices of the peace of the different townships in Washington County, met this 13th day of September, 1794, do find ourselves under great embarrassments to express our sentiments and opinions whether there be such a general submission of the people as that an office of inspection may be immediately and safely established in the county; yet we are free to declare that no opposition shall arise from us, the undersigned, to the excise law, or to any officers appointed under it; and we believe and are of opinion that a large majority of the inhabitants of the respective townships in this county will acquiesce and submit to the said law, under a hope and firm belief that the Congress of the United States will repeal said law. Given under our hands at Washington Court-House the 13th of September, 1794."

This return was forwarded to James Ross at Uniontown, but was regarded unfavorably by the commissioners, as being evasive and indirect, not stating the number of yeas and nays on the question of submission, "declining giving any opinion whether there is such a general submission that an office of inspection may be established therein," and merely expressing the belief that a large majority of the people would submit in the expectation of a repeal of the law. Very naturally the commissioners regarded this as being far from satisfactory evidence of a general submission in Washington County.

Pennsylvania commissioners, in which they said, "From our best conjecture, the people of Washington, if governed by what appears to be the majority, will prefer a civil war to a submission to the excise laws, so infatuated and frantic are their leaders in opposition; a great majority, however, of the other three counties are friends to peace and order." The last part of this opinion, however, was not indorsed by the United States commissioners with regard to at least one other county of the survey. In their report to the President[1] they said, "The county of Fayette rejected the mode of ascertaining the sense of the people which had been settled between the undersigned and the last committee of conference at Pittsburgh (September 1st). The standing committee of that county directed those qualified by the laws of the State[2] for voting at elections to assemble in their election districts and vote by ballot whether they would accede to the proposals made by the commissioners of the United States on the 22d of August or not. The superintendents of these election districts report that five hundred and sixty of the people thus convened had voted for submission, and that one hundred and sixty-one had voted against it; that no judge or member of their committee had attended from the Fourth District of the county to report the state of the votes there. . . . But it is proper to mention that credible and certain information has been received that in the Fourth District of that county (composed of the townships of Tyrone and Bullskin), of which the standing committee have given no account, six-sevenths of those who voted were for resistance. . . . The written assurances of submission which have been received by the commissioners are not numerous, nor were they given by all those who expressed a willingness to obey the laws. In Fayette County, a different plan being pursued, no written assurances were given in the manner required."

The leaders of the insurrection were seriously alarmed by the result of the elections, for they foresaw the consequences that were certain to follow. Their deluded followers too now seemed to realize for the first time the danger that impended.[3] Immediately after the result became known, the township committees in the several counties (the same who had composed the great meeting of the 14th of August) became active, and appointed meetings to be held at the county-seats for the purpose of expressing assurances to the government that resistance to the laws was ended, and the desire for submission general. Such a meeting, composed of the township delegates, but also attended by a great multitude of the people of Washington County, was held at the town of Washington on the 27th of September. At this meeting resolutions were passed declaring the firm belief that if the submission was not universal, it was largely owing to the lack of time and information necessary to bring about that result, as well as to the fact that a large proportion of the people, conscious of having taken no part in any outrage or breaking of the laws, might and probably did regard the signing of a declaration of submission as implying a sense of guilt which they did not entertain. And finally it was "Resolved that a meeting of the delegates of the townships, who met at Parkinson's Ferry on the 14th of August, be called to convene at the same place on Thursday next, the 2d of October, to take the above into consideration. And as it is of great moment, the delegates are requested to be punctual in their attendance at an early hour that day." The above proceedings and notice were published in an extra issue of the Pittsburgh Gazette, and circulated by express-riders through the four counties.

A similar meeting of township delegates had been held at the county-seat of Fayette on the 17th of the same month. Speakers at that meeting had whiningly asserted that "whatever heat existed in this county was chiefly owing to what had passed in the neighboring counties," and resolutions were passed recommending township associations in the four counties for the purpose of promoting submission to the law, and reciting in their preamble that "It is necessary to shew our fellow-citizens throughout the United States that the character of the inhabitants of the western country is not such as may have been represented to them, but that on the contrary they are disposed to live in a peaceable manner, and can preserve good order among themselves without the assistance of a military force." Evidently the opponents of the law had at last begun to realize that successful resistance to the government was hopeless, and that voluntary submission was better than that enforced by infantry, cavalry, and artillery. But the knowledge came too late to prevent the exercise, or at least the menace of the military power. Upon a full knowledge of the result of the meetings held on the 11th of September in the townships and election districts of the disaffected counties, the United States commissioners reported to the President, narrating the events connected with their mission, and concluded by saying that although they firmly believed that a considerable majority of the inhabitants of the four counties were disposed to submit to the execution of the laws, "at the same time they [the commissioners] conceive it their duty explicitly to declare their opinion that such is the state of things in that survey that there is no probability that the act for raising a revenue on distilled spirits and stills can at present be enforced by the usual course of civil authority, and that some more competent force is necessary to cause the laws to be duly executed, and to insure the officers and well-disposed citizens that protection which it is the duty of the government to afford. This opinion is founded on the facts already stated [the accounts of the unsatisfactory result of the township and district meetings], and it is confirmed by that which is entertained by many intelligent and influential persons, officers of justice and others, resident in the western counties, who have lately informed one of the commissioners that whatever assurances might be given, it was in their judgment absolutely necessary that the civil authority should be aided by a military force in order to secure a due execution of the laws."

[2] The agreement of the committee with the commissioners was, not that qualified voters by the law of Pennsylvania alone should vote on the proposition, but that the question should be submitted to "the citizens of the said survey of the age of eighteen years and upwards."

[3] "It was but a few days (in some places the very next day) after signing that many who had been most riotous on the day of signing came, some of them in tears, begging permission to sign. In some places their signing was received with certification that it would not be admitted as a claim for amnesty; in other places they were refused the privilege altogether. When they reflected they saw that they were deserted by those on whom they had depended, and who perhaps had advised them, or by their example encouraged them to mischief."—Findley.

The commissioners' report upon the situation of affairs in the western counties caused the President to decide, unhesitatingly, to use the military power, and to extinguish the last vestige of insurrection at whatever cost. In taking this course he had (as he afterwards said to a committee from these counties) two great objects in view: first, to show, not only to the inhabitants of the western country, but to the entire Union and to foreign nations, that a republican government could and would exert its physical power to enforce the execution of the laws where opposed, and also that American citizens were ready to make every sacrifice and encounter every difficulty and danger for the sake of supporting that fundamental principle of government; and, second, to effect a full and complete restoration of order and submission to the laws in the insurrectionary district. In pursuance of this determination the forces were promptly put in motion, and on the 25th of September the President issued a proclamation, which, after a preamble, setting forth that the measures taken by government to suppress the lawless combinations in the western counties had failed to have full effect; that "the moment is now come where the overtures of forgiveness, with no other condition than a submission to law, have been only partially accepted; when every form of conciliation not inconsistent with the well-being of government has been adopted without effect," proceeds,—

"Now, therefore, I, George Washington, President of the United States, in obedience to that high and irresistible duty consigned to me by the Constitution, 'to take care that the laws be faithfully executed,' deploring that the American name should be sullied by the outrages of citizens on their own government, commiserating such as remain obstinate from delusion, but resolved, in perfect reliance on that gracious Providence which so signally displays its goodness towards this country, to reduce the refractory to a due subordination to the law; Do hereby declare and make known that, with a satisfaction which can be equaled only by the merits of the militia summoned into service from the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, I have received intelligence of their patriotic alacrity in obeying the call of the present though painful yet commanding necessity; that a force which, according to every reasonable expectation, is adequate to the exigency is already in motion to the scene of disaffection; that those who have confided or shall confide in the protection of government shall meet full succor under the standard and from the arms of the United States; that those who, having offended against the laws, have since entitled themselves to indemnity, will be treated with the most liberal good faith, if they shall not have forfeited their claim by any subsequent conduct, and that instructions are given accordingly. . . ."

The forces called out for the exigency amounted to about thirteen thousand men, in four divisions, one division from each of the States of Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, as before mentioned. The Virginia and Maryland troops (commanded respectively by Gen. Daniel Morgan, of the former State, and Brig.-Gen. Samuel Smith, of Baltimore) formed the left wing, which rendezvoused at Cumberland, Md. The right wing (which was rendezvoused at Carlisle, Pa.) was composed of the Pennsylvania troops, commanded by Maj.-Gen. William Irvine (and accompanied by Governor Mifflin), and those of New Jersey, under Governor Richard Howell, of that State. The commander-in-chief of the whole army was Gen. Henry Lee, Governor of Virginia, the "Light-Horse Harry" of Revolutionary fame, and father of Gen. Robert E. Lee, the Confederate commander in the war of 1861–65.

In his instructions from the President, the commander-in-chief was directed to "proceed as speedily as may be with the army under your command into the insurgent counties, to attack and as far as shall be in your power to subdue all persons whom you may find in arms in opposition to the laws. You will march your army in two columns from the places where they are now assembled, by the most convenient routes, having regard to the nature of the roads, the convenience of supply, and the facility of co-operation and union, and bearing in mind that you ought to act, until the contrary shall be fully developed, on the general principle of having to contend with the whole force of the counties of Fayette, Westmoreland, Washington, and Allegheny, and of that part of Bedford which lies westward of the town of Bedford, and that you are to put as little as possible to hazard. The approximation, therefore, of your columns is to be sought, and the subdivision of them so as to place the parts out of mutual supporting distance to be avoided as far as local circumstances will permit. Parkinson's Ferry appears to be a proper point towards which to direct the march of the columns for the purpose of ulterior measures.

"When arrived within the insurgent country, if an armed opposition appear, it may be proper to publish a proclamation inviting all good citizens, friends to the constitution and laws, to join the standard of the United States. If no armed opposition exist it may still be proper to publish a proclamation exhorting to a peaceful and dutiful demeanor, and giving assurances of performing with good faith and liberality whatsoever may have been promised by the commissioners to those who have complied with the conditions prescribed by them, and who have not forfeited their title by subsequent misdemeanor. Of those persons in arms, if any, whom you may make prisoners, leaders, including all persons in command, are to be delivered to the civil magistrates, the rest to be disarmed, admonished, and sent home (except such as may have been particularly violent and also influential), causing their own recognizances for their good behaviour to be taken in the cases which it may be deemed expedient. . . . When the insurrection is subdued, and the requisite means have been put in execution to secure obedience to the laws, so as to render it proper for the army to retire (an event which you will accelerate as much as shall be consistent with the object), you will endeavor to make an arrangement for attaching such a force as you may deem adequate, to be stationed within the disaffected counties in such a manner as best to afford protection to well-disposed citizens and the officers of the revenue, and to suppress, by their presence, the spirit of riot and opposition to the laws. But before you withdraw the army you shall promise, on behalf of the President, a general pardon to all such as shall not have been arrested, with such exceptions as you shall deem proper. . . . You are to exert yourself by all possible means to preserve discipline among the troops, particularly a scrupulous regard to the rights of persons and property, and a respect for the authority of the civil magistrates, taking especial care to inculcate and cause to be observed this principle,—that the duties of the army are confined to attacking and subduing of armed opponents of the laws, and to the supporting and aiding of the civil officers in the execution of their functions.

"It has been settled that the Governor of Pennsylvania will be second, and the Governor of New Jersey third in command, and that the troops of the several States in line on the march and upon detachment are to be posted according to the rule which prevailed in the army during the late war, namely, in moving towards the seaboard the most southern troops will take the right, in moving towards the north the most northern troops will take the right. . . ."

In addition to his military duties as commanding officer of the expeditionary forces, Gen. Lee was also charged to give countenance and support to the civil officers in the execution of the law, in bringing offenders to justice, and enforcing penalties on delinquent distillers, and "the better to effect these purposes" the judge of the United States District Court, Richard Peters, Esq., and the attorney of the district, William Rawle, Esq., accompanied the army.

President Washington, with Gen. Henry Knox, Secretary of War, and Gen. Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, left Philadelphia on the 1st of October, and proceeded by way of Harrisburg to the headquarters of the right wing of the army at Carlisle. From that place on the 11th he went to Chambersburg, and thence by way of Williamsport to Fort Cumberland, where he arrived on the 14th, and where he reviewed the Maryland and Virginia troops, composing the left wing; after which he proceeded to Bedford, Pa. (which was then Gen. Lee's headquarters), reaching it on the 19th, and remaining there two or three days, then returning east, and arriving at Philadelphia on the 28th.

In the mean time the meeting of delegates (which had been called by the Washington meeting of the 27th of September, as before noticed) was held at Parkinson's Ferry on the 2d of October, Judge Alexander Addison being made secretary.[1] At this meeting William Findley, of Westmoreland, and David Redick, of Washington County, were appointed a committee to wait on the President of the United States and to assure him that submission and order could be restored without the aid of military force. They found the President on the 10th of October at Carlisle, where he had come to review the troops of the right wing of the army, as before mentioned. They there had several interviews with him, in which they informed him of the great change that had taken place; "that the great body of the people who had no concern in the disorders but remained quietly at home and attended to their business had become convinced that the violence used would ruin the country; that they had formed themselves into associations to suppress disorder, and to promote submission to the laws." In reply to this the President said that as the army was already on its way to the western counties the orders could not be countermanded, yet he assured the delegates that no violence would be used, and that all that was desired was to have the inhabitants of the disaffected region come back to their allegiance.

This reply was final; and ended the mission of the committee. They returned and made their report at another meeting, which was held at Parkinson's on the 24th of October, and of which Judge James Edgar was chairman and Albert Gallatin secretary. At this meeting of the committees of townships of the four western counties of Pennsylvania and of sundry other citizens" it was resolved, "First,—That in our opinion the civil authority is now fully competent to enforce the laws and punish both past and future offenses, inasmuch as the people at large are determined to support every description of civil officers in the legal discharge of their duty.

[1] "Bradford and Marshel attended the meeting; but how changed from what they were in the same body less than one month before! The former, particularly, was much crestfallen, and had become the most humble in sueing for peace. He denied that he had deserted the cause; it was the people who had deserted him."—Findley.

"Second,—That in our opinion all persons who may be charged or suspected of having committed any offense against the United States or the State during the late disturbances, and who have not entitled themselves to the benefits of the act of oblivion, ought immediately to surrender themselves to the civil authority, in order to stand their trial; that if there be any such persons among us they are ready to surrender themselves to the civil authority accordingly, and that we will unite in giving our assistance to bring to justice such offenders as shall not surrender.

"Third,—That in our opinion offices of inspection may be immediately opened in the respective counties of this survey, without any danger of violence being offered to any of the officers, and that the distillers are willing and ready to enter their stills.

"Fourth,—That William Findley, David Redick, Ephraim Douglass, and Thomas Morton do wait on the President with the foregoing resolutions."[1]

The four committee-men appointed by the meeting to carry the renewed assurances to the President met at Greensburg preparatory to setting out on their mission, but at that place they received intelligence that the President had already left Bedford for Philadelphia, and that the army was moving towards the Monongahela, and thereupon they decided to await the arrival of the forces, and to report the action of the meeting to the commander-in-chief, as the President's representative.

There was no delay in the movement of the army. The New Jersey and Pennsylvania troops, composing the right wing, marched from Carlisle on the 22d of October, and proceeded by way of Bedford, across that county and Somerset, to what is now Mount Pleasant, in Westmoreland, at which place the advance brigade arrived and encamped on the 29th. The centre corps (of this wing) encamped on the farm of Col. Bonnett, in Westmoreland, near the line of Fayette County, and the rear went into camp at Lobengier's Mills on the 30th. At these places they remained encamped about one week. Following is an extract from a letter[2] written from the rear brigade, dated Jones' Mill (in Westmoreland County), Oct. 29, 1784: "I am distressed at the ridiculous accounts sometimes published in our papers. I assure you that there has not been a single shot fired at our troops to my knowledge. The whole country trembles. The most turbulent characters, as we advance, turn out to assist us, supply forage, cattle, etc. From Washington we hear of little but fear and flight; a contrary account as to one neighborhood (Pidgeon Creek) has been sent down, but no appearance of an armed opposition, and this the only part of the country where the friends of government are not triumphant. Our army is healthy and happy; the men exhibit unexpected fortitude in supporting the continued fatigues of bad roads and bad weather."

The left wing of the army moved from Fort Cumberland on the 22d of October, and took the route marched over by Gen. Braddock thirty-nine years before to the Great Meadows, and from there to Uniontown, at which place Gen. Lee arrived on the last day of October, and the main body of the left wing came up and encamped there the same evening. With this wing of the army came Col. Presley Neville, and with the right wing was Gen. John Neville, who had fled from Pittsburgh on the 18th of July, and had remained in the East from that time until the marching of the army.

The committee-men, Findley, Redick, Douglass, and Morton, who, as before mentioned, had been met at Greensburg with the intelligence of the departure of the President from Bedford, which decided them to wait the arrival of the army, went to the headquarters of the right wing at Bonnett's farm on the 30th of October, and presented the resolutions of assurance to Secretary Hamilton, who accompanied the division of Governor Mifflin. The secretary examined them and returned them to the committee, with the remark that, "for the sake of decorum, it would be best to present them to the commander-in-chief." This was what the committee had intended to do, and learning that Gen. Lee was then at or near Uniontown they immediately left for that place, and arriving there on the 31st of October, laid the business of their mission before him, he having full power to act in the name of the President. Secretary Hamilton also came over from the right wing, and arrived at Uniontown on the same evening.

Gen. Lee received the committee with great politeness,[3] and requested them to call on him in the following morning. At the appointed time he gave them his reply, which they embodied in their report, dated Uniontown, Nov. 1, 1794.[4] It was as follows:

[1] "Great indeed," says Findley, "was the difference between the complexion of this meeting and that which met at the same place on the 14th of August preceding, and this difference was in a great measure owing to a few men. Bradford, Fulton, Parkinson, Marshel, and others who had contrived and promoted the meeting at Braddock's Field had either secured an amnesty by submitting in due time or fled out of the country, and others, who perhaps had done neither, were ashamed to appear at this meeting, though the terror of them and their friends had overawed the first; and a great number of respectable citizens attended at this meeting who did not think it prudent to countenance the first."

[2] Papers Relating to the Whiskey Insurrection; Pennsylvania Archives, 2d Series, vol. iv. p. 433.

[3] The committee, however, were not very well pleased with their reception by Gen. Lee. One of their number, Mr. Findley, said (in his "History of the Insurrection," p. 199), "Indeed, though we were treated politely in other respects and employed to assist in the fixing of necessaries for the army, and consulted about the ground on which it should encamp when it advanced farther into the country, yet we did not meet with that candour and frankness with which we had been treated by the President at Carlisle."

"GENTLEMEN,—The resolutions entered into at the late meeting of the people at Parkinson's Ferry, with the various papers declaratory of the determination of the numerous subscribers to maintain the civil authority, manifest strongly a change of sentiment in the inhabitants of this district. To what cause may truly be ascribed this favorable turn in the public mind it is of my province to determine. Yourselves, in the conversation last evening, imputed it to the universal panic which the approach of the army of the United States had excited in the lower orders of the people. If this be the ground of the late change,—and my respect for your opinions will not permit me to doubt it,—the moment the cause is removed the reign of violence and anarchy will return.

"Whatever, therefore, may be the sentiments of the people respecting the present competency of the civil authority to enforce the laws, I feel myself obligated by the trust reposed in me by the President of the United States to hold the army in this country until daily practice shall convince all that the sovereignty of the Constitution and laws is unalterably established. In executing this resolution I do not only consult the dignity and interest of the United States, which will always command my decided respect and preferential attention, but I also promote the good of this particular district.

"I shall, therefore, as soon as the troops are refreshed, proceed to some central and convenient station, where I shall patiently wait until the competency of the civil authority is experimentally and unequivocally proved. No individual can be more solicitous than I am for this happy event, and you may assure the good people whom you represent that every aid will be cheerfully contributed by me to hasten the delightful epoch.

"On the part of all good citizens I confidently expect the most active and faithful co-operation, which in my judgment cannot be more effectually given than by circulating in the most public manner the truth among the people, and by inducing the various clubs which have so successfully poisoned the minds of the inhabitants to continue their usual meetings for the pious purpose of contradicting, with their customary formalities, their past pernicious doctrines. A conduct so candid should partially atone for the injuries which in a great degree may be attributed to their instrumentality, and must have a propitious influence in administering a radical cure to the existing disorders.

"On my part, and on the part of the patriotic army I have the honor to command, assure your fellow-citizens that we come to protect and not to destroy, and that our respect for our common government, and respect to our own honor, are ample pledges for the propriety of our demeanor. Quiet, therefore, the apprehensions of all on this score, and recommend universally to the people to prepare for the use of the army whatever they can spare from their farms necessary to its subsistence, for which they shall be paid in cash at the present market price; discourage exaction of every sort, not only because it would testify a disposition very unfriendly, but because it would probably produce very disagreeable scenes. It is my duty to take care that the troops are comfortably subsisted, and I cannot but obey it with the highest pleasure, because I intimately know their worth and excellence.

"I have the honor to be, gentlemen,

"Your most obedient servant,

"With due consideration,

"HENRY LEE."

This reply, or address to the people, was printed and circulated extensively in every part of the four counties.

After a stay of a few days at Uniontown and Mount Pleasant respectively, the two columns of the army moved on in obedience to the general orders of the commander-in-chief, as follows:

"HEADQUARTERS,

"UNION (BEESON'S) TOWN, Nov. 2, 1794.

"The army will resume its march on the morning of the 4th, at the hour of eight, when a signal-gun will be fired. They will advance in two columns, composed of the respective wings. The right column will take the route by Lodge's to Budd's Ferry, under the command of his Excellency Governor Mifflin, who will please to take the most convenient situation in the vicinity of that place for the accommodation of the troops and wait further orders. The left column will proceed on the route to Peterson's, on the east side of Parkinson's Ferry, under the orders of Major-General Morgan; they will march by the left in the following manner: Light corps, cavalry, artillery, Virginia brigade, Maryland brigade, the baggage to follow each corps, and the public stores of every kind in the rear of the Virginia brigade. On the first day the light corps and artillery will march to Washington Bottom, fourteen miles; the Virginia brigade to Peterson's farm, twelve miles; the cavalry under Major Lewis will move with the commander-in-chief; the bullocks to precede the army at daylight. On the second day the column will proceed to the camp directed to be marked out between Parkinson's and Budd's Ferries.

"Should Brigadier-General Smith find the second day's march rather too much, he will be pleased to divide the same into two days. The quartermaster-general will immediately take measures for the full supply of forage and straw at the different stages. The commissary will place the necessary supply of provisions at particular intermediate stages where issues will be necessary; guards over the straw as soon as the van reaches the ground, and to see the same fairly divided amongst the troops. [Here follows the assignment of straw to each brigade, to the cavalry and artillery, and directions for making out the pay-rolls for one month's pay from the commencement of service.] The inspector and muster-master-generals of the respective line will also make pay-rolls for the general staff, to be countersigned by the commander-in-chief previous to payment. HENRY LEE.

"By the Commander-in-Chief,

"G. H. TAYLOR, Aide-de-Camp."

Under these orders the left wing marched from Uniontown, and the right wing from its camps at Mount Pleasant, Bonnett's, and Lobengier's, at the appointed time, and moving to the vicinity of the Monongahela and Youghiogheny Rivers, in Westmoreland County, went into camp at the place designated, between Parkinson's and Budd's Ferries. From his headquarters, "near Parkinson's Ferry," on the 8th of November, the commander-in-chief issued an address or proclamation to the inhabitants of certain counties lying west of the Laurel Hill, in the State of Pennsylvania, the tone of which was a little after the manner of a conquering chieftain addressing the people of a subjugated province. "You see," he said, "encamped in the bosom of your district a numerous and well-appointed army, formed of citizens of every description from this and the neighboring States of New Jersey, Maryland, and Virginia, whom the violated laws of our common country have called from their homes to vindicate and restore their authority. . . . The scene before your eyes ought to be an instructive one; it ought to teach many useful truths, which should, for your own happiness, make a deep and lasting impression on your minds. . . . Those who have been perverted from their duty may now perceive the dangerous tendency of the doctrines by which they have been misled, and how unworthy of their confidence are the men by whom, for personal and sinister purposes, they have been brought step by step to the precipice from which they have no escape but in the moderation and benignity of that very government which they have vilified, insulted, and opposed. The friends of order may also perceive in the perils and evils that have for some time surrounded them how unwise and even culpable is that carelessness and apathy with which they have permitted the gradual approaches of disorder and anarchy."

The general then proceeded to recommend to the people to manifest their good intentions by taking and subscribing an oath (the form of which he prescribed) to support the constitution and obey the laws, and by entering into associations to protect and aid all government officers in the execution of their duties. He further recommended to all men able and willing to do military duty, and truly attached to their government and country, "to array themselves into regiments, one for each county, and to place themselves under such officers as may be selected by the Governor of the State, known to be firm friends to order and right, upon the express conditions of holding themselves in constant readiness to act in defense of the civil authority whenever called upon, receiving for their services the same pay and subsistence as is allowed to the militia of the United States when in actual service." He then concluded his proclamation as follows: "In pursuance of the authority vested in me by the President of the United States, and in obedience to his instructions, I do moreover assure all who may have entitled themselves to the benefit of the amnesty proffered by the commisioners heretofore sent by him to this district, and who may not have forfeited their title by subsequent misconduct, that the promise will be faithfully and liberally observed, and that all possible endeavors will be used to prevent injury to the persons or property of peaceable citizens by the troops, whose sole province it is to subdue those, if any there should be, hardy enough to attempt an armed resistance, and to support and aid the civil authority as far as may be required. To the promulgation of these, my orders, I with pleasure add my assurances that every exertion will be made by me—and, from my knowledge of the officers and soldiers of the army, I am persuaded with full success—to carry these wise and benevolent views of the President into complete effect."

The entire army remained in the neighborhood of Parkinson's Ferry for about ten days, after which the main part of the troops moved down the Monongahela River, and on the 15th of November a detachment was marched from the vicinity of Parkinson's to the town of Washington, accompanied by Secretary Hamilton and Judge Peters, and taking with them a large number of prisoners which had been taken in the eastern part of Washington County. All the prisoners taken by the army, excepting three, were taken in that county and Allegheny, under Gen. Lee's special orders,[1] issued for that purpose to Gen. Irvine and other officers.

The time indicated in these orders (Thursday morning, November 13th) was the time when most of the arrests were made by the military. During the night following these arrests the prisoners suffered greatly from cold, wet, hunger, and other causes, and on this account it has been called by Brackenridge and others "the terrible night," though why that term was applied to the night of the 13th more than to that of the 14th does not appear, as the condition of the prisoners was fully as bad on the latter as on the former night. The various histories of the insurrection have given so much of notoriety to these arrests and the manner in which they were made that it seems proper to mention them here at some length. The Rev. James Carnahan, afterwards President of Princeton College, but at that time a student in the academy at Canonsburg, gave the following account of some of them:

"Companies of horsemen were scattered in different directions over the country, and as there was no opposition, it was thought the army were about to return. On the night of the 13th of November,[2] a frosty night, about one o'clock, the horse was sallied forth, and before daylight arrested in their beds about two hundred men. A company of Virginia horse were stationed for several days near Canonsburg, and I give the manner of their proceedings as a sample of what probably occurred in other places. About two o'clock in the morning they surrounded the house where I lodged, and some came in and ordered my landlord, an old

[1] The following are extracts from Gen. Lee's orders to Gen. William Irvine:

"HEAD QUARTERS NEAR PARKINSON'S FERRY,
"November 9th, 1794.

"SIR,—From the delays and danger of escape which attend the present situation of judiciary investigations to establish preliminary processes against offenders, it is deemed advisable to proceed in a summary manner in the most disaffected scenes against those who have notoriously committed treasonable acts; that is, to employ the military for the purpose of apprehending and bringing such persons before the judge of the district [Judge Peters], to be by him examined and dealt with according to law; to you is committed the execution of this object within that part of Allegheny County to which you are advancing. . . . The persons apprehended ought to be leading or influential characters or particularly violent. You will find a list (No. 3); this paper comprehends witnesses. The individuals are to be brought forward and treated as such. Direct all who may be apprehended by you to be conveyed to your camp until further orders. Send off your parties of horse with good guides, and at such a period as to make the surprises, however distant or near, at the same moment, or intelligence will precede them and some of the culprits will escape. I presume the proper hour will be at daybreak on Thursday morning, and have therefore desired the operation to be then performed in every quarter.

"I have the honor to be, sir,
"With great respect,
"Your most obedient servant,
"HENRY LEE."

The following, purporting to be a letter from Gen. Lee to Gen. Morgan, is in possession of Judge Cranmer, of Wheeling. It does not have the appearance of a letter of instructions from a commanding general, but it may have been such. It is given for what it is worth, viz.:

"DEAR SIR,—Biggs went away yesterday charged with instructions relative to the Ohio culprits. Dick's is sent to Morgantown with similar instructions; you will receive herewith the plan and business as it respects the county of Washington.

"Mr. Williams tells me that the people will not thresh out their wheat and therefore that the army may be reduced to want unless they are immediately made so to do. This furnishes an excellent pretext on the present occasion. Your horse can be assembled for the purpose of visiting the farmers with orders to insist on their getting out their grain. In executing this order publicly they can well accomplish the other business—farewell.

"Yours,
"HARRY LEE,
"11th Nov., 1794, H. Quarters,"

[2] Dr. Carnahan is evidently mistaken in the date. He gives the impression that the arrests were made in the night of the 13th and morning of the 14th. They were made in the morning of the 13th, most of them between three o'clock and sunrise.

man, to rise and guide them to a neighborhood about eight miles distant, where he was well acquainted. He had no horse. They inquired where a horse could be found. He named two or three places. They wanted a guide to the stables. The old man had no servant in the house. Two boys belonging to the academy lodged in an upper chamber. The older one, of an impetuous temper, had talked big in favor of the insurgents, and he believed the horsemen had come to arrest him, and he lay trembling in bed. The younger, more considerate, had always condemned the insurgents. Conscious of innocence, he jumped up and ran down-stairs, half dressed, to see what was going on. The horsemen slapped him with their scabbards, and ordered him to show them the stables. He had to go, and run about a quarter of a mile without shoes, frosty as it was. No horse was to be found at the first stable, and then he had to run as far in a different direction, and happily found a horse. The epithet 'young insurgent,' with additional hard words, were liberally applied, with an occasional slap to quicken his steps. This lad was afterwards the Rev. Dr. O. Jennings, of Nashville, Tenn.

"In justice to the Virginia, Maryland, and Philadelphia horsemen, it must be said they made arrests and treated their prisoners with as much gentleness and humanity as practicable. Yet we can easily imagine what terror seized mothers, sisters, and wives when their sons and brothers and husbands were taken out of bed and carried off, they knew not whither. That night was afterward called 'the dreadful night.'

"A large number of prisoners from Washington County were collected together at the county town, and taken thence to Pittsburgh under guard. The object in taking them to Pittsburgh was that they might be examined by a district judge, so as to ascertain which of them ought to be taken to Philadelphia for trial. I saw them on their way as they entered Canonsburg, and were placed in a large upper room in the academy to lodge for the night. They were conducted by the Philadelphia and New Jersey cavalry. The contrast between the Philadelphia horsemen and the prisoners was the most striking that can be imagined." Then, after describing the splendid appearance of the Philadelphia troopers, with their fine blue uniforms and flashing sabres, and all mounted on beautiful bay horses, superbly caparisoned and glittering with silver trappings, he proceeds, "The prisoners were also mounted on horses, of all shapes, sizes, and colors; some large, some small, some long tails, some short, some white, some black, some fat, some lean, some of every color and form that can be named. Some had saddles, some blankets, some bridles, some halters, some with stirrups, some with none. The riders were also various and grotesque in their appearance. Some were old, some young, some hale, respectable-looking men; others were pale, meagre, and shabbily dressed. Some had great-coats, others had blankets on their shoulders. The countenance of some was downcast, melancholy, dejected; that of others stern, indignant, manifesting that they thought themselves undeserving such treatment. Two Philadelphia horsemen rode in front, and then two prisoners, and so two horsemen and two prisoners alternately throughout a line extending perhaps half a mile. I have more than once seen gangs of fifty or sixty negroes tied to a long rope, two and two opposite to each other, and marched to a distant slave-market; but their anguish and indignation was not to be compared to that manifested by these Western men. If these men had been the ones chiefly guilty of the disturbance, it would have been no more than they deserved. But the guilty had signed the amnesty, or had left the country before the army approached. It has been estimated that between one and two thousand men, with rifles in their hands, had withdrawn, and remained absent until the army left the country."

The following account of the capture of a large number of prisoners on Mingo and Peters Creeks by Brig.-Gen. Anthony M. White, of New Jersey, and their brutal treatment at his hands, is related by Findley in his "History of the Western Insurrection;" but it is not improper to say here that his statements may have been a good deal exaggerated, as there is to be seen through all his narrative an unmistakable disposition to place in the worst possible light every occurrence or act done by the army, particularly all which could by any assumption be supposed to have been authorized, encouraged, or countenanced by Secretary Hamilton or executed by Brig.-Gen. White.

"On Thursday, the 13th of November, there were about forty persons brought to Parkinson's house, by order of Gen. White. He directed to put the damned rascals in the cellar, to tie them back to back, to make a fire for the guard, but to put the prisoners back to the farther end of the cellar, and to give them neither victuals nor drink. The cellar was wet and muddy, and the night cold; the cellar extended the whole length under a large new log house, which was neither floored nor the openings between the logs daubed. They were kept there until Saturday morning, and then marched to the town of Washington. On the march one of the prisoners, who was subject to convulsions, fell into a fit, but when some of the troops told Gen. White of his situation he ordered them to tie the damned rascal to a horse's tail and drag him along with them, for he had only feigned having the fits. Some of his fellow-prisoners, however, who had a horse, dismounted and let the poor man ride. He had another fit before he reached Washington. This march was about twelve miles. The poor man who had the fits had been in the American service during almost the whole of the war with Great Britain.

"Having heard much about this inhuman business, and having occasion last summer [1796] to go to Washington, I traveled that road for the first time that I had ever been in that settlement and lodged a night at the place. The plantation is the property of Benjamin Parkinson, but rented by him to a Mr. Stockdale, who keeps tavern at it, and who seems to be a decent man, and one against whom there is no charge. He not only confirmed what I have stated above, but added a variety of other particulars equally shocking. Stockdale was forbid, on the peril of his life, to administer any comfort to his neighbors, though they were perishing with cold and famishing with hunger. The general treated the prisoners as they arrived with the most insulting and abusive language, causing them all to be tied back to back except one man, who held a respectable rank, and who, however, was said to be one of the most guilty in his custody. One of the nearest neighbors, who had a child at the point of dying, and observing that they were bringing in the whole neighborhood prisoners, without regard to guilt or innocence, went and gave himself up to Gen. White, expecting, as he was conscious there was no charge against him, that he would be permitted to return to his family on giving bail, but he also was inhumanly thrown into the cellar, tied with the rest, and refused the privilege of seeing his dying child; nor was he permitted to attend its funeral until after many entreaties he obtained that liberty, accompanied with the most horrid oaths and imprecations.

"The most of these prisoners were found to be innocent men, and were liberated. There were but three sent to Philadelphia for trial; one of them, after having been dismissed at Pittsburgh, and perhaps having taken a hearty grog, through joy at regaining his liberty, expressed himself unbecomingly to some of the light-horsemen. He was afterwards pursued near thirty miles, and taken to Philadelphia; but there was no cause of action found against him at the court. He had served with approbation in the army during the war; his name was Samuel Noy.

"A captain, with a detachment of the army, who took a number of prisoners in the southern part of Washington County, is asserted to have driven his prisoners like cattle, at a trot, through creeks, up to their middle in water, and to have impounded them in a wet stable at night, and otherwise to have maltreated and insulted them; though this fact has been confidently asserted, and never contradicted, yet not having the vouchers for it before me, I shall pass it over without being more particular.

"Capt. Dunlap, of Philadelphia, and his company were sent to Muddy Creek in the upper end of Washington County; they took Colonel Crawford and son, Mr. Sedgwick, a justice of the peace, Mr. Corbly, a clergyman of the Baptist persuasion, and others. They were taken early in the morning, and had no opportunity of making resistance. Capt. Dunlap and his party, while they behaved with the greatest dexterity in taking the prisoners, treated them with as much politeness and attention as their situation would admit of, and engaged their gratitude by accompanying unavoidable severity with humanity.[1] Capt. Dunlap had a discrimination made in his orders between witnesses and supposed criminals, but treated them all with humanity, and had them comfortably lodged and provided with victuals and drink previous to his taking refreshments himself. By the orders given to Gen. Irwin [Irvine?] he was obliged to take and treat them all as criminals, but he did not insult any of them himself, nor permit them to be insulted by others in his hearing, and he provided for them as well as the camp would permit, and that being a very uncomfortable situation, he had them removed from it as soon as he could. . . . Gen. White was himself the leading, or perhaps the only man of his corps who insulted the prisoners with the most opprobrious language, and punished them in the most shocking manner, short of inflicting death."

An account of the arrest of one of the elders of the Associate Presbyterian Church in Chartiers township at that time is related by Alexander Murdoch, Esq., of Washington borough, as follows: "In one of the last conversations I had with my mother, who was a daughter of the Rev. Matthew Henderson, of the Associate (now United Presbyterian) Congregation of Chartiers, she related the following incident touching the Whiskey Insurrection in Western Pennsylvania. On a certain Sabbath morning [probably Sunday, Nov. 16, 1794] Mr. Henderson, with my mother (who was then a little girl) riding behind him, on horseback, started for the old church on the hill. When they reached the road leading to Pittsburgh, they saw, in advance of them, a jumper, made of hickory poles, hauled by a horse; and on this sled was a copper still and the different appliances for the manufacture of whiskey. This was a most unusual sight on a quiet Sabbath morning in that religious and orderly community. But in a moment after they were horrified by seeing a file of United States soldiers, and in their midst, a close prisoner, was one of the elders of Mr. Henderson's congregation, the owner of the confiscated still. When the elder saw his preacher he exclaimed in most piteous tones, 'Ah, Meester Henderson, ain't this terrible?' Mr. Henderson being a law-abiding man proceeded to his church in discharge of his sacred duties, leaving his poor elder to answer the charge of distilling liquors without the payment of a government tax."

1 "These prisoners," says Findley, "assert that they had not the opportunity of signing the terms of the commissioners until the appointed day was past. They were admitted to bail after several months' imprisonment, and though two of those persons were reported to have been a good deal inflammatory, there was no bill found against any of them on their trial. They were not engaged in the outrages against excise officers, or at the rendezvous at Braddock's Field. I cannot find that Sedgwick, the justice of the peace, had done anything to lay a foundation even for suspicion. Crawford, the younger, had been one of the armed party who appeared at the Redstone meeting with a design to punish Jackson; but he was dismissed at Pittsburgh."

Among the prisoners taken (and afterwards marched to Philadelphia) was Capt. Robert Porter, of Washington County. He found that his name was in the list of those who had been denounced as participants in the insurrection, and, without waiting for arrest, he, on the 13th of November, proceeded to the mouth of Mingo Creek, where the Virginia brigade of Gen. Matthews was encamped, and delivered himself up to Col. Campbell, asking for an examination. A man named Pollock appeared and made some charges against him, but as he was intoxicated and could bring no facts to support his accusations, no notice was taken of them, and he was ordered out of the camp as a vagabond, but Capt. Porter was still held in custody. A narrative of events which followed (gathered from entries in Capt. Porter's journal, written by his own hand) was furnished by his grandson, J. M. Porter, to H. M. Brackenridge, and by him published in his "History of the Western Insurrection," from which the following extracts are taken:

"On the night of the 13th November, 1794, James Stewart, Joseph Chambers, Jacob Forwood, Joel Ferree, George Swasick, Sr., George Swasick, Jr., James Swasick, George Sickman, and James McBride were brought into camp, handcuffed, and delivered over to the provost-guard. On the 14th, Col. Lane's regiment, with the prisoners, marched down the river to Benjamin Bentley's, the balance of the army, with the baggage, marching by Esquire Barclay's, the army constantly swearing and heaping imprecations against the rebels that occasioned their coming so far over hills and mountains without the satisfaction of a man to oppose them or a gun fired upon them. At Bentley's the prisoners were confined in a log cabin overnight without fire, though it was a cold, snowy, stormy night, and neither chunking nor daubing in the cabin. On the 15th they were ordered down to the Governor's [Lee's] body-guard, and by them delivered over to Capt. George Denial, and were marched the same day through the snowstorm toward Pittsburgh, where they arrived on the 16th. On the 17th they were conducted to the garrison, and delivered to the care of Col. Butler."

The commander-in-chief, at Uniontown, on the 1st of November, had announced his intention "to hold the army in this country until daily practice shall convince all that the sovereignty of the Constitution and laws is unalterably established." In a few days after his forces marched northward from that place he became so convinced, and at once began to make arrangements for the return of the army. The notification of the reopening of the inspection offices was made on the 10th,[1] and they were accordingly reopened ten days later without opposition at the principal towns of the four counties. The withdrawal of the army was announced, and the order of its return march directed, in orders by Gen. Lee, dated "Headquarters, Pittsburgh, Nov. 17, 1794," viz.:

"The complete fulfillment of every object dependent on the efforts of the army makes it the duty of the commander-in-chief to take measures for the immediate return of his faithful fellow-soldiers to their respective homes, in execution of which no delay will be permitted but that which results from the consultation of their comfort.

"On Tuesday morning, at the hour of eight, the Pennsylvania Cavalry will be ready to accompany his Excellency Governor Mifflin, whose official duties renders his presence necessary at the seat of government.

"On the next day the first division of the right column, consisting of the Artillery and Proctor's Brigade, under the orders of Maj.-Gen. Irvine, will commence their march to Bedford, on the route commonly called the Old Pennsylvania road.

"The following day at the same hour the New Jersey Line will move under the command of his Excellency Governor Howell, who will be pleased to pursue from Bedford such routes as he may find convenient.

"On the subsequent day at the same hour the residue of the Pennsylvania Line now on this ground will march under the command of Brig.-Gen. Chambers, taking the route heretofore mentioned, and making the same stages as shall have been made by the leading division. Maj.-Gen. Frelinghuysen, with the Elite Corps of the right column, will follow the next day and pursue the same route.

"Brig.-Gen. Smith, with the Maryland Line, will move to Uniontown, agreeably to orders heretofore communicated to him, and from thence to proceed on Braddock's road to Fort Cumberland, where he will adopt the most convenient measures in his power for the return of his troops to their respective counties.

"Brig.-Gen. Matthews will move on Wednesday next to Morgan Town, from thence to Winchester by way of Frankfort. From Winchester the troops will be marched to their respective brigades under the commanding officers from each brigade.

"As soon as the public service will permit afterwards, the Elite Corps of the left column, under Gen. Dark, will follow on the route prescribed for Brig. Matthews, and be disbanded as they reach their respective brigades.

". . . The corps destined for the winter defense will move without delay to Bentley's Farm, on the west side of the Monongahela, near Perry's Ferry, where they will receive orders from Maj.-Gen. Morgan.

"The Virginia Cavalry will take the route by Morgan Town, from thence to Winchester by Romney's; the commandant will receive particular instructions as to their time and manner of march.

"The right column will receive their pay (still due) at Bedford, the Maryland Line at Fort Cumberland, and the Virginia Line at Winchester. . . ."

The army moved on its return in accordance with these orders. The right column marched from Pittsburgh, by way of Greensburg, Ligonier, and Stony Creek, to Bedford, and thence by way of Fort Lyttleton, Stradsburg, and Shippensburg to Carlisle. The troops of the left column returned by different routes, the Virginians marching up the Monongahela valley

[1] "The announcement by Inspector Neville was as follows:

"Notice is hereby given that on Thursday, the 20th instant, an office of inspection will be opened at Pittsburgh for the county of Allegheny, at the town of Washington for the county of Washington, at Greensburg for the county of Westmoreland, and at Union Town for the county of Fayette. All distillers are required forthwith to enter their stills at the office of the county in which they respectively reside, and to do further what the laws prescribe concerning the same, of which they may receive more particular information from the officer of inspection with whom entry is made.

"JOHN NEVILLE,

"Inspector of the Revenue, District of Pennsylvania, Fourth Survey.

"Nov. 10, 1794."

On the 27th of November the inspector announced that he was "directed to notify all persons in the counties of Allegheny, Fayette, and Bedford against whom suits have been commenced in the court of the United States for neglecting to enter their stills that upon their coming forward immediately to the collectors of each county and paying one year's arrearages upon the capacity of the still and the costs of suit, a bill of which will be furnished, the actions will be discontinued."—Penna. Archives, iv., pp. 449, 481.

into their own State, and passing on by way of Morgantown to Winchester; and the Maryland brigade starting from its camp at Pierce's Ferry, thence moving southeastwardly through Fayette County and its county town to the Great Crossings of the Youghiogheny, and from there to Fort Cumberland by the same route over which it had advanced.

The corps left under command of Gen. Morgan, to remain in this region through the winter for the preservation of order, and to assist, if necessary, in the execution of the laws, was placed in camp at Bentley's on the southwest side of the Monongahela. This force was composed in part of troops who had come from the East under Gen. Lee, and partly of men enlisted in the western counties, as advised in the proclamation of the commander-in-chief of November 8th, and authorized to the number of two thousand five hundred men by an act of Assembly of the 29th of the same month. Of those who were thus enlisted, Findley says that many of them were reported to have been among the most troublesome of the insurgents; that the people in the neighborhood complained "that many of them, for some time at first, demanded free quarters and such things as they stood in need of without pay, and that some of the officers committed indictable offenses; but when the persons against whom the offenses were committed commenced prosecutions they settled the disputes amicably and behaved well for the future. And when the people took courage to refuse to submit to impositions, the soldiers ceased to demand free quarters, or to be otherwise troublesome." But the tenor of the orders issued by Gen. Morgan[1] to the troops under his command, and the well-known character of that general in the matter of the enforcement of discipline, render it probable that the above statements of Mr. Findley, like others made by him in disparagement of the army and its officers, ought to be received with some degree of incredulity.

Gen. Morgan's forces continued in their cantonments at Bentley's Farm (with detachments at Pittsburgh and Washington) until the following spring, when, order being apparently fully restored and established, the last of the eastern troops marched homeward across the Alleghenies, and the western counties were left in full possession and exercise of their former rights and powers, though a small force (a part of the twenty-five hundred men enlisted in the West under Gen. Lee's proclamation of November 8th) was left in organization, as a precaution against the possibility of further outbreak, until experiment should have proved the civil power to be unquestionably sufficient for all emergencies without military aid. This small force, which was left in command of Col. Gabriel Blakeney, of Washington, was quartered in that town, on the ground which during the previous winter had been occupied by the cantonments of a detachment of Gen. Morgan's command, the location being on and in the immediate vicinity of the present grounds of the Washington and Jefferson College.

Gen. Lee remained in the West for a considerable time after the departure of the main body of the army, and on the 29th of November, in pursuance of authority delegated to him by the President, he issued a "proclamation of pardon" as follows:

"By Henry Lee, Governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia, Major-General therein, and Commander-in-chief of the Militia Army in the Service of the United States.

"A PROCLAMATION.

"By virtue of the powers and authority in me vested by the President of the United States, and in obedience to his benign intentions, therewith communicated, I do by this, my proclamation, declare and make known to all concerned that a full, free, and entire pardon (excepting and providing as hereinafter mentioned) is hereby granted to all persons residing within the counties of Washington, Allegheny, Westmoreland, and Fayette, in the State of Pennsylvania, and in the county of Ohio, in the State of Virginia, guilty of treason or misprision of treason against the United States, or otherwise directly or indirectly engaged in the wicked and unhappy tumults and disturbances lately existing in those counties, excepting nevertheless from the benefit and effect of this pardon all persons charged with the commission of offenses against the United States, and now actually in custody or held by recognizance to appear and answer for all such offenses at any judicial court or courts, excepting also all persons avoiding fair trial by abandonment of their homes, and excepting, moreover, the following persons, the atrocity of whose conduct renders it proper to mark them by name, for the purpose of subjecting them with all possible certainty to the regular course of judicial proceedings, and whom all officers, civil and military, are required to endeavor to apprehend and bring to justice, to wit: [Here follows the list of the excepted persons, given below.]

"Provided,—That no person who shall hereafter wilfully obstruct the execution of any of the laws of the United States, or be in anywise aiding or abetting therein, shall be entitled to any benefit or advantage of the pardon hereinbefore granted; and provided, also, that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to the remission or mitigation of any forfeiture of any penalty incurred by reason of infractions of, or obstructions to, the laws of the United States for collecting a revenue upon distilled spirits and stills.

"Given under my hand, at Head Quarters in Elizabeth Town, this twenty-ninth day of November, 1794.

"Henry Lee.

"General Orders.

"Camp, Bentley's Farm, Nov. 30, 1794.

"The General anticipates the happiest issue that the army he has the honor to command will afford to the laws and friends of good order and government in the four western counties of Pennsylvania. The willingness with which the citizens have enrolled themselves to co-operate with the army in the restoration of obedience to the laws are pleasing evidences that the unhappy delusion which lately pervaded this country, under the auspices of the friends of anarchy, are at an end.

"The General hopes that the army now hutting for winter-quarters will consider themselves as in the bosom of their friends, & that they will vie with each other in promoting the love and esteem of their fellow-citizens, and pointedly avoid every species of spoilation on the property of the inhabitants.

"The officers commanding fatigue parties are particularly directed not to suffer the sugar or other trees producing fruit or comfort to the farmer to be cut down for building, or any other purpose whatever. The burning of fencing, where there is such an abundance of fuel so easily procured, is strictly forbid, and a violence offered to the person or depredation on the property of any individual by the soldiery will be punished in the most exemplary and summary manner.

"PHILADELPHIA, December 24, 1794.

"DEAR SIR,—I have just now the pleasure of receiving yours of the 5th inst. Agreeably to your request, I proceed to make as full a statement of the reasons for excepting the persons specified in the proclamation as the present opportunity will admit.

"The offences of B. Parkinson,* John Holcroft,* Daniel Hamilton,* and David Bradford are too generally known to require a particular enumeration. Arthur Gardner,* one of those who, on the 4th of July, at the meeting of Col. Hamilton's battalion agreed to oppose excise law by arms, etc.; met at Couch's; united in the attack on Gen. Neville's; issued orders for the meeting at Braddock's Field; of assisting at Catfish the 14th of August in raising a liberty-pole.

"Thomas Lapsley, action at Neville's.

"William Miller, action at Neville's, and opposed to signing the papers; very contemptuous of the law and processes of the United States.

"Edward Wright, at Neville's; at Braddock's Field; opposed to signing submission.

"John Mitchell,* at Neville's, and robbed the mails.[2]

"Alexander Fulton, at Neville's; privy to robbing the mail; signed circular letter to convene the meeting at Braddock's Field.

"Thomas Spiers, same as Fulton, except being at Neville's.

"William Bradford, robbing the mail.

"George Parker,* at Couch's Fort, Neville's, Braddock's, and militia meeting, July 4th, at Col. John Hamilton's.

"William Hanna, atrocious conduct at Neville's house; shot at Gen. Neville.

"Edward Wagner, at Neville's, and menaces against those who signed the paper.

"Thomas Hughes, one of the men with blackened faces who attacked Faulkner, &c.

"John Shields, a principal in the affair at Neville's.

"William Hay, went to Couch's, and then to Neville's, and menaced one man if he would not go; also at Braddock's.

"William McIlhanny, at Neville's.

"Thomas Dalton* is, I fear, a mistake either of the clerk or the press; at least I do not at present recollect nor can I lay my hands on the papers relative to such a person.

"Patrick Jack,* S. Jack, and A. Highland, concerned in the outrage on Regan, and the destruction of Wells.

"The others are the three fugitives already examined by Judge Peters and ordered for trial, and the Virginians, who will probably be apprehended in the State where they reside.

"The youth of George Parker was not known when his name was inserted. In respect to these submissions, it is understood not to avail those who fly from home. It cannot be a bona fide submission in such cases. This also applies to Shields and Lapsley, yet it is open to them all to explain the reasons of their absences; if proved to be of a justifiable nature, then right to present immunity will be restored. I am, with sincere respect, yours, &c.,

"W. RAWLE."

"To the Hon. A. Addison."

(Those marked with a * delivered themselves to Gen. Morgan, under the direction of Judge Peters.)

David Bradford, whose name appears on the list of persons excepted from the operation of the amnesty, and who was properly regarded as chief among the leaders of the insurrection, fled the country upon the advance of the army. His last act of rebellion and defiance was done at the Brownsville meeting, where, on the 29th of August, he in violent terms advocated war, and the formation of a separate government. Upon the declaration of the vote, which showed the general sentiment to be heavily against his views, he left that meeting in anger, disgust, and despair, realizing that his power was finally overthrown. Two weeks later (September 13th), at the court-house in Washington, he, with twenty-seven others, signed a declaration "that no opposition shall come from us,

[2] "A certain John Mitchell, who, with the assistance of another person, had robbed the Pittsburgh mail, gave himself up to Gen. Morgan after the judiciary had left the country. This man's evident simplicity induced the general to wish him to escape, and to discredit his being the person; but Mitchell insisting that he was one of the persons who robbed the mail, the general, instead of confining him, gave him a pass to go to Philadelphia, thereby putting it in his power to reflect on the situation and make his escape; but he went to Philadelphia, surrendered himself to be committed, and, being found guilty on his trial, he was condemned to be hanged. This result was unavoidable on the fact being established; but the President, in great propriety, first reprieved for a time, and then pardoned him."—Findley.

At the Parkinson's Ferry meeting, on the 2d of October, he was present, but crestfallen and subdued. On the 4th of the same month he wrote Governor Mifflin, of Pennsylvania, embodying a long argument in extenuation of his course during the progress of the insurrection, but finding that this did not avail, and that the army was on the march from Carlisle, he left Washington about the 25th of October, and rode to the Ohio River, where it was his intention to embark and make his way down that stream and the Mississippi to Louisiana. "A small Kentucky boat had been prepared," says Brackenridge, "which was to have received him at Grave Creek, but being pursued by a man from whom he had liberated a negro, under the abolition law of Pennsylvania, he was obliged to leave his horse and take a canoe. Descending in this and passing Gallipolis, he was pursued by a party of five men dispatched from Gallipolis by D'Hebecourt, the commandant of the militia at that place. He had lain all night in his canoe at Sandy Creek, and had got into a coal-boat in the service of the contractor, cold and hungry, about two hours before the party in pursuit of him came up. They entered the boat, demanded Bradford, and took hold of his arm to drag him away. He made no resistance, but a lad from Washington County seized a rifle and singly defended him, obliging the party to relinquish their design and withdraw. This youth had himself absconded under apprehensions from having painted the device of a liberty-pole. Bradford continued his course, pursued by Capt. Jolly as far as Red Bank, which he passed two days before." Capt. D'Hebecourt's report[1] of this affair to Gen. Lee, and the general's reply, are given below:

"HEAD QUARTERS,
"GALLIOPOLIS Nov'r 10, 1794.

"SIR,—I have the honor to inform your Excellency that on the 30th of October, having understood that David Bradford, of Washington, was going down the river in a small canoe by himself, and had passed opposite to Galliopolis but a little while ago, I thought it was my duty, as being a public officer at this post to give orders to stop him. Consequently I sent three of the spies and a subaltern officer, with orders to take him and deliver him to my possession at Galliopolis, where I intended to keep him under a strong guard till I had been honored with your orders. My men overtook him on the 31st, about eleven in the morning thirty miles below the Big Scioto; but unluckily for them, he had two hours before got into a boat of the Contractor's, where they found thirteen men, all ready to protect Bradford, and massacre any who would undertake to take him away. My men after having used their best endeavors, and exerted all measures which prudence and inferiority could suggest in such occurrences, compelled to give up to the majority, and follow the boat as long as possible to try to get a reinforcement from some of the stations on the river; they offered 50 dollars to any man who would turn out with them to take Bradford; but they found the most part of the people disposed in his favor, and inclined to serve his cause.

"By several reports, I have a right to conjecture that Bradford landed at Limestone [Maysville, Ky.] and was conducted to some part of the country where he could safely preach his doctrines, and spread the flame of a new insurrection. It will be almost impossible to take him alive in country where the majority is in favor, and a matter of great chance if he can be killed without any fatal consequences. I yesterday saw Capt. Jolly of the mouth of Whelen, who communicated to me the orders issued by your Excellency to take Bradford or to kill him, rather than to suffer him to escape. I gave to Capt. Jolly all the information which I had, and ordered him to proceed to Limestone where he could receive some directions favorable to his purpose.

"That boat of the Contractors aboard which Bradford was found, was bound to Fort Washington, under the command of a certain Samuel Duncan, and loaded with coal; there were several passengers on board, who by their hostile disposition appeared to be particularly attached to Bradford. All the information you may wish to have on this important subject can be easily obtained at Fort Washington where S. Duncan delivered his boat.

"I am mortified that my undertaking has been unsuccessful, when I would have been happy to have my attachment for this country fully manifested. And if your Excellency thinks that I could be of any service in this affair, and would honor me with some orders, they should be performed with the greatest vigilance and punctuality.

"I am Your Excellencys
"most Humble and obedient Servant
"D'HEBECOURT
"Captain Commanding Militia at Galliopolis.

"HIS EXCELLENCY GOVERNOR LEE, Commander in Chief of the Army at Pittsburgh."

"PITTSBURGH, Nov 22, 1794.

"SIR,—I have received your letter of the 10th inst. and maturely considered its contents. I am concerned that the party in pursuit of Mr. Bradford were unsuccessful in efforts to arrest him inasmuch as I fear the late convulsions of this part of the country, may in a great degree, be ascribed to his counsels and efforts. I hope, at the same time, that he will yet be delivered into the hands of justice; that he may expiate by his punishment, those offenses which he is supposed to have committed against that country from which he derived his existence and support; but while I wish that he should be taken, I wish not that he should be destroyed; on the contrary, I should be affected with great concern, should I hear that he had been killed, or even treated with unnecessary severity or cruelty. It is the happiness as it is the pride of America that no person can be deprived of his property or existence but by law. The principles of justice, on which are founded those of the law, pronounce that before he shall be deprived of the latter, he shall be confronted with his accusers, allowed the benefit of exculpatory testimony, and permitted to urge whatsoever he may think necessary for his defense. Conformably to this idea, the several offenders who have been seized in this deluded country, have been regularly delivered to the civil power which will deal with them according to their merits.

"Permit me therefore, to assure you, Sir, that the information you have received, that I wished Bradford to be killed rather than suffered to escape, is erroneous, and that I shudder at the idea of hunting to death a fellow being. If by your exertions, he could be sent to this place alive you would confer an obligation on me, and on the United States; at the same time, in that event, I should wish him to be treated with every civility consistent with his safe custody.

"I am &c &c.
"HENRY LEE.

"D'HEBECOURT."

After his escape from capture by the party sent out by D'Hebecourt for that purpose, Bradford went on the contractors' boat to Fort Washington (Cincinnati), from which place he made his way in safety down the river to Louisiana, which was then under Spanish rule. Obtaining a grant of land from that government, he located on Bayou Sara, where he became a planter and a man of wealth, and where he spent the remaining years of his life. In estimating the character and abilities of Bradford, Brackenridge says, "He was a vain, shallow man, with some talent for popular declamation, which in the present state of the public mind might be productive of mischief. Fortunately he had not the capacity to form any deep consistent plan which looked beyond the present moment with a foresight of all consequences. It seemed to be his passion to ride on the popular wave, elated with popular applause, and at the same time fearful of popular displeasure." This does not appear to be true, as regarded his capacity for planning. His schemes were deeply laid, and he prosecuted them with a boldness which was not found in the other leaders, and which very naturally made him their chief. If he had been successful they would doubtless have been as eager to share in his success as they showed themselves ready to abuse and defame him after his (and their) failure.

With reference to the cases of those who were made prisoners by the cavalry, as well as of many proscribed but not captured, formal investigations were made under the direction of Judge Peters, in the course of which it was made apparent that information had been made against many who had really been guilty of no offense against the government. Many of those arrested were taken to Pittsburgh. Some were released through the interposition of influential friends, while others less fortunate were sent to Philadelphia, where they were imprisoned for some months.

Of those who were arrested by the army in this region, Findley says that only eighteen were sent to Philadelphia, and none of these were convicted on trial. A list of those who were sent to Philadelphia under military guard, and an account of their long and dreary march from Pittsburgh across the mountains to the first-named city, is found in the narrative taken from the journal of Capt. Robert Porter, from which a quotation has already been given, embracing the account of the taking of a number of prisoners (of whom Capt. Porter was one), taken on the 13th of November, and afterwards marched to Pittsburgh, where on the 16th they were delivered in charge of Col. Butler at the fort. From this the narrative proceeds:

"On the 25th the prisoners were called out of the garrison and surrounded by forty of the garrison soldiers, under the command of Ensign McCleary, and paraded before a detachment of Maj. James Durham's troop of calvary, to whose charge they were to be delivered at Greensburg. The following is a list of the prisoners:

"Rev. John Corbly, Washington County.
Col. John Hamilton, " "
Col. William Crawford, " "
John Black, " "
David Bolton, " "
James Kerr, " "
Thomas Sedgwick, " "
John Burnett, " "
Capt. Robert Porter, " "
Marmaduke Curtiss, Allegheny County.
Joseph Scott, " "
James Stewart, " "
Thomas Miller, " "
Thomas Burney, " "
Isaac Walker, Allegheny County.
John Laughery, Ohio Co., Va.
Caleb Mounts, Fayette County.

"On the 25th, about ten o'clock, being formed rank and file, and placed in the centre of the aforesaid forty soldiers, commanded by McCleary, they started for Greensburg, where they arrived on the 27th, and were lodged in jail. There they found Samuel Nye (who had been placed there for some rash expression against the officers and government, made when in a drunken frolic), Philip Wylie, and Joseph Parey, which augmented their number to twenty. On the 29th they were drawn out and paraded in the street, and compelled to stand mid-leg deep in mud and snow, and were formally delivered over to the charge of Maj. Durham. They then proceeded on their weary march to Philadelphia.

"The order of marching was, each prisoner marching on foot between two of the troop or guard, who were on horseback, and who were ordered by Blackbeard (Gen. Anthony M. White) to keep their swords always drawn, and that if any attempt should be made to rescue, that the heads of the prisoners should be cut off and brought to Philadelphia. At night they were placed in cellars, barns, and such other places as suited the disposition or fancy of our guard. Such was the order of their weary and dismal march to Philadelphia, for thirty days, through snow and mud, in the most inclement time of the year. On the 25th December, paraded at half-past eleven before the Black Horse tavern [in Philadelphia]. The prisoners, drawn up rank and file, were presented with slips of white paper by the major as cockades, to be put in their hats to distinguish them from the rest of the crowd they were to march through, or as trophies of victory. This was done by the express command of Gen. White, alias Blackbeard; though the major remonstrated with White, but to no purpose." The prisoners, after having been marched through the streets, in view of a great concourse of spectators, were lodged in the new jail. The Rev. John Corbly was admitted to bail on the 4th of March. The trial of Capt. Porter took place on the 18th day of May, 1795, when, no evidence having been brought against him, the case was, without argument, given to the jury, who in two minutes returned a verdict of acquittal, and he was liberated after having been a prisoner for more than six months. None of these prisoners were convicted. The case of John Mitchell, who gave himself up to Gen. Morgan, and who on his own confession was convicted of robbing the mail on the 26th of July, and sentenced to death, but afterwards pardoned by President Washington, has already been noticed. One other person was convicted; the crime being setting fire to the house of Benjamin Wells, in Fayette County.

In reference to the case of Col. John Hamilton, who was one of the party of prisoners marched to Philadelphia, and who was also sheriff of Washington County, and commandant of the "bloody battalion" of Mingo Creek, Findley says that "though a number of this regiment were known to have had an active hand in the attack on the inspector's house, and were in fact considered as the greatest promoters of the insurrection, yet he [Hamilton] not only kept himself free from those outrages, but endeavored, as soon as he heard of the design, to prevent the rendezvous at Braddock's Field. It was he who informed Bradford that the arms and ammunition in the garrison at Pittsburgh were designed for Gen. Scott's expedition against the Indians, and with the assistance of some others persuaded him to countermand the orders, and procured his promise to prevent the march. When he could not prevent the march to Braddock's Field, he put himself at the head of his regiment, and was very instrumental in preventing further outrages from being committed. At the court that was held for the county of Washington, a short time after the commissioners left the country, he proposed to take any twenty of the leading insurgents and lodge them in the county jail, if writs were issued for that purpose. . . . The sheriff, to give testimony that he could have accomplished what he proposed, executed every writ of capias that he had in his hands without difficulty. He attended all the meetings for restoring order, with a view to prevent outrages. His being a friend to order, and living where he did [among the Mingo Creek insurrectionists], merited higher approbation than if he had resided where the citizens generally were less disposed to riot."

Information of the intention to arrest him was communicated by a friend to Col. Hamilton in time to enable him to make his escape, if he had been so disposed; "but, conscious of his innocence, he preferred traveling above thirty miles to where the judiciary then was, and presenting himself to Judge Peters, informed him that he had heard there was a charge against him, and requested to have it examined. The judge said he was then too much engaged, but would call on him presently; that day, however, passed till evening, when Maj. Lenox, the marshal, in the most delicate manner he could, told him he must put him under guard."

Two days afterwards he was marched, under escort of a party of cavalry, to the town of Washington, to which place Judge Peters had removed. Here he again applied to the judge to have his case examined, but he was put off on some pretext from time to time, and "on the ninth day after he first applied to the judge he was sent close prisoner to Philadelphia, paraded through the streets with an ignominious badge on his hat, and thrown into the cells without his case having ever been examined. After an imprisonment of near two months and a half he had his case brought before the Supreme Court on a writ of habeas corpus, and on examination, nothing being found against him, he was [on the 20th of January, 1795] admitted to bail. At the Circuit Court held in Philadelphia in June following a bill for misprision of treason was sent to the Grand Jury against him, but every witness that was sworn testified in his favor. There was not even a suspicious circumstance found against him."

General pardons to those who had been implicated in the insurrection, and who had not subsequently been indicted or convicted of crimes committed in it, were proclaimed by President Washington and Governor Mifflin in August, 1795, in pursuance of the agreement made in the previous year at Pittsburgh by the United States and Pennsylvania commissioners. A large number of other persons also received special pardons.

In January, 1795, the Senate and House of Representatives of Pennsylvania declared the elections held in the counties of Washington, Allegheny, Westmoreland, and Fayette, on the second Tuesday of the preceding October, to be unconstitutional and void, for the reason that a majority of the inhabitants of those counties were then in a state of insurrection and opposition to the laws of the commonwealth. By this action fifteen persons then elected, viz., eleven members of the House of Representatives and four senators, were excluded from seats in the Assembly. A special election to fill these vacancies was held in the four counties in February, 1795, when the same persons were again elected, and duly took their seats, except one (Mr. Moore, a senator), who declined the new election.

CHAPTER XXI.

WAR OF 1812–15—TEXAN AND MEXICAN WARS.

In the war of 1812–15 between the United States and Great Britain, soldiers from Washington County took an active and honorable part, and all classes of the people of the county gave unmistakable evidences of patriotism from the commencement to the end of the struggle. War was formally declared by the United States on the 18th of June, 1812, but the raising of troops had commenced in Washington County prior to that time, in anticipation of the conflict which was known to be inevitable. On the 22d of May the brigade inspector issued the following order and call for volunteers:

"Brigade Orders.

"Orders having been received from the Adjutant-General of this State, requiring me to furnish my quota of men (three hundred) from the First Brigade 14th Division P. M., to be furnished by Volunteers, if not drafted Militia.—Notice is hereby given to the Regiments to parade in the following order, to wit:

"The Twenty-third Regiment, commanded by Lieut.-Col. John Vance, will meet in Burgettstown on Monday the 1st of June.

"The Eighty-second Regiment, commanded by Lieut.-Col. Joshua Dickerson, will meet on Tuesday, the 2d day of June, at the house of R. Graham.

"The Twenty-second Regiment, commanded by Lieut.-Col. Samuel Scott, will meet on Wednesday the 3d of June in the borough of Washington.

"The Fifty-third Regiment, commanded by Lieut.-Col. Joseph Barr, will meet on the Thursday following at the house of John Love, where officers and soldiers are ordered to be on the ground at 10 o'clock A. M.

"The quotas of the different regiments are as follows:

"The Twenty-second Regiment shall furnish ninety men.
The Twenty-third Regiment " " eighty "
The Eighty-second Regiment " " seventy "
The Fifty-third Regiment " " sixty "

With these orders there was issued the following call for volunteers:

"VOLUNTEERS OF 1807 AND 1809.[1]—You are about to be called into the field for the purpose expressed in the above orders. The cause leading to this must be familiar to every soldier in the brigade. The tyrants of the belligerents have since the first and second tender of your service perpetually plundered our ships at sea and impressed our sailors, and by their bribes induced the Indians to commence murder and rapine on our frontiers. Our government failing in all her efforts to establish a peace honorable to all, have found it absolutely necessary to have a solemn appeal to physical force for the support of our independence from further insult and disgrace. And hence I call upon you as freemen once more to tender your services.

"Now, my fellow-soldiers, here offers an opportunity of displaying your love of liberty, your determination to be free. Let it not be said that a draft must be the resort. I judge from former examples that the patriots of this brigade will not shrink from the real test, and the contest alone in the case will be who shall be foremost in stepping out as a volunteer. As this brigade bears the palm for its attachment to the State and general government, it would be degrading to the members composing it not to give a voluntary tender when called upon as a testimonial of its co-operation in these acts.

"I request your attention to the glorious example set by our infant sister State, Ohio, in her late tender of volunteers, and the ever-memorable conduct of the volunteers of the State of Kentucky and the Territories on the morning of the 7th Nov. last at the battle of Tippecanoe on the Wabash. To your arms, brother soldiers, and convince tyrants and the blind, deluded savages that you will by a voluntary act support the liberty achieved by the wisdom of the immortal Washington and the strong arm of union with the hope of success in a virtuous cause.

"Confidence in you as citizen-soldiers prompts a belief that I shall have the pleasure of meeting you on parade on the different days appointed, then ready and willing to fulfill my fond expectations, and most sanguine hopes.

"JAMES DUNLAP,
"Brigade Inspector, 1st B., 14 D., W. G. P. M.

"WASHINGTON, May 22, 1812."

The result of the order and call for volunteers appears in a communication published in the Washington Reporter of June 15th, in which it is stated that the number of volunteers "far exceeds the demand of Maj. James Dunlap, the brigade inspector. The detachment will consist of five flank companies, among which are the Williamsport Rangers, the second flank company attached to the 53d Regiment. The brigade inspector has in two weeks organized, inspected, and put in readiness for marching orders his quota of the fourteen thousand required in Pennsylvania, and made the necessary return to the adjutant-general."

On Wednesday, June 22d, four days after the formal declaration of war, a spirited public meeting of citizens of Washington County was held at the court-house for the purpose of expressing the determination of the inhabitants to support the government and send men to the field. Thomas Acheson, Robert Anderson, Alexander Murdoch, Parker Campbell, and Thomas H. Baird were appointed a committee to prepare resolutions and an address to be presented on the 27th, to which day the meeting was adjourned. At the adjourned meeting the attendance was very large from all parts of the country, and the enthusiasm ran high, but it does not appear that any actual business was done beyond the delivery of eloquent speeches by Parker Campbell, William Hoge, and others, and the adoption of patriotic resolutions, and an equally patriotic address to the people.

On Sunday, July 26th, information was received in Washington of the infamous surrender by Gen. Hull of the post of Detroit and the force under his command, amounting to nearly fifteen hundred men, to an inferior number of British and Indians. On the receipt of this disastrous intelligence a further call was made, and among those who came forward to volunteer was a full company called the Washington Infantry, commanded by Capt. William Sample, with James Ruple as lieutenant, and George Taylor ensign; also the "Williamsport Rangers," under Capt. James Warne and Lieut. William Hunter. The Washington County troops, mustered for a six months' term of service, marched for the Canadian frontier under the following "BRIGADE STANDING ORDERS.

"The following rules and regulations will be strictly observed by the Officers and Soldiers composing the detachments from the 1st Brigade, 14th Division, Pennsylvania Militia, on their march from this place to Head-Quarters:

"1st. Line of march to be as follows, viz.: Capt. William Sample's company, on the right; Capt. Thomas Miller's, second; Capt. Edmund Thomas', third; Capt. James Warner's, fourth; and Capt. David Buchanan's, on the left.

"2d. The person and property of our fellow-citizens shall remain inviolable. Disobedience of orders, intemperance, profane language must be peremptorily and rigidly punished.

"3d. Morning reports to be made, and by the proper subalterns, correctly, and returned regularly.

"Fellow-Soldiers.—We have here to establish our character in a military point of view. It has been asserted by the enemies of our system that the militia are inefficient, and that subordination amongst that description of force is impracticable. We now have a fair opportunity of proving the falsity of both these assertions. In our capacity as soldiers let us refrain from every act which would be considered as dishonorable in a citizen. The circumstances of our being embodied does not change the rules of honor and decorum. Therefore let all our acts be such as comport with those of the soldier and gentleman. Having the fullest confidence that the above orders will be strictly observed, it only remains for me to add that the most particular attention shall be paid in the providing of every necessary accommodation for the comfort and convenience of the troops on their march to head-quarters.

"RENDEZVOUS AT WASHINGTON, PA.,
"September 8th, 1812."

At Meadville, Pa., this battalion of Washington County troops was joined by the Bedford County volunteers under Col. Piper. A consolidation of the forces from the two counties then took place, and of [1] This allusion by the brigade inspector to the "volunteers of 1807 and 1809" has reference to the fact that in August of the former year three hundred and five men of the Washington County militia volunteered and tendered their services under the call made by President Jefferson for ten thousand men, on account of the outrage committed by the English on the United States frigate "Chesapeake," and also to a similar volunteering and proffer of services which was made by men of Washington County for duty in the field in 1809.

the regimental organization formed, Capt. James Warne, of the "Williamsport Rangers," became the major, and Lieut. William Hunter became captain of the "Rangers." The Washington County battalion marched to the Niagara River in the vicinity of Black Rock, below Buffalo, N. Y., where they remained on duty as part of the command of Gen. Tannehill until the following December, when, before the expiration of their term of service, the six months' troops, including the Washington Infantry, the Williamsport Rangers, and other Washington County men, were allowed to return home, either by dismissal or on furlough, till again called.

On Monday, Aug. 24, 1812, information came by express to Washington County that a large force of British and Indians (estimated at five thousand) had landed from Lake Erie at the mouth of Huron River in Ohio, and had advanced to within a few miles of Cleveland, having, as was supposed, the intention of marching on Pittsburgh. The alarm was sounded through all the county, producing the most intense excitement, which resulted in the raising of nearly one thousand men in the county ready for duty, among whom were the infantry companies of Capt. Buchanan, Capt. Thomas, and Capt. Benjamin Anderson; the cavalry troop of Capt. Shouse, of Monongahela City (then Williamsport), and two other companies of cavalry from the central and western part of the county. Under a call for a further quota of troops that was made immediately afterwards most of the men who thus volunteered joined the command of Gen. Richard Crooks, which rendezvoused at Pittsburgh, destined for duty in the West under Gen. William Henry Harrison. A small battalion, however (about three hundred men), which was quickly raised in the northwest part of the county,—composed of three companies of infantry, respectively, under command of Capts. Thomas Patterson, Samuel Rankin, and John Vance, and two small companies of mounted men, commanded by Capt. Robert Withrow and Capt. Shouse, of Williamsport,—did not wait for the call and the rendezvous at Pittsburgh, but marched at once (independent, as it appears, of any superior command) to meet the invading British and Indian force. Rendezvousing at what is now the village of Florence, in Hanover township, the command of the detachment was given to the ranking captain (Patterson), and Capt. Vance was made acting major. They proceeded to the Ohio, crossed that river at Georgetown, and marched in Ohio as far as New Lisbon, where, for some cause, probably on account of information received there that the story of the British and Indian invasion was without foundation, after a Sabbath-day's rest, they faced to the rear and returned home over the same route by which they had advanced. It has been stated in some accounts that the reason for their turning back was because on their outward march, near New Lisbon, they received information of Hull's surrender at Detroit. This is clearly a mistake, for the news of the surrender was announced at Burgettstown on the 26th of July, and was known to every male adult in Washington County four weeks before they left their homes for the march to Ohio.

The company known as the "Ten-Mile Rangers," from the southern part of the county, volunteered for a six-months' term of service, and were on duty at Buffalo, N. Y. Mr. Joseph Miller, Sr., now a pensioner living in Amwell township at the age of ninety-two years, and who was the first corporal of the Rangers, furnishes the following account of the movements and service of the company in 1812:
